THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

IN THE FOURTH SESSION OF THE FIFTY-THIRD PARLIAMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM OF GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND
[WHICH OPENED 13 JUNE 2001]

FIFTY-THIRD YEAR OF THE REIGN OF HER MAJESTY QUEEN ELIZABETH II

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 429

SECOND VOLUME OF SESSION 2004–2005

House of Commons

Monday 10 January 2005

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

DEFENCE

The Secretary of State was asked—

Royal Navy

1. Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): If he will make a statement on the future size of the Royal Navy. [207374]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): We are adapting and modernising the Royal Navy into a versatile maritime force that is structured to meet the challenges of the changing strategic environment of the 21st century. Our investment will see the Navy's capability enhanced through the procurement of new aircraft carriers, Type 45 destroyers, Astute class submarines and amphibious support vessels. That represents the largest shipbuilding programme in decades. Our latest plans for future Royal Navy force levels were detailed in Cmd 6269 on future capabilities, which was published by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence last July.

Mr. Luff: I was glad to hear the Minister refer to the new aircraft carriers. When exactly do the Government mean to finalise the plans to build those, and what is the exact timetable for their procurement? Are the Government sure that they have the cash to construct those aircraft carriers? Can the Minister confirm or deny the plausible report in The Times last week that they can be built only at the cost of a reduction in the Typhoon fighter programme?

Mr. Ingram: The programme, as has been explained time and again from the Dispatch Box, is currently going through its assessment phase. Proceeding in that way will ensure that we get that part of the early procurement stream right, which is part of the new smart acquisition philosophy. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would support that, although he would not have done so when his party was the Government given that much of the legacy of problems that we have is based on poor procurement decisions taken then. We are trying to ensure that all the steps in the procurement process are correct and accurate, and we seek to get things into service on the dates that we set—2012 and 2015.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware of the strong links between the north-east of England and the Royal Navy, not just in building of some of the finest ships but in supplying men and women to serve. Does he agree that the expertise of those men and women has once again been demonstrated in the past few weeks by the response of the Royal Navy in Sri Lanka and south-east Asia?

Mr. Ingram: That is an appropriate and timely question, and I pay tribute to those who are building our warships and those who are serving on them throughout the world and carrying out an important role in a troubled part of the globe. The frigate HMS Chatham, which carries two helicopters, and the support ship RFA Diligence have linked up off Sri Lanka and are co-ordinating with an observation, liaison and reconnaissance team that has been deployed to Colombo. They will shortly be joined by RFA Bayleaf, which will have the capacity to carry fresh water and aviation fuel, as well as sustaining Diligence and Chatham. HMS Chatham began work today to bring assistance to the east of Sri Lanka. They are carrying out important humanitarian work, and a range of other initiatives are taking place, some of which involve other members of our armed forces. I pay tribute to each and every person serving alongside civilian organisations in the area to bring humanitarian aid.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport) (Con): The number of standing tasks undertaken by the Royal Navy has been reduced from seven to six and is to be further reduced to four because of the shortage of ships. Bearing in mind the retirement of two Type 42 frigates and a Type 23, and given the slippage in the in-service date of the Type 45 to 2009, how can we be sure that we have enough ships even to fulfil four standing tasks? Is this the right time to reduce the Navy's presence, when the maritime stability that the Royal Navy is able to provide worldwide is so very valuable?

Mr. Ingram: The hon. Gentleman should have listened to the earlier answer. We are engaged in the largest warship-building programme for many years. That is being done to ensure that we have the capability to meet the threats of the future. That, of itself, means that we have to consider whether the legacy of ships that we have should be retained or decommissioned, and decisions on the contingent tasks expected of them have been taken on the basis of military assessments of what the threat level will be. In the view of the military advisers in the Royal Navy, what we seek to do is deliverable and achievable and will enable the Royal Navy still to rank among the very highest in the world.

John Robertson (Glasgow, Anniesland) (Lab): May I congratulate my right hon. Friends the Minister of State and the Secretary of State on all their work in securing ships for the Clyde, and say on behalf of workers on the Clyde how grateful they are for the jobs? Both my right hon. Friends know, however, that the most important time is when the steel gets cut, as we then know that the ships will be built. Can the Minister of State tell us when the first steel will be cut for the carriers?

Mr. Ingram: I cannot. If I could, we would have announced it. Obviously, that is a very important announcement. I know that my hon. Friend takes a close interest in this matter, and is assiduous in representing not only his constituents' interests but the interests of shipbuilding overall in the UK. He recognises the importance of these programmes, as he did in his question. When we move through the assessment phase, the next part of the process will get under way, and we will see that steel being cut. I am sure that there will be cheers throughout the UK on that.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot) (Con): Is it not now clear that the Government's ill-judged plans to cut the number of frigates and destroyers from 32 to 25, described by the First Sea Lord in post as "a painful cut", will inhibit severely the UK's ability to respond to unforeseen circumstances such as we have witnessed in the Indian ocean? Does the Minister of State agree that the size of the Royal Navy needs to take into account the ability of Britain's armed forces to respond to such disasters? On the deployment of HMS Chatham, which he mentioned, when did the Secretary of State authorise that deployment? Is there any truth in the report in The Sun today that the Government plan to send a fleet of 12 ships next week, apparently including both aircraft carriers, on a mercy mission? If that is true, where are those ships to come from as they are not there at the moment?

Mr. Ingram: I do not think that I should respond to speculation in any newspaper, even one as illustrious as The Sun. I cannot give the precise date at which the decision was taken on HMS Chatham, but it was taken immediately we were aware that we had capabilities in the region to meet needs there, and that it would serve a good purpose. I can obtain the precise date for the hon. Gentleman and write to him accordingly.

I take note of what the hon. Gentleman says about the First Sea Lord's comments. We recognise, and we have always said, that the current process of transition across all three parts of the armed forces is painful. To get to the new, however, we must also deal with legacy issues. If I read him correctly, he is saying that he would keep every capability that we have currently, plus engaging on the same shipbuilding programme on which we are engaged, and possibly even more so. How will he afford that? What is his budget? Is it not better to be a bit more realistic, recognise that this is the biggest warship-building programme for decades, and pay tribute to the MOD and Ministers for achieving that?

Iraq

2. Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): What contribution UK armed forces have made to the post-war reconstruction of Iraq. [207375]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The armed forces' principal role in Iraq is helping to provide the security conditions for reconstruction and political development. We are focused on developing the capability and capacity of the Iraqi security forces, and 115,000 Iraqi security personnel are now trained, equipped, and operating across Iraq. On the recommendation of the General Officer Commanding, we will soon be deploying the extremely high readiness reserve battalion for Operation Telic, which is 1st Battalion the Royal Highland Fusiliers, from Cyprus to the Multi-National Division (South-East) for a limited period in support of election security. Four hundred extra troops will be deployed to Iraq.

UK armed forces have also contributed—

David Maclean (Penrith and The Border) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is an outrageous abuse. This should be a statement.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Not during Question Time. [Interruption.] From time to time, the Speaker needs advice. I must get advice, and there is no point in anyone shouting. [Interruption.] The Secretary of State can continue.

Mr. Hoon: UK armed forces have also contributed directly to reconstruction, working with the Department for International Development, the US Project and Contracting Office and the Iraqis. We have supported some 1,120 quick impact projects, including repair of essential transport services, the refurbishment of hospitals and schools, and the emergency infrastructure programme.

Hugh Bayley: Unlike Conservative Members, I am pleased that British forces have played a role in training Iraqi security forces. May I ask my right hon. Friend how well those Iraqi forces trained by Britain have been performing the difficult tasks of dealing with the extremist terrorists who want to stop the election taking place?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is absolutely right to give significant praise to those Iraqis who are risking their lives day in, day out for the future of their country. They are working hard to ensure that the date of 30 January is kept to and that democratic elections can take place. It is obviously our responsibility, as part of the coalition in Iraq, to support that effort and that is what we are intending to do. My hon. Friend is certainly right: across the country Iraqis are working hard in the future interest of their country. We want to give them as much training as they require in order to assume full responsibility for their own security.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk) (Con): The Secretary of State decided to slip out this substantial announcement during Defence questions and I fully appreciate, Mr. Speaker, that it placed you in a difficult position. This is an important statement in the lead-up to the elections, when the security situation in Iraq is very serious indeed. It is not sufficient for the Secretary of State to do this; it should be a statement. Many colleagues on both sides of the House would like the opportunity to press him on this. Will the Secretary of State give a guarantee that he will come back to the House and turn this into a proper statement so that all colleagues today might—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not want the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) to tell me how to do my job—he just would not know where to start. The hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) did not take as long as the Secretary of State on his question. The Secretary of State's reply was long and I have given some leeway to the Front Bench. That is the way I do things, so the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green will not tell me what to do.

Mr. Hoon: As Opposition Front-Bench Members well know, the force to be deployed to Iraq for a limited period to deal with election security is held at very, very high readiness specifically for that purpose—something that is well known to Members on the Opposition Front Bench, so their supposed outrage is entirely synthetic. To suggest that coming to the Dispatch Box and making a statement is somehow slipping out an announcement, is, as they well know, nonsense.

Mr. Simpson: I think that the Secretary of State has missed the point. This is a serious issue. It is obviously a further deployment. Does he not accept the fact that Members on both sides of the House see it as a good supporting issue in terms of the cuts of the four infantry battalions that he only announced before Christmas? In fact, it seems to me and to Opposition Members that it means that we require more infantry, not the cuts that he has carried out.

Mr. Hoon: Again, the hon. Gentleman knows full well that those forces were held in Cyprus before Christmas at the time when I was making the announcement to which he has referred, so this has no relevance whatever to the question of adjustments in the infantry—no relevance at all. He knows that. All that he is doing, once again, is making the cheapest political points—party political points—out of something that is very important and very serious.

Dr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East and Musselburgh) (Lab): While the tasks of troops are clearly a matter for military leaders in Iraq, will my right hon. Friend indicate whether any movement of the additional forces—to the north, to Baghdad, to the so-called Sunni triangle—would require a decision of the Prime Minister on his recommendation?

Mr. Hoon: All these matters are obviously discussed in detail with the Prime Minister. A major deployment to Baghdad would certainly involve a decision by the Prime Minister on my recommendation, but I assure my right hon. Friend and the House that no such decision has been taken, or is indeed in prospect.

Mr. Paul Keetch (Hereford) (LD): The statement slipped out by the Secretary of State is indeed outrageous, because it comes at a time when newspaper reports in the United States talk about their forces becoming hit squads, when a senior US general is visiting Iraq to determine the process and the role of forces there and when our Prime Minister has said that he is in discussions with President Bush about the future role of British forces in Iraq. The announcement today should have been properly determined and discussed by the House of Commons through a statement, not simply slipped out.

Finally, does the Secretary of State realise that if he is deploying troops inside the British sector to support our purposes—our own force protection—Liberal Democrat Members and people throughout the country would accept it, but to deploy forces, potentially, outside the British sector will not receive the wholehearted support of many people in this country?

Mr. Hoon: I am sorry if the hon. Gentleman missed the answer that I gave to the previous question—perhaps he prepared his question well in advance of today's Defence questions. But this is Defence questions and I simply do not understand why in the course of Defence questions—[Interruption.] If the hon. Gentleman looks at the Order Paper, he will see that four of the first six questions are about Iraq, giving right hon. and hon. Members every opportunity of raising whatever questions on the subject they think fit.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Last week, Hadi Saleh, the international secretary of the Iraqi Federation of Trade Unions, was murdered in Iraq. What role will British troops play in ensuring the ongoing security of people who are trying to build up civil society in Iraq over the months to come?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to that appalling murder, alongside a number of others that have regrettably occurred. As my hon. Friend said, it demonstrates that those who perpetrate those appalling acts are trying to undermine the fabric of Iraqi society and our efforts to support the election process due to take place on 30 January, by trying to murder and intimidate those who are trying to build other aspects of a civil society. We should all join in our praise for those people who are working so hard, risking their lives in that effort, because it is something that every Member should support.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): In view of the desirability of achieving as much consensus as possible in the House on these issues, why did the Secretary of State at least not follow the convention whereby if he has a lot of information to impart on a certain question, it is taken at the end of Question Time, with notice, and treated by Mr. Speaker as a mini statement? Why did he not at least do that?

Mr. Hoon: Because I thought it appropriate, as far as the House was concerned, to take the very first opportunity to set out to the House, within minutes of the start of Defence questions, this particular deployment.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has been here long enough to know that we do not have points of order during questions.

3. Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): How many members of the armed forces have been injured in Iraq since March 2003. [207376]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): I take this opportunity to pay tribute to those civilians and the one member of the armed forces who have died in Iraq since the House last met. I know that the whole House would wish to pay tribute to them for their bravery and commitment in helping the people of Iraq.

Since February 2003, the United Kingdom has conducted 2,762 medical evacuations from Iraq. That includes a small number of entitled civilians and Iraqis. Of those, 790 have involved the evacuation of UK service personnel because of injuries sustained as a result of hostile actions, accidents and other incidents.

Mr. Grogan: Does my hon. Friend agree that, whatever hon. Members' views on the war itself, the whole House will be united in wanting to be reassured that service personnel who have been injured in Iraq are receiving the very best possible medical treatment and will be disturbed by some reports, such as those in BBC 1's "Real Story", that that has not always been the case, particularly for some of those who are suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder?

Mr. Caplin: My hon. Friend will understand that I cannot comment on any specific case, but we have a significant number of people from the Defence Medical Services in theatre now—about 400—including surgeons, dental officers, physiotherapists and mental health staff, all of whom are dedicated to providing a high standard of clinical care, and I, and the Secretary of State and others, have visited them in Iraq.

Patrick Mercer (Newark) (Con): Just a few weeks ago, Fusilier Gentle of the 1st Battalion the Royal Highland Fusiliers was killed in action in Iraq. Now that we know that the self-same battalion is about to go back to Iraq yet again, can the Minister confirm whether the soldiers of that fine battalion will have the correct equipment, the correct flak jackets, the correct helmets, the correct training and the correct warning to prevent further injuries?

Mr. Caplin: I can give the hon. Gentleman that assurance.

4. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South) (Lab/Co-op): If he will make a statement on the future of British forces in Iraq. [207377]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): We continue to consider, with the Iraqi Government and our partners in the multinational force, the number and disposition of forces required in Iraq in the months ahead, to support the sovereign Interim Government of Iraq through the process leading to elections and subsequent support to the Transitional Assembly and Government.

Mike Gapes: The Secretary of State knows that the Defence Committee visited Basra in the south of Iraq in December. May I ask him to confirm, based on my impressions, that there will be no precipitate withdrawal of British forces from Iraq and that we will see through the support that we are giving to the Iraqi national guard and to police training to enable the Iraqi people, after they have had their constitutional assembly elections, to hold a second election at the end of this year that will establish democracy in a large Arab country for the first time ever? We started this; we have to see it through.

Mr. Hoon: I thank my hon. Friend for his question. I take this opportunity to pay tribute to the members of the Select Committee for the visits that they have made to Iraq; they are very much appreciated by the armed forces. I was able to see members of the Select Committee in Basra during the visit in December to which my hon. Friend referred. I have looked at the observations made arising from their visit and I am grateful to them for their thoughtful comments.

My hon. Friend is right that we have a continuing obligation to Iraq and its people to try to ensure security there and to allow democratic elections to take place—and, indeed, to the evolution of the constitutional arrangements for Iraq. We will be there so long as we are needed—so long as there is a requirement for external forces to assist in the preservation of security. As I said to the House earlier, our real ambition is to ensure that training and expertise is available to the Iraqi security forces so that they can assume responsibility for their own security.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury) (Con): What message does the Secretary of State have for individual British service personnel in the Gulf who are faced with cuts in their numbers and frequently have inadequate equipment, who are faced with the raising of the burden of proof for the purposes of war pensions when they are injured, and perhaps worst of all are faced with the prospect of one of their number being prosecuted by non-combatant lawyers for actions that took place during a battle against the wishes of the military chain of command?

Mr. Hoon: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members would not want me to comment on legal cases going through the courts.

I take the hon. Gentleman back to his first observation and remind all those currently representing the Conservative interest in the House that when a Labour Government were elected in 1997 there were some 101,360 members of the Army. The number now is considerably higher than that, and will still be higher after the adjustments to which I referred. His argument is purely party political. He did not make the same complaints about his own Government. Therefore, such complaints from the Conservative party are entirely determined by their party political self-interest.

Mr. David Crausby (Bolton, North-East) (Lab): Can my right hon. Friend tell us something about our alternative exit strategy in the event that the elections later this month are not as successful as we all very much hope?

Mr. Hoon: May I make it clear to my hon. Friend that the elections themselves are not an exit strategy? They are part of a process of rebuilding Iraq's constitutional arrangements, and an important part, certainly. The key to the contribution of Britain's armed forces is the provision of security to allow those elections and further elections to take place. Every person reporting back from Iraq confirms just how enthusiastic Iraqi people in every part of the country are at the prospect of being able to participate in democratic elections to determine their future.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): Will the Secretary of State undertake to ensure that any future announcements of further deployments to Iraq are announced properly and to officers, soldiers and their families in an appropriate manner, unlike before Christmas when the Royal Gloucestershire, Berkshire and Wiltshire Regiment learned of its abolition on television?

Mr. Hoon: May I make it clear that the hon. Gentleman's final observation is simply not right? There was an extensive process of consultation through every part of the Army. It lasted some six months. Therefore, there was a determined effort by the Army to ensure that all its constituent elements were consulted on any of the changes that I announced immediately before Christmas.

Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley) (Lab): Can my right hon. Friend confirm that there are now more than 325 foreign fighters in detention in Iraq, many of them having come from Syria? What representations are we as a Government making to the Syrian authorities to try to prevent those who do not want elections in Iraq to take place from continuing to cross the border and carry out terrorist attacks?

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is right to raise that issue. If those foreign fighters are not from Syria, they have certainly come through Syria. It is a matter of great concern that such people are able to make their way to Iraq and perpetrate the kind of atrocities that we have seen in recent weeks and months, deliberately trying to undermine the efforts of the majority of the Iraqi population to rebuild a constitutional basis for their country. I take this opportunity to pay tribute to the work of my hon. Friend in Iraq. She has visited different parts of the country on many occasions and is widely admired there for her efforts.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): How far ahead have further deployments been considered and will the Royal Anglian Regiment be sent to Iraq this year?

Mr. Hoon: I am not going to set out details of future deployments. Obviously there is always planning for them, but I repeat what I have set out persistently: we are seeking to ensure the training of Iraqi security forces so that they can assume responsibility for their own security.

5. Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): If he will make a statement on the security situation in Iraq.
[207378]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): Insurgents and extremists continue in their attempts to destabilise the progress that is being made towards a secure and democratic Iraq. Their efforts to destroy the morale of the Iraqi security forces and to intimidate the people of Iraq in the run-up to elections are not unexpected. With the support of the coalition, Iraqi security forces continue to conduct operations against this insurgency to create the right conditions for elections to take place at the end of this month. Our armed forces are actively involved in developing the capability and capacity of the Iraqi security forces, and 115,000 Iraqi security personnel are now trained, equipped and operating across the country.

Mr. Mackay: Does the Secretary of State not see that, by failing to understand that it is essential to inform the House by way of a statement when there is a further deployment of troops in Iraq, he has lost the confidence of the whole House and is not a fit and proper person to hold that high office?

Mr. Hoon: I do not understand the right hon. Gentleman's argument. The Government have made a series of statements on Iraq on a regular basis. It has never been the case that adjustments in forces going to Iraq, or indeed any other theatre, has required an oral statement to be delivered when troops are already warned off for that particular purpose. I have acknowledged adjustments in the size of the force, including significant increases, by way of a written statement and announcement at Defence questions. There is nothing unusual for any Government in the practice that I have adopted today.

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone) (Lab): Has my right hon. Friend seen press reports this morning that Secretary Rumsfeld is considering using the Salvador operation, which is basically an option that was used by the Reagan regime to fight a dirty war in El Salvador? Will he confirm that British troops will have no truck with such a strategy? Will he take this opportunity to condemn those who believe that such a strategy would be helpful, because it would contribute to pushing Iraq into civil war?

Mr. Hoon: I encourage my hon. Friend not to believe all that he reads in the newspapers, including the more excitable elements of some of those who comment on defence matters.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): Is it not a fact that British forces can make up with skill what they lack in numbers in this field because they have more experience of successful counter-insurgency, particularly in the long Malayan campaign, than any other force in the world? What steps is the Secretary of State taking to ensure that the skills and experience of British forces are conveyed to our larger American allies to maximise the prospects for success?

Mr. Hoon: I do not disagree with the hon. Gentleman's tribute to British forces. They have done a tremendous job in Iraq, as he rightly indicates, as they have in similar earlier operations. They take every opportunity to pass on their experience and expertise to other members of the coalition operating in Iraq, and that includes American forces.

However, I emphasise that there are aspects of the expertise gained by American forces in other parts of Iraq, such as around Baghdad, where the situation has been a good deal more dangerous than it has been in and around Basra, that are passed back. British forces have paid tribute to the experience of their American colleagues and have learned something from them as well.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): The Secretary of State told my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) not to be excitable, but are we sure that the report in Newsweek has no foundation, not least because Ambassador Negroponte, who is a considerable power in these matters, operated through death squads in the 1980s? Is the Secretary of State quite sure that he is right to dismiss my hon. Friend?

Mr. Hoon: I was not in any way dismissing my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham)—nor, I point out for the clarity of the record, did I describe him as excitable. I described the commentators as excitable, and I am afraid that that is too often the case with defence comment, as I hope my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) will accept.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): The Secretary of State will need no persuading from me that when our troops return from Iraq they do so with their reputations as high as when they went, and often enhanced. Sadly, we cannot say that about their political masters. Will the troops who are to be deployed from Cyprus to Iraq over the next few days be deployed only in Basra or in the wider British sector? If they or any of our other troops are to move into other sectors, when will we know about that?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. and learned Gentleman is a careful lawyer, and careful lawyers generally do not repeat questions that have been asked twice already. For the avoidance of doubt, and if for any reason he failed to hear the answer that I gave on two previous occasions to the question that he has just repeated, I can say that there are no plans whatever for British forces to operate outside their current area of operations.

6. Mr. David Stewart (Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber) (Lab): What steps the Department is taking to rebuild Basra airport as a commercial airport.

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): To support the process of commercialisation of Basra airport, the UK Ministry of Defence is providing air traffic control, communications support and fire and rescue services to the Iraqi Ministry of Transport. In addition, we continue to support the training of key airport personnel and assist in the installation of new equipment. The reopening of Basra airport represents a boost to the reconstruction efforts in southern Iraq and will help to bring further economic regeneration. Basra airport received its first commercial flight, organised by Iraqi Airways, on 1 January 2005, and the first Hajj flight from Basra to Jeddah took place on 3 January 2005.

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend will be well aware of the strategic importance of Basra airport in both commercial and military terms, but it clearly requires major upgrading, as I discovered the first time I visited it with the armed forces parliamentary scheme in 2003. What discussions has my right hon. Friend had with the interim Government about the airport's future role?

Mr. Hoon: I can assure my hon. Friend that as a regular visitor to the airport, I can say that there has been a significant improvement since my first visit—and, I expect, since he visited. The process of improving conditions is continuing, and the assistance being provided by British forces is part of that. On my last visit, shortly before Christmas, I had detailed discussions with the governor about the commercial benefits that he anticipated would flow to Basra and the south of Iraq from opening the airport, which is why we were so determined to get the first commercial flight in as soon as we could.

Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): Does the Secretary of State accept that it is not just Basra that needs investment but the whole infrastructure in Iraq—oil, gas, water, electricity and dockyards—and that no investment will be made without the wholehearted support of the private sector? However, the private sector will not invest a penny unless it knows that the situation is secure and will stay secure after it has invested. Does that not indicate that our troops will be present, providing a secure situation, for five or 10 years, or more?

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman is right about private investment in Basra, but I would say this about Basra and the south: there is no doubt that Saddam Hussein made the situation there worse than it was in other parts of the country, as a punishment for the Shi'a and their efforts to resist his arbitrary rule.

As I said, the hon. Gentleman is right about the importance of securing private sector investment; he is also right to say that that depends on security. The only qualification I would add to his observations is that in my opinion, non-governmental organisations and the private sector too often make assumptions and assessments about the whole of Iraq, and look at the security situation in other parts of Iraq without necessarily considering that the situation in the south is very much better. It may well be that they could provide the necessary investment and personnel in those parts of the country where the security situation is relatively calm and benign.

Voting (Service Personnel)

7. Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): What steps he has taken to ensure that the maximum number of service personnel are eligible to vote. [207381]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): We are working closely with the Electoral Commission to improve awareness in the service community of the options to register to vote. An internal information campaign will begin in the next few weeks to coincide with the publication of a new Defence Council instruction providing full information and practical help on how to register and explaining the various voting options.

Mr. Gray: Since the Minister introduced annual reregistration for service personnel in 2000, the number of service people registered to vote has collapsed—in my constituency from 4,500 to 400, in Gosport from 3,500 to 200, and across the whole of Scotland from 18,000 to 2,000. If his intention was to encourage service people to vote, his stratagem has been a demonstrable failure. Will he now acknowledge that fact, and the fact that implementing some little initiative such as the one he mentioned will not be enough? He must now act decisively if large parts of our armed services are not, in effect, to be disfranchised.

Mr. Caplin: I am not sure that I was personally responsible for the legislation that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, but I accept that the Government, of which I am a member, were. In the Westminster Hall Adjournment debate with the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) that took place before Christmas, I acknowledged that there had been a decline in the numbers. However, that is not an indication of the number of service personnel who register to vote, because under the Representation of the People Act 2000 we are asking people to register in the same way as we all do—annually. That significant change is the reason why in many constituencies the numbers today are different from those seen in 2000.

Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire) (Lab): My hon. Friend will be aware that armed services personnel serving abroad will not be in receipt of all the information that the rest of us in this country take for granted. Will he ensure that they are made aware of the choices, and of the consequences for industry should the unthinkable happen and a Labour Government not be returned?

Mr. Caplin: I am sure that a Labour Government will be returned, whenever the general election takes place. One of the decisions facing those serving overseas is whether to vote by proxy or by post. As I said in the Westminster Hall Adjournment debate, I think it best for those serving overseas to seek an effective proxy vote in this country, to make sure that their votes are cast.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): Among those who know of the situation, there is a widespread perception that the Government are deliberately dragging their feet because of the strong tendency among armed forces personnel not to vote Labour. Will the Minister therefore pledge to ensure that by May this year the number of members of the armed forces registered to vote will be the same as in May 1997?

Mr. Caplin: That's it, is it? Labour's two periods in office have witnessed the biggest consistent increase in defence spending, and the hon. Gentleman's assertion and assumption that armed forces personnel vote in a particular way is wholly ridiculous. As I said, we are engaged with the Electoral Commission and examining other ways of dealing with the issue, and I am confident that we will succeed.

Mr. Robathan: In my dealings with him, I have always found the Minister to be straightforward—and I know that he is not standing for Parliament again, but that answer is not good enough. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer says that he will never again believe a word the Prime Minister says, why should anybody in the country believe anything the Government say? Will the Minister now take action to ensure that all armed forces personnel are registered to vote by May? Otherwise, the country will draw its own conclusion—that the Government are happy to send armed forces personnel to dangerous spots such as Iraq, but not happy for those troops to cast their verdict on the Government's position and policies at the ballot box.

Mr. Caplin: The hon. Gentleman is getting very excited this afternoon, and I do not understand why. I am a democrat and I want to encourage as many people as possible to take part in elections. The new Defence Council instruction, which is to be published at the end of the month, will be specific and will help to encourage people to register to vote in time for an election, whenever it is called.

Afghanistan

8. David Cairns (Greenock and Inverclyde) (Lab): What recent discussions he has had with NATO allies concerning poppy eradication in Afghanistan. [207382]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence routinely discusses with NATO allies the role of the NATO-led international security assistance force in Afghanistan, including its support for Afghan counter-narcotics initiatives.

David Cairns: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that answer. In the House, on 30 June, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, speaking of eradication, said:

"It would certainly help if this became part of the NATO tasks, but we shall have to continue to have that debate."—[Official Report, 30 June 2004; vol. 423, c. 300.]

On 24 November my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence confirmed that such discussions were already taking place.

I appreciate that eradication is not the entire answer to the problem, and that the Afghan authorities have to take responsibility for themselves. However, we have NATO troops in Afghanistan, and they are highly trained and highly professional. Does my right hon. Friend agree that following the clear lead given by the Prime Minister, we should be actively pursuing, as part of our policy, making eradication of this killer crop part of NATO's core activities in Afghanistan?

Mr. Ingram: Shortly after my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced NATO's initiation of ISAF's expansion across northern Afghanistan last June, a new NATO plan for ISAF came into effect. For the first time, ISAF had a counter-narcotics role. That is limited, because ISAF expansion relies on provincial reconstruction teams, which are not designed for aggressive operations such as eradicating poppy crops. The force supports the Afghan Government's counter-narcotics strategy. For example, it collects intelligence and disseminates the intelligence that it encounters on narcotics. The security provided allows Customs and Excise to sponsor interdiction projects by the Kabul city gates and enable them to operate effectively.

I fully agree with the importance that my hon. Friend accords to these matters. I give him the assurance that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and Defence Ministers take them extremely seriously, as do all Ministers. We shall continue to look for ways to deal with this evil crop.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold) (Con): Since NATO and specifically Britain were given responsibility for eliminating poppy crops in Afghanistan, production has rocketed. Some people think that that has happened by as much as 80 per cent. The result is that a fix of heroin on the streets, I am told, is now as cheap as a cup of coffee. That is condemning many of our youngsters to a life of absolute misery. What are the Government doing to give this issue much greater priority?

Mr. Ingram: We are taking the matter extremely seriously, but the way to take it forward does not rest solely with the United Kingdom's armed forces. Multinational forces are present. We must encourage everyone to move forward progressively in meeting the objectives. There cannot be a solely military solution; I hope that the hon. Gentleman understands that. It is necessary to cut across the whole of Afghanistan society, and that requires the commitment, the determination and the support of the Afghan authorities. They are showing a greater willingness and preparedness to do that. That does not relate only to crop eradication. Account must be taken of livelihoods. There is a range of activities that will take time to bite and take effect. This is being experienced elsewhere in the world where there have been successful programmes that have been taken to a conclusion. They have not been based solely on a military solution, and in this instance too, that is the best way forward.

Iraq

9. Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): how many armed forces personnel are serving in Iraq. [207383]

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): As at 6 January 2005, approximately 8,850 United Kingdom armed forces personnel were serving on Operation Telic. Of these, approximately 8,050 are based within Iraq. The remainder are either based elsewhere in the region, or are at sea in the Gulf. Around 300 Royal Navy personnel normally allocated to Operation Telic have been temporarily allocated to Operation Garron relief efforts in the far east. The forthcoming deployment of the extremely high readiness reserve battalion, which I have today announced to the House, will increase those figures by about 400.

Bob Spink: Will the Secretary of State lead the House in paying tribute to the professionalism and courage of those serving in the additional 400 from the 1st Battalion of the Royal Highland Fusiliers? Having felt the mood of the House today, will the right hon. Gentleman show the same professionalism and courage by changing his mind even at this late stage, and making a formal statement on this matter so that we can question him on the equipment that the troops will have, where they will be based, when they will be going, and so on?

Mr. Hoon: I certainly join the hon. Gentleman in paying tribute to all Britain's armed forces wherever they are serving, and particularly those serving in Iraq. I am sorry that he appears more interested in the constitutional process than he is in the substantive issue. Had he wanted to ask questions along the lines that he has outlined, he could have taken the opportunity to do so.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): What role can the armed forces play in Iraq in protecting Iraqi trade unionists, especially in the light of the brutal murder of Hadi Saleh and the theft of names and addresses of members of the Iraqi Federation of Workers Trade Unions, the major trade union, from his home? There is a need for considerable protection of workers inside Iraq.

Mr. Hoon: My hon. Friend is right to highlight the courage of the people who are working to rebuild Iraqi society in every possible way. Certainly, coalition forces continue to work alongside the Iraqi security forces in seeking to protect those efforts.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): I am sure that the Secretary of State would not want to leave the House with the impression that the Royal Highland Fusiliers in Cyprus were poised to go to Iraq—although that was the implication of his earlier statement. The high readiness reserve must be replaced with another battalion when it is deployed. Who will that reserve be, and can the Secretary of State explain the contradiction between his speech on the Loyal Address on 24 November 2004, when he said, as is recorded in column 108 of Hansard, that there were 220,000 trained Iraqi security personnel, and the figure of 115,000 personnel that he gave the House today? Would it not be better to make a proper statement? The Minister of State came to the House to make a statement on the deployment of seven liaison officers to the Congo, but the Secretary of State is proposing to deploy 50 times as many people without making a statement.

Mr. Hoon: The extremely high readiness reserve was specifically placed in Cyprus for the purpose that it is now about to undertake, as I have made plain to the House on previous occasions. I therefore want to correct the impression that the hon. Gentleman gave.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): While recognising that murderers and torturers are carrying out crimes in Iraq against civilians as well as against our troops, would it not be wise to tell the United States that if there is any truth at all in the suggestion about assassination squads, that would not only add to the serious mistakes that America has made in Iraq, but would be counter-productive, assisting suicide bombers and so on? America is our friend and ally in this project, but we must speak frankly to it.

Mr. Hoon: I assure my hon. Friend that I speak frankly to our American allies, just as I do to our other allies. However, it is in the nature of that frankness that that is best done privately rather than publicly.

RAF St. Mawgan

10. Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell) (LD): What discussions he has had with the Department for Transport on the future of civilian air services at RAF St. Mawgan. [207384]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): In addition to discussions between officials, I will meet the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Charlotte Atkins) to discuss this issue.

Matthew Taylor: I hope that the Minister accepts that as Cornwall is an objective 1 area, and is recognised by the Government as one of the poorest in the country, the maintenance of links such as the civilian air service operating from RAF St. Mawgan is particularly important for the area, and for joined-up government. Short-term decisions on military deployment should not outweigh the long-term needs of the military at RAF St. Mawgan—nor, indeed, should they put at risk domestic civilian services. Can the Minister assure me that every effort will be made to ensure continuity so that domestic services can be maintained, irrespective of relatively short-term changes in military requirements?

Mr. Ingram: The situation is a bit more complex than that. If the hon. Gentleman does not understand why, perhaps he should be better briefed. The airfield is part of the review of 73 airfields, including 50 prime airfields, which are being examined in terms of future aircraft capability. If a decision were made to place that capability at St. Mawgan, it would be a significant boost and boon to the local area and economy. However, there may be a knock-on effect for the civilian use of the airfield. The issues are therefore complex, and we must work our way through them, recognising the importance of the aerodrome to the area. I shall meet the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands, and am prepared to meet local Members of Parliament and give them access to officials so that they can be kept up to date on important developments in this big issue.

Scottish Division

11. Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP): How many service personnel are serving in the regiments of the Scottish Division. [207386]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): As at 1 November 2004, the total trained strength of the Scottish Division of the infantry was 3,005. That figure excludes officers and soldiers currently serving away from their battalion, and attached personnel from other armed services.

Pete Wishart: On the day that the Secretary of State has made an arrogant non-statement about the further redeployment of another Scottish regiment, does the Minister appreciate the outrage that abounds in Scotland? While those in another Scottish regiment will do their duty for the Government, the Government will cut their numbers, amalgamate the regiment out of existence, and continue to stab them in the back at home.

Mr. Ingram: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will wait to hear the answer, and not walk out in a huff as he did the last time we discussed the matter. The question comes a little amiss from him and his party, given that they do not want the type of role that is currently undertaken by Her Majesty's armed forces anywhere in the world. We are seeking to strengthen the capability of the Army. We are putting more resources in and we will make the new structure more resilient, more robust and more capable of meeting the threats of the future. That is what serving personnel want to hear. I recognise that the hon. Gentleman wants to play politics with the subject, but we have the defence of the realm to consider.

Defence Exports

12. Syd Rapson (Portsmouth, North) (Lab): What recent efforts he has made to promote British defence exports on the international market. [207387]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): The Ministry of Defence provides a high standard of support to legitimate defence exports. The Defence ministerial team plays a full part in this work and Ministers have continued to promote UK defence exports vigorously. In recent years we have helped UK defence industry to win orders worth on average around £5 billion annually, including such major achievements as the sale of Hawk to India, worth £800 million.

Syd Rapson: Will my right hon. Friend comment on the Government's refusal to adopt the Archerfish programme, which is designed to destroy underwater munitions? It was invented with the encouragement of the Government, but we failed to take up the programme. Unfortunately, the Americans have grabbed it with both hands, and it looks as if they will develop it and sell it back to us. We have lost a brilliant invention, and export potential for this country.

Mr. Ingram: The British Aerospace bid was deselected in the programme competition to which my hon. Friend refers, on the basis of its performance against the UK's requirement. I know my hon. Friend would agree that we must get the right equipment to support the forces in the job that they have to do. In this case, it was judged that the proposed system was not suitable. However, the UK Government are supporting BAE Systems' Archerfish bid in the current US one-shot mine disposal competition. I stress that the US requirement is substantially different from that of the Royal Navy, but I have taken note of my hon. Friend's strong views on the matter.

Hugh Robertson (Faversham and Mid-Kent) (Con): One of the most successful defence exports of recent times has been the British servicemen who are currently employed by private military and security companies abroad. Does the Ministry of Defence consider that the regulatory guidelines affecting those companies are sufficient? What impact are their activities having on retention in the armed services?

Mr. Ingram: It is too early to say what impact that will have on retention. There is some anecdotal information that could indicate that there may be a draw to areas where service personnel with a very high level of skills could be employed. Of course we will do what we can to encourage them to stay in the armed forces. The regulations are not strictly a matter for the Ministry of Defence, but if the hon. Gentleman writes to me accordingly, I will find out the background.

Defence Airfield Review

13. Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): If he will make a statement on the defence airfield review. [207388]

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence announced to the House last July, we are undertaking an extensive review of our future requirement for airfields. We currently have in excess of 70 airfields of various sizes—a number based on the requirements of the cold war, and of older aircraft. With changes to the strategic environment and new aircraft scheduled to come into service, we need to ensure that our airfields are configured to meet the requirements of the future.

The defence airfield review is being taken forward through a series of business cases assessing the best basing configuration, both operationally and in value for money terms, for a number of future aircraft types. The possible consequences for airfields included in business cases might be confirmation of a current role, a change in role or, in some cases, closure. Most of the business cases are not due to conclude until later this year. However, some business cases may reach initial conclusions on individual aircraft types sooner. Any final decisions on the consequences for airfields will be announced to the House.

Angus Robertson: I thank the Minister for his very full answer, but what economic and social consequences of any potential base run-down and closure are being factored into the review, and how is that being done?

Mr. Ingram: This is about the basing of aircraft types. Once it is decided what is right for the Royal Air Force and the armed forces generally, there will be further consultation about the impact on local communities. I know that the leader of the hon. Gentleman's party has suggested we should abandon the Eurofighter project, and that would mean the closure of Leuchars air base. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman should go there and explain the position to those involved.

Asian Tsunami

3.31 pm

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): With your permission, Mr Speaker, I would like to make a statement following the earthquake and tsunami in the Indian ocean on the morning of Sunday 26 December.

In the early hours of 26 December, the earth moved along some 1,200 km of the sea bed, creating first a sea in retreat, then a sea borne along by a wave of such force that it literally obliterated not just the area of the coast at Aceh nearest to it, but land over 3,000 km from its epicentre. It was a force of nature so unimaginable in its power and catastrophic in its impact that it quite simply washed the life out of villages, towns, tourist resorts and anything alive on the water in areas across the entirety of the Indian ocean. It affected Indonesia, Sri Lanka, south India and the Andaman and Nicobar islands, the Maldives, Thailand, Burma, Malaysia, Somalia, Kenya, Tanzania, the Seychelles and Bangladesh.

The estimated number of people killed now stands at over 150,000, with millions of people forced away from their homes. As well as the devastating loss of life and immediate suffering, there are significant longer-term implications. Many people have lost their means of earning a living. Fishermen have lost their boats and nets; farmers' crops have been destroyed; roads, bridges and buildings are damaged or destroyed, as are coastal areas where livelihoods are dependent on tourism.

We should begin by expressing the total unity of the House in giving our deepest condolences for the loss of life in those countries directly affected by the tsunami, and to all in this country who have lost family members, friends and colleagues in the disaster. Scarcely any of us here will not know someone whose life has been touched by this event. None of us will have not been moved to tears as each night we saw, with mounting horror, the human tragedy that followed the natural disaster.

I can announce today that there will be a memorial service later this year for the victims of the tsunami, which will be attended by Her Majesty the Queen. We will give more details in due course, and will obviously wish to take account of the views of relatives in planning the service.

I shall divide my statement into three parts. I shall deal first with the loss of British lives, secondly with immediate humanitarian help for the countries concerned, and finally with the longer-term issues of redevelopment and reconstruction. I hope the House will forgive me if I go into a little detail on those issues.

Let me begin with our own citizens. The number of confirmed dead is now 51. The number of category 1 of the missing—that is, those highly likely to be lost—is, including the 51, now 453, up from 443 last Friday. Of those, 371 are in respect of Thailand and 50 in respect of Sri Lanka. The numbers in category 1 have stopped rising so rapidly. Not all of them will prove actually to be dead, though many may. The category 2 figure, relating to those unaccounted for in the region but not in the "highly likely" category, now stands at 871, down from over 2,000 late last week. Previous experience, I am advised, tells us that that figure may never fall to zero.

On 26 December, the Foreign Office established temporary offices working in all the affected areas. There is now, for example, a temporary office the size of a medium-sized embassy in Phuket. Staff have also been deployed at overseas airports to help with any problems of British nationals and to issue emergency passports to those without travel documents.

There are 75 police officers working in Thailand and Sri Lanka, both to assist in an international effort to recover and identify the dead, and to give specialist advice to our Foreign Office teams in those countries. Their work is enormously difficult as well as very distressing.

Sadly, many victims were swept away by the force of the tsunami and their remains may never be recovered. In other cases, and as time goes by, forensic identification of the remains becomes extremely hard. DNA testing may be required and that will take time. I know that that will only add to the agony of the families concerned. I am afraid, however, that no short cuts are possible. The pain and upset that could be caused by mistakes would be even worse.

The Foreign Office has funded the deployment of portable mortuary facilities to the disaster areas in Sri Lanka and Thailand and is working closely with international undertakers to facilitate the repatriation of bodies once they have been positively identified. British officials and police officers are now working with the families of the victims to repatriate remains where appropriate and to help the injured to get home. The Foreign Office has assisted affected families with the cost of repatriating remains; immediate medical expenses for those seriously injured; medical evacuation; and return travel for two members of the victim's family.

The emergency call centre took over 40,000 calls at the peak, and has taken over 135,000 in total. Over 200 family liaison officers have been appointed to support every family of British nationals we think are highly likely to have been involved. I should explain that that figure is lower than the number of likely deaths because some families have unfortunately lost a number of relatives in this terrible tragedy. We are also looking to provide family liaison officers for families in the affected countries where appropriate and are supporting families in the UK who have lost family members who lived in those affected countries, particularly in Sri Lanka, where over 30,000 people were killed.

The Foreign Office has also ensured that there are full reception arrangements at airports for people returning to the UK. That includes tailored medical attention where necessary, assistance with getting home and access to psychological and emotional support services. The British Red Cross has also established a helpline for victims of the disaster and their families and a family support network for those affected.

I would like to say some words about the Foreign Office, police and other staff involved in this operation. The complexity of the operation is obvious. The grief of the families is manifest and absolutely understandable. There could not be circumstances more taxing. There will inevitably be mistakes made or unintended insensitivity in certain cases. However, I am clear that those staff on the whole have done a quite magnificent and exceptional job and I would like to express our heartfelt thanks to them.

Let me now turn to the action that the Government have taken to alleviate the consequences of the tsunami in the countries affected. Within hours of the disaster striking, the Department for International Development's crisis operations team was set up and it sent out its first assessment team. The next day, DFID began airlifts of tents and plastic sheeting in response to an urgent request from the Government of Sri Lanka. A series of airlifts followed, including approximately 80 tonnes of water donated to the Maldives and enough basic emergency medical supplies to Indonesia to treat 100,000 people for three months. We focused our immediate effort on support to the United Nations humanitarian organisations, the Red Cross movement, non-governmental organisations and a range of practical actions, such as delivery of urgently needed relief items, including water, water containers, tents and blankets and plastic sheeting.

As time has passed, it has become clear that the biggest challenges are in Indonesia and Sri Lanka. The UN is leading the international humanitarian response, and Britain is supporting the UN co-ordination and logistics effort to improve delivery of assistance. In Indonesia, we have provided equipment to help establish the UN field office in Banda Aceh, plus five helicopters and some vehicles to the UN for use in the Aceh province. We have also provided two experts for its assessment team, two UK emergency teams and three military operations teams, which are working closely with local government and partner nations to assess needs. We also have a range of medium and heavy-lift cargo aircraft—including RAF Hercules and Tristar aircraft, and a number of helicopters—involved in delivering aid to the region. We sent some five flights to Indonesia, carrying almost 4,000 family tents. We are putting together plans for further airlifts, from both Europe and other regions, of relief materials to the region. We are also deploying two fully equipped and manned helicopters from the Gurkha battalion stationed in Brunei.

One of the main challenges in both countries is distributing the massive amount of aid provided. UK forces are playing an important role in this. We are providing significant airlift capacity, including one RAF C-17 plane and five C-130 planes. Two naval vessels—Chatham and Diligence—have been providing assistance off Sri Lanka, together with their Lynx helicopters.

In respect of the money pledged, the first thing is to pay tribute to the remarkable but typical generosity of the British people. Their willingness to contribute—the funds contributed by them now stand at over £100 million—is the best illustration of the British character, and it shows a warmth of spirit and a depth of compassion that have been uplifting, even as we contemplate the tragedy that gave rise to it.

I should set out the Government's contribution so far. In doing so, I should mention that in my conversations with the Presidents of Sri Lanka and of Indonesia—and again this morning with the Indonesian Foreign Minister—all have gone out of their way to express not only their gratitude but their admiration for Britain's response: that of the British people in their own right, and through their Government.

The international pledges now total some £2 billion. The European Union as a whole has already collectively pledged or given €1.5 billion. A meeting of EU Foreign Ministers on Friday agreed to ask the European Investment Bank to consider an Indian Ocean tsunami facility of up to €1 billion. The British Government's contribution is as follows. I have agreed that the Government will increase their pledge to the immediate humanitarian response from £50 million to £75 million, with an additional £25 million from the Treasury's central reserve. None of this, incidentally, has been taken from our existing development programmes. Of this £75 million, around £30 million has already been disbursed to the UN and to the non-governmental organisations. Our share of EU budget money allocated is a further £15 million; gift aid tax relief amounts, roughly, to a further £15 million. We will also make a special donation to offset the VAT on goods sold to raise money for the tsunami appeal, and DFID has offered to pay the cost of air freighting equipment and supplies paid for by donations from the public. Six flights have already departed; another goes tomorrow.

In addition, the G7 is agreeing to an immediate moratorium on debt repayments by afflicted countries, for those that request it, until a full needs assessment is completed. The suspension of debt servicing in 2005 for Indonesia alone will, for Britain, total over £70 million. So all in all, around £200 million of British Government money has already been committed or spent. But as I indicated last week, we still have to await the World Bank's full assessment of the long-term reconstruction needed. In all likelihood, that will require further disbursements. In addition, we will continue to meet any immediate requests for humanitarian assistance. I might add that the provision of so much military equipment also has a cost, which the Government rightly bear.

Long-term reconstruction in Sri Lanka, and especially in Indonesia, leads on to the lessons in respect of the international community's response to any future natural events. First, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development—his Department, like the Foreign Office, has performed in an outstanding way in the past two weeks—has set out in a paper to the UN how he believes that the administration of its response capability can be improved. He will go to New York next month to discuss this issue. Presciently, he first made these suggestions in a speech shortly before Christmas.

Secondly, we need urgent work on early warning systems, and not just in the region affected. The Jakarta conference on Thursday agreed that a regional warning system was needed in that region. The world conference on disaster reduction will consider in Japan later this month how that and other similar needs can be met. In addition, I have asked the Government's chief scientific adviser, Sir David King, to put together a small group of experts to advise me on the mechanisms that could and should be established for the detection and early warning of global natural hazards.

Mr. Speaker, the last two weeks have shown a world in shock, but also in solidarity. It is not just the money given: it is the volunteering to help collect it; the doctors and nurses wanting to go out and help in the region; the experts from every field imaginable clamouring for a chance to serve and to give of their time, energy and expertise.

Later this year, the world will turn its attention not just to a natural disaster, but to one that is man-made—Africa. Daily in that continent, thousands die preventably from conflict, famine and disease. If the domination of that issue on our TV screens is less dramatic, the suffering of human beings is every bit as severe. If we were, as a result of the strength of our sentiment towards the victims of the tsunami, to turn that same sentiment into action on Africa, perhaps those whose faith has been shaken by the monstrous consequences of the event that we have witnessed would have it renewed. There could be no greater good to come out of it.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): I thank the Prime Minister for making the statement and for giving me advance sight of it. Two weeks on, it is still difficult to comprehend the awful and awesome scale of this disaster. There could be no more poignant reminder of how frail and fragile is the human condition and of how tragedy can befall any one of us at any time. Our prayers have been for all those who have lost relatives and friends, and our immense thanks go to everyone who has been working so hard in so many ways to provide help to those who have suffered such loss.

Confronted with a disaster on this scale, it would be natural for people to feel helpless, but from the moment the disaster broke, the British people responded with heartfelt and urgent generosity. Spontaneously, quietly, selflessly and typically, they gave their money and their time to help those in need. That required no Whitehall initiative, no grand scheme and no ministerial diktat. The lead has come from the people, not the politicians. I welcome the very substantial amounts—over and above the £50 million that the Government expect to contribute in aid over the next few weeks—that have been donated.

The Secretary-General of the United Nations has pointed out that, in the past, not all the money pledged by different countries for natural disasters has actually been given. From now on, every country must measure up to its promises. Does the Prime Minister agree that it would be sensible for the United Nations to produce a regular independent audit of the disaster income received and the expenditure made? Will he also now agree to give Parliament a regular report on the amount of British aid pledged and spent?

We also welcome the decision of the financial institutions and broadcasters here not to charge commission on credit card donations, and the Government's decision in respect of VAT. Many of those who have made telephone donations to the disasters emergency committee wish to maximise their generosity and have asked to have their donations gift aided. As things stand, the disasters emergency committee would have to write to every one, requiring hundreds of thousands of letters, which is clearly not the best use of their time or money. The committee has asked to be released from that obligation, so will the Prime Minister act on that request? What is more, people who put money in collection boxes cannot claim gift aid, so will the Government act to ensure that people's spontaneous generosity is not penalised? We also need to make sure that any lessons from this terrible tragedy are learned and shape our future response. Those grieving deserve no less.

Are the Government satisfied that all the diplomatic help that could have been made available was made available—and with the necessary degree of urgency? Can the Prime Minister also tell us how our back-up at home, including our performance in setting up the necessary help lines, compared with that in other countries? How many people were operating the helplines?

Will the Prime Minister tell us whether the civil and military co-operation group set up to help deal with emergencies has yet been deployed to the region and, if so, when? Can he confirm that, in 2001, the group was due to join the Sri Lankans in a training exercise to practise responses to a tsunami but was stopped on grounds of cost? If so, does he agree that that was a false economy?

A number of other countries released estimates within days of the numbers of their nationals who were missing. I realise that this is a difficult decision and judgment. Nevertheless, will the Prime Minister explain the Government's thinking behind the decision not to do so, and their subsequent change of mind?

The British people who have given so generously do not want these shattered communities to be forgotten as soon as the television crews leave. The best way of ensuring that these places are not forgotten is to establish lasting relationships with the area concerned: school to school, church to church, temple to temple, mosque to mosque, community to community. Will the Prime Minister support the setting up of a register of those local authorities who are prepared to join in such a scheme and co-ordinate such efforts?Will he join me in paying tribute to organisations such as Red R, which are already engaged in providing people with technical skills to respond to emergencies around the world?

The Prime Minister is absolutely right to say that while our attention is fixed on the visible catastrophe around the Indian ocean, we should not forget the wider problems of world poverty. It is easy to forget that around the world some 30,000 young children die every day from diseases that are entirely preventable, or that almost 1 billion people live on less than $1 a day.

Britain's presidency of the G8 and of the EU gives us a singular opportunity to help lift people out of poverty by fighting for freer, fairer trade. Does the Prime Minister agree that free and fair trade is the best way to lift people out of poverty? While developed countries give with one hand by providing aid, all too often we take with the other by imposing tariffs.

The earthquake has been a disaster on a global scale. Tectonic plates clashing off the coast of Sumatra led to Britain's worst loss of civilian life since the second world war. Grief has known no boundaries, so why should we still maintain tariff barriers to keep goods out and perpetuate poverty at a time of want? Both the EU and the United States have imposed a tariff on clothes from Sri Lanka. Even since the disaster, new tariffs have been imposed on goods from Thailand. What representation has the Prime Minister made to the EU Trade Commissioner about these tariffs?

Protectionism by developed countries at the expense of the developing world must come to an end. It is both indefensible and immoral. Would not ending it be the most fitting tribute to the generosity of the British people and the most fitting memorial to those who have so tragically lost their lives?

The Prime Minister: First, I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for his response. I shall try to deal with as many of the issues as I can. In respect of the money pledged, those pledges must be followed through and the money given. The UN will provide an update and we will raise that matter with it. I will make sure that Parliament is regularly updated on our contribution, as I have done today.

In respect of gift aid, I met the members of the DEC the other day and they raised the issue with me. The Inland Revenue is looking at this with them to see what help we can give. Obviously we must be careful as we must make sure that the system works in a proper and robust way. However, it is obviously right that they have better things to do than to send out letters.

In respect of Britain by comparison with other countries, I think that we have operated well by comparison with anyone. The best judges of that are those in other countries. In conversations that I have had with the Presidents of other countries and with the United Nations, great tribute has been paid, frankly, to the organisation and work of the Government, as well as to the generosity of the British people. More than 100 people, at the maximum, were, I believe, working in the call centres.

In respect of the emergency teams, they were deployed pretty much straight away. I do not know the answer to the point on the Sri Lankan team for 2001, but I can find out and let the right hon. and learned Gentleman know.

In respect of the numbers of dead and the figures, different countries have dealt with that in different ways. It is a difficult dilemma. Had we put out right at the beginning the overall number of missing—the people in the region—it would have been 7,000. That could have caused quite unnecessary upset and alarm. We waited until we thought we were in a better position, when the numbers had come substantially down.

We shall carry on updating people regularly on the numbers. The interesting thing is that over the past three days, the figure of 443 in category 1 of last Friday—that is, those highly likely to have been involved—has risen by only by 10. It was rising at a far greater rate in the few days before that, when it virtually doubled in a week. I am passing on the advice given me by experts working in the area in saying that there has to be caution even about these figures. There will be people who were in category 1 who have, fortunately and happily, turned up and come out of it. There will be people in category 2—currently there are 871, but that figure is down from more than 2,000 late last week—who will come through. Indeed, the figure may even be different as I stand and speak now.

The difficulty in giving a number is that a lot of caution must be attached to it. I was informed by Home Office research people that in respect of disasters that have happened in this country—for example, rail crashes and so on—there are still significant numbers of people missing some years after the event, although the overwhelming likelihood is that they are all well and alive. For that second category—the 871—we cannot be sure what will happen ultimately because people may remain on that list for a long period, but that does not necessarily mean that they have died in the disaster.

In respect of how people match up with those abroad—school to school, and community to community—I saw for myself in Shipley the other day that people are already doing that. If it can be facilitated through local authorities, that is a sensible suggestion, and Ministers and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister are already looking at that.

In respect of the Red R, I totally agree with the work that it does.

In respect of the G8 and Africa, I agree that free and fair trade is obviously extremely important, and representations have, I understand, already been made, on Friday, about trade tariffs on Thailand. I have to say, though, that I think that all that is about more than simply trade, or indeed aid. The G8 deliberations and the Commission for Africa report on which the Government are working, with other countries and people around the world, will deal with trade, but will also deal specifically with the main killer diseases and with two issues that are not often put properly on the agenda in respect of Africa—conflict resolution and governance. Those matter, too. What is important is to have a comprehensive package to put forward. That package will be backed up: for the coming financial year, the Government have trebled aid to Africa from what it was a few years ago, and that is a major commitment. In my view, however, unless those other issues are dealt with as well, the public will lose heart about whether the money that they are putting into aid is actually going to be properly spent. That is why the measures in relation to conflict resolution and governance will also be a very important part of what we put forward.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West) (LD): I, too, thank the Prime Minister for his detailed statement this afternoon. On behalf of my right hon. and hon. Friends, I extend our complete sympathy and condolences to all those at home and abroad who have lost loved ones on such a colossal scale.

Despite the acres of television coverage over the past two awful weeks, it still seems hard to believe that, on our first day back after less than three weeks away, we should be having these exchanges about such monumental loss of life from such an unpredictable natural catastrophe, which has encompassed so much of the globe in the intervening period. The Prime Minister was surely right that there can be no one in the House who has not had direct contact with constituents, friends or family members who have been caught up in the aftermath of this catastrophe.

One person from my home area, where I have been spending the recess, Mr. David McCallum, was distraught because his son, daughter-in-law and grandson were in Thailand at the time. Initially, he had great difficulty, as did so many, in making contact through the emergency lines. He wanted me to put on record, however, that once those lines were up and running, he found them extremely helpful. I was glad that the Prime Minister went out of his way to pay tribute to those who have been manning those services. Given the scale of the catastrophe, its instantaneous nature and the difficulty of communications due to the destruction of infrastructure, their contribution has been positively heroic. We should all say that clearly.

That heroism has also been matched, as the Prime Minister rightly said, by the instinctive, spontaneous generosity of the British public. I therefore hope that, although the Prime Minister used the phrase "British Government money" in his statement, he would be the first to acknowledge that all British Government money, whether charitable or collected through taxation, is the British public's money, whatever source or means it comes through.

In terms of the lessons that the Prime Minister, the international community and all of us must draw, does he agree that this kind of global catastrophe underlines yet again the need for international responses through international institutions. Some predictable voices elsewhere, not least in north America, have been saying yet again that this is an example of the indolence or incompetence of structures such as the United Nations. Is not the Secretary-General correct to re-emphasise that the United Nations is but the sum of its constituent parts? The emphasis must therefore be to ensure that aid pledged is aid given and that the technological support made available is deployable by the United Nations through its agencies. The challenge to individual member states is to make that institution and others work better for the future.

On the United Nations, the Prime Minister referred rightly to the excellent contribution that the International Development Secretary made in a very considered speech before Christmas. Will one item for the International Development Secretary's New York discussions be the possibility of the UN establishing a well-trained, well-equipped, well-resourced standing rapid reaction disaster relief force, with a view to the future? While not being able to cope instantaneously with any disaster on such a scale, such a force would none the less have a standing infrastructure that could be mobilised more efficiently than is the case with the present more ad hoc approach of individual member states.

In terms of our leadership of the G8, will the Prime Minister agree that this country's response should be viewed not just as Britain in its own right but in terms of the role that we must play in the pivotal chair that we occupy, over this year of all years, against this backdrop? As well as dealing with the aftermath of this disaster, will he also therefore ensure that the agenda that he was rightly putting forward for the British chairmanship of the G8 is not deflected but enhanced as a result of the additional concentration of minds that must take place when we see the natural challenges on us as people?

On the question of money pledged and money delivered, can the Prime Minister say more about putting in place formal tracking systems for aid pledges so that Governments can be held to account? An example that has been cited recently was the last earthquake in Iran where $1 billion was pledged, yet Iran says that only $17.5 million ever found its way directly to the affected area. That is a lamentable reflection on all the countries involved and on the delivery mechanisms.

On debt relief, we very much welcome the Government's pledge to commit £100 million a year to write off debts owed to the UK by the poorest countries. Will that pledge be dependent on the conditionality of previous debt relief measures? Surely the Prime Minister will agree that we must make sure that the money saved through debt relief is used to build basic poverty alleviation systems in the debtor countries. That, too, will be something on which the international community will look to us to give a lead in the G8 during the coming 12 calendar months.

This has been a most hellish and unimaginably grief-stricken period. The grief and grieving will be endless for so many, but what we can do, and what the House of Commons can help to contribute constructively through practical measures, will go some way at least to giving people the sense that their politicians are responding to the most fundamental human needs of all.

The Prime Minister: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his constructive response and ask him to pass on our thanks to Mr. McCallum for his kind words. It is worth pointing out that the maximum number of 999 calls in any day across the whole UK is approximately 25,000 and the centre was receiving 40,000 at its peak. The heroism, as the right hon. Gentleman rightly described it, of the staff everywhere is a tremendous tribute to them.

It is clear, and was clear in the days immediately following the tsunami, that the UN is the proper body to take things forward, and in my conversations with President Bush, he has entirely understood that. In any such situation, people want to make as immediate a response as they possibly can and obviously the United States will be a major player, particularly in respect of Indonesia, in getting help to them, but there is widespread acceptance everywhere that the United Nations is the appropriate body to lead this. That raises the issue of whether it is also the body with the right capability. The points that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development was making in his speech before Christmas are similar to the issue of ensuring that there is a standing capability able to go into action at any point in time. Over the last few years, in our own country, we have established the so-called Cobra process, which allows people to be pulled together quickly. That is not capability that needs to be in a state of constant readiness, but it needs to be able to be deployed in a ready state, if necessary. That is one of the issues that the UN will look at over the time to come.

It is important that we are not deflected from our G8 responsibilities in respect of Africa. Yes, we shall certainly use the G8, as we have set out, to push forward the programme on both Africa and climate change; we have made those two things the centrepiece of our G8 presidency. In the G8, our relationship with both America and the European Union will be immensely important in taking that forward.

On the amount of aid that will be spent, it is interesting that we have already spent £30 million of the £50 million that we immediately allocated; it is now up to £75 million. I think the money will be spent in this case, but it is important that we track it to ensure that.

Finally, on the moratorium on repayments—the servicing of the debt—those things will be looked at in the immediate and longer term at the meeting that will, I understand, take place on 5 February. We will play our full part in those discussions and attempt to put in place a long-term framework that backs up the UN reconstruction efforts.

Donald Anderson (Swansea, East) (Lab): The scale of the disaster is unprecedented in modern times and any comments we now make must be in that context. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the initial misplaced criticisms about the tardiness of our consular services, the jammed switchboards and so on have given way overwhelmingly to admiration by the public, and certainly the travel trade and others, of the quality of the response? Will he also confirm that this is a great opportunity for the United Nations and that he will do all that he can, both as leader of the G8 and, in the second half of the year, in the European Union, to find ways and means of enhancing the status and the co-ordinating role of the United Nations?

The Prime Minister: I agree with both points that my right hon. Friend made. It is also important to pay tribute to some of the companies that have given of their time and effort. There has been a remarkable response right across society—business as well as civic society. Yes, this is a chance for the EU to show its worth and the international will is there for it to do so.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher and Walton) (Con): The Prime Minister was right to talk about the efforts to avoid such a catastrophe in the future. Will he ask Sir David King, the chief scientific adviser, to consider the role of clusters of satellites? From my knowledge of the space industry, I know that it is possible to detect surface heights and changes in sea level. In this case, even with terrestrial warning systems, there probably could have been a 90-minute warning to people to get away from coastal areas. That is an essential way to give confidence to people when they go back to those regions that, next time, they will have a warning.

The Prime Minister: That is a very good point. Sir David King will, of course, look at the role that satellites can play. It is interesting that he informed me that the costs of providing such systems are not prohibitive in any way at all. Although we talk about this as being a natural disaster that was not preventable, some of its consequences undoubtedly would have been preventable if different systems had been in place.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): I am sure that my right hon. Friend would like to join me in recognising the magnificent effort of those in the Tamil community in north-west London, particularly in Colindale and Kingsbury. Last Friday, they loaded three full containers with aid—food, medicines, equipment and clothing—to send to Sri Lanka. Will he look into their fears that aid to Sri Lanka is not being distributed equitably—concerns that were exacerbated by the decision not to allow Kofi Annan to visit the badly hit Tamil areas during his recent trip to Sri Lanka?

The Prime Minister: I think that there will be a lot of concerns: once people have given, they will want to know that what they have given will be properly used. Our best estimate at the moment is that, obviously, issues will arise in the rush to get aid out, but we are satisfied that the aid is getting to the people who need it. We believe that, even in those areas of Sri Lanka that my hon. Friend described, everything possible is being done by the Sri Lankan Government and others.

Sir John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West) (Con): Does the Prime Minister recognise that many people in this country have families and relatives in the affected countries, some of whom would like to go out to assist in the reconstruction effort and to comfort their families but cannot because of the immigration regulations? For example, Mr. Sasikumar, who is from Sri Lanka, lives in my constituency and is a hard-working newsagent. He has been in this country for six years and was granted political asylum. His application for British citizenship was submitted over a year ago, but it has yet to be determined, thus preventing him from going out to comfort his mother and family, as his father was killed. Is it possible that cases of that type, where there are compassionate grounds, could be fast-tracked?

The Prime Minister: I can certainly look into that, since I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's constituent will not be the only one in that position, although there may be complications as he is an asylum seeker. I will certainly look into that and let the hon. Gentleman know.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend) (Lab): I thank my right hon. Friend for the very full statement that he has made to us this afternoon. May I underscore, from my own contacts with the Indonesian embassy, how in their grief, they have been much comforted by both the positive response of the Government and that of the people of the United Kingdom to the disaster in the Indian ocean? Although there have been immense difficulties in distributing aid in Banda Aceh, it is now beginning to get out, and the British Government have been very positive in the help that they have given there. However, in the medium to long-term, could the House have a quarterly report on progress on reconstruction, debt relief and tariff barrier changes, not just for Indonesia but for the other affected areas, because, for most of us, the disaster is beyond our comprehension?

The Prime Minister: I assure my hon. Friend that we will make sure that the House is regularly updated on those and other issues.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): In his statement, the Prime Minister paid tribute to the work of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, and what he said struck a chord in the House, but does he accept that that generosity of view may not be shared by those of our constituents who tried to get through to the call centre immediately after the disaster? I cannot be unique in having a constituent who lost a member of his family and who for two whole days was unable to get through. When he got through to Bangkok, his query was referred back to London, then to Hendon and then to Glasgow. Does the Prime Minister think that we did as well as we could have done, and if he does not, will he take steps to ensure that, the next time there is a disaster, it is easier for distressed people to talk to another human being, instead of getting the engaged tone or a recorded message?

The Prime Minister: I am very sorry about what happened to the right hon. Gentleman's constituent. Obviously, we will look at the lessons that can be learned about the rapidity of our response in such situations. On the whole, I think that those involved got it going about as fast as is humanly possible. As I said, the pressure in the first few days was enormous. I know that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will look carefully at what lessons can be learned for the future.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): I too lost a constituent in this terrible tragedy. I was interested in my right hon. Friend's comment in respect of Sir David King's activity. Will my right hon. Friend ensure that Sir David's remit is sufficiently wide not just to cover issues of response and so on, but to help in the reconstruction of the science base in the countries affected, because they need at an indigenous level as much support as possible to build the mechanisms necessary to stop such events happening again?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend makes a very good point. I will certainly make sure that Sir David's recommendations take account of that. There is also the issue of ensuring that all the scientific expertise in the world—some of it most prominently in this country—is put at the disposal of those countries, so that they can use it to put in place the requisite warning systems.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): I apologise to the House for being late, but weather conditions in Northern Ireland are not favourable at the moment and the plane was delayed. I listened to the Prime Minister on the radio while coming in and heard the contributions made. I pay tribute to the generosity of our people across the United Kingdom, especially the Ulster people who themselves have been through great difficulties but have been most generous.

I have a connection with a church in south India of some 2,000 members. Eight hundred and fifty of them were killed in this terrible tragedy. The church needs to help the many, many children who were orphaned or who cannot be traced to any home in the community. I would like the Prime Minister to keep that in mind and to see that money for orphans will be made available in those areas. This will be an ongoing situation, and needs all the help that we can provide.

The Prime Minister: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is right in what he said. As one part of the work that we are doing, and doing with the United Nations and the aid agencies concerned, we will continue to look particularly at the plight of children who have been orphaned. I hope that he will allow me through him to pass on our deep condolences to those in the village where so many people died in this terrible disaster.

Claire Ward (Watford) (Lab): May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to a letter that he will have received last week from Alison Warner of Abbots Langley neighbourhood watch which sets out what they are doing to raise funds and proposes a more formal link between villages and towns in this country and many of those overseas that have been hit? Will he also consider how people in this country with skills that are much needed in the areas hit by the disaster can be helped to take part in voluntary schemes, so that they can go overseas and assist wherever possible?

The Prime Minister: I congratulate my hon. Friend's constituents who have come together with such speed and generosity to help link up with those affected by the disaster. One of the things that we are discussing with the NGOs and aid agencies that are most active in the area is how we can facilitate volunteering. We will look at that, too. Many, many people—we have been inundated with calls—have expertise in particular areas and want to use that in the countries concerned.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): One reason why people have been so generous in giving is probably the graphic nature of the pictures that have been sent back. I should like to think that the Prime Minister would join me in paying tribute to those brave reporters who have brought the pictures and radio stories back under very difficult circumstances. We criticise them often enough. Just occasionally perhaps we should recognise that they have done a good job.

Part of that generosity has been gifts in goods. We know that dry goods, medicines and household goods such as soaps and toiletries are in warehouses around the country, waiting to be shipped. It has been indicated that they will be shipped only on demand. Will the Prime Minister ensure that at the very least the goods are collected and collated, and if not shipped immediately, then shipped as and when appropriate?

The Prime Minister: We are working closely with the aid agencies on that and obviously we have agreed to pay the costs of transporting to those areas. Although a lot of goods and items will have accumulated, given the normal speed of operations in such circumstances, things are being moved. However, we will ensure that everything possible is done to get them out to the areas that need them as quickly as possible.

In respect of the media coverage, I agree with the hon. Gentleman. It has in many ways been remarkable.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby) (Lab): May I say how grateful we all are that the Government responded so speedily to this crisis? To a large extent, they have led the way.

I appreciated receiving a letter of 31 December from my right hon. Friends the International Development Secretary and the Foreign Secretary. However, one paragraph of it concerns me, and I should like the Prime Minister to assure me on it. It says:

> "The FCO has established a package of assistance to be provided on a case by case basis to those who would otherwise not have the means to meet costs associated with the death or serious injury of a British national."

I hope that there will be no means-testing of assistance. Whether a victim was a millionaire or is from a family on a moderate income, equal assistance should be given. There should be no question of adding financial problems to the trauma that those people have already gone through.

The Prime Minister: There will be no question of adding any financial burdens to those families. That would obviously be wrong. I thank my hon. Friend, though, for his tribute to DFID and the Foreign Office. Indeed, tribute should also be paid to the Deputy Prime Minister for his co-ordinating work.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): On behalf of Plaid Cymru and the Scottish National party, may I fully associate myself with the Prime Minister's expressions of condolence and also the expressions of gratitude for those out in the field who are trying to relieve the situation?

I am pleased to hear that further Government aid will not be drawn from existing development or aid budgets. Can I have the right hon. Gentleman's assurance that there will be no case for that to happen at any stage? May I respectfully ask him to consider supporting the initiative of the Scottish National party and Plaid Cymru that every Member should donate a day's pay to the relief effort?

The Prime Minister: I think that donations are a matter for individual Members, but I would be surprised if most hon. Members had not contributed in some way.

In respect of aid, we have made it clear that our aid programme—I single out Africa in particular—should not be prejudiced as a result of this relief programme. As I said, we will have made a significant contribution when all the different bits of the aid are added up, including the relief from the service repayments on the debt. As I said earlier last week, it will probably amount to several hundreds of millions of pounds.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): One of the hardest things facing many UK families at this time is the waiting and the uncertainty of not knowing whether they will receive news of the death of a loved one or the good news that a loved one has been found. That is the case for the family of my constituent, Kevin Barnett, who are waiting for news of their son, who has been moved up to category 1. What can my right hon. Friend do to assure the family not only that every resource is being deployed to identify those who are missing but that, should any more resources be needed, they will be deployed? Finally, will he join me in commending the work of the liaison officers, who have been such a crutch for many families at this time?

The Prime Minister: I express my sympathy to my hon. Friend's constituents, who will be having an absolutely hellish time. We all feel for them. I thank him for his kind words about the family liaison officers. They have been extremely valuable to people and have worked very hard. I can assure my hon. Friend that we will do everything that we can in terms of any resources that are needed. I should say that the British forensic experts working in the region with those of many other countries have been doing a marvellous job in distressing and difficult circumstances.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): Further to the answer that the Prime Minister gave to the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) about Sri Lanka, what assurances has he sought and received directly from President Kumaratunga that aid will be given to all stricken communities, including those in the north and east of the island? If he receives evidence that the Colombo Government are falling short of fulfilling their humanitarian responsibilities, will he ensure that the British Government follow the lead of the Italian, Danish and Norwegian Governments and freight aid direct to those communities, even in Tamil-led and Tamil-controlled areas?

The Prime Minister: The Sri Lankan Government have given that assurance very strongly, and they repeated it in Jakarta on Thursday. We will make sure that that is held to. We have to look at the best way of getting aid out to people. Normally, that will be working through the Government concerned, but it is important that aid gets to every part of Sri Lanka, and I can assure the hon. Gentleman that we will do everything that we can to facilitate that.

Ann McKechin (Glasgow, Maryhill) (Lab): May I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement and the Government's rapid support for a moratorium on debt repayments, which will probably be the greatest help to the victims at the end of the day? Given the scale of the disaster and how long it is likely to be before reconstruction work can be completed, does he agree that there should be an independent assessment of how sustainable debt now is for the affected countries, and does he agree that unsustainable debt should be cancelled?

The Prime Minister: That is precisely what the conference on 5 February will examine and the World Bank will by then have produced its report on the reconstruction effort needed in Indonesia in particular.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): Following the comments of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Ann McKechin), I think that the whole House would hope to see debt cancellation, wherever possible, rather than a debt moratorium. Will the Prime Minister confirm that it is not just a case of Africa or Asia but that what we are all looking for in the G8 year is a strategy for the whole of the developing world? Will he confirm also that, during 2005, the wealthy nations of the world have somehow to work out how we find the extra $50 billion a year for the next 10 years that is required if we are to have any hope of meeting the millennium development goals by 2015?

The Prime Minister: On the latter point, that is precisely what we are doing. We are trying to mobilise international support behind what would be a G8 plan. We have to consider debt cancellation very carefully because it is important to realise that some countries do not want that. It is important also that we are careful for the future about what messages we are sending out. We need to examine the issue with care, but I have said that we will do whatever we can to help these countries. It is interesting that some countries have already indicated that they would prefer a different means of help.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): Given the British public's magnificent response and the important points that my right hon. Friend made at the end of his statement about the links with poverty in Africa and elsewhere, should not the Government take the high ground in these matters? I am not complaining about what is being done, but more can always be done in these circumstances. Ideas such as the Tobin tax, a ring-fenced increase in higher levels of income taxation and the United Nations aid target of 0.7 per cent. of gross national product could then be things that we consider delivering in this year in which we are supposed to be making poverty history.

The Prime Minister: It is important that we occupy the high ground, although we must be sure that it is firm as well as high. We as a Government have set out for the first time how we can meet the UN's 0.7 per cent. GNP objective. The international finance facility that we have proposed is one way to raise that money and trebling our aid to Africa is also important. However, we must make sure that any measures that we take ultimately help the international economy and do not hinder it, which is why we must consider some of the proposals with a certain amount of care.

Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes) (Con): Is the Prime Minister aware of an initiative being launched in the House of Commons on Wednesday after Prime Minister's questions, when a House of Commons all-party group will draw attention to the need for increased consumption in this country of Sri Lankan fish, with fish being specially flown over for the occasion? It will also raise funds for Sri Lanka's decimated fishing fleet—10,000 to 20,000 boats have been lost. Money can be raised for individual boats, with the boats named after the donors. Will he give that initiative—nicknamed "fish and ships"—his imprimatur?

The Prime Minister: I am happy to do that, and I understand that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary is to attend the meeting.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): As one who has total confidence in Sir David King as Government chief scientific adviser, may I ask whether we are absolutely sure whether hazard protection is best achieved on a national, rather than an international, basis? What are the terms of reference of Sir David King and his group of experts and what is the time scale for their report?

The Prime Minister: I am pleased to see my hon. Friend back in his place again. To answer his question about terms of reference, because some of the experts on the subject are here in this country, I have told David King to bring them together so that we can make proposals, probably to the United Nations, in a reasonably informal way. I think that much of the work will be done at international, rather than national, level and that the UN will be able to lead it. What I thought was interesting about the presentation that Sir David gave me the other day was that he did not feel that the costs would be that great—in other words, the precautionary cost would be quite small, given the extraordinary cost of the disaster that has occurred.

Points of Order

4.32 pm

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will recall that during Defence questions today the Secretary of State for Defence, responding to the second question, took it upon himself to make a substantive announcement about the deployment of more troops to Iraq. You witnessed the reaction on the Opposition Benches and the silence on the Government Benches. No formal notice was given in the question asked, which was about post-war reconstruction, not troop deployment, nor did the right hon. Gentleman ask to make a statement, even though in the past the matter would have merited a full statement. The only notice that the House had was the shamelessly trailed information in the media over the weekend.

I seek your advice, Mr. Speaker. On an issue of such importance, the practice of the House has been that notice is given of a statement, and a detailed statement is made, in response to which hon. Members are entitled to ask detailed questions. On this occasion, we understand that an extra 650 troops are to be deployed to Iraq, but we have no further details of their objectives or their location. That is unsatisfactory—[Interruption.] Someone is saying that we are in favour of it; we probably will be, but how can we know until we know the details of what the Government are proposing? Unless we have your protection in these matters, the Government will increasingly get away with slipping out such information, showing disgraceful contempt not only for the House but for the soldiers and their families.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for raising that point of order with me, the custodian of the rules of the House of Commons. The Secretary of State was in order. There was no abuse of the rules.

I point out that of the first 10 questions to the Secretary of State for Defence, six were related to Iraq. The purpose of parliamentary questions and Question Time is to allow hon. Members, especially Opposition Members, to draw information from Ministers, and they had at least six opportunities to do so.

The rules are for me to enforce. I repeat: the Secretary of State for Defence was in order and there was no abuse of the rules of the House.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. When the Secretary of State made his statement in response to Question 2, only two Labour Members rose to ask supplementary questions. You, Mr. Speaker, showing exquisite balance throughout the subsequent supplementary questions, called the same number of Opposition Members as Government Members. On such occasions, would it be appropriate, when there are many Opposition Members seeking to question the Government, for the balance to be suspended, to enable the Secretary of State properly to be held to account?

Mr. Speaker: Sometimes the hon. Gentleman observes things that suit his case and does not observe things that do not. He may have noticed that the Opposition Front Bench, at short notice, was able to ask two supplementary questions. I say that because it was the intention of the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman to seek to ask a supplementary question on another question. To ensure that there would be a fairer number of questions coming from Opposition Members, I allowed the privilege to be given at short notice.

I do not wish to pursue this matter. I have made a ruling.

Orders of the Day

Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. Speaker: I inform the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

4.37 pm

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The central purpose of the Bill is to improve the local environment, which directly affects people's quality of life. In my Department's five-year strategy, which we published last month, I set out our key objective of achieving environmental leadership. That is at the heart of our international agenda, but care for the environment begins at home.

When asked what is most important to them about the environment, most people mention the state of their own neighbourhood. That is not to say that there is not general concern about instances or levels of pollution, or concern about environmental hazards. When asked whether they have anxieties about the environment, the vast majority of our fellow citizens answer yes, but go on to talk about their locality, and especially about comparatively small-scale defacement of streets and parks, about run-down and decaying areas and about litter and dumping, over which it appears to them that no one takes action and no one cares.

Contrary to the reasoned amendment, that concern is felt and expressed just as much in rural areas as in urban areas. I was surprised to learn from their amendment that the Opposition appear to be so little in touch with concerns in rural areas as not to realise that.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): Are those concerns reflected by the generously endowed Labour Benches this afternoon, with Labour Members representing rural and urban areas, compared with the sparse attendance by Opposition Members?

Margaret Beckett: My hon. Friend is right to remind the House that there are about 180 Labour Members in rural and semi-rural constituencies. I have long believed that this was in notable part due to the fact that people living in those areas felt that their concerns were not understood. They feel that their concerns are better understood now. He is right to point out that that feeling is reflected in the Chamber.

If we are to create a genuinely sustainable society, we must tackle the more local aspects of environmental degradation and damage as well as dealing with our contribution to global warming. The Bill is an integral part of our environmental strategy. It is also an integral part of the Government's strategy for dealing with antisocial behaviour. The damage done to the community by such behaviour is clear: dirty streets, burned-out cars and piles of fly-tipped rubbish have a self-evident effect. What may be less immediately obvious is the financial aspect of such damage. It costs local authorities and other agencies, and thereby the taxpayer, more than £3 billion a year. The greater and, in some ways, more damaging costs may be hidden, as they are not evident in the physical appearance of our streets and neighbourhoods or in any effect on council tax or other bills. That greater cost lies in the contribution of such behaviour and of the attitudes behind it to wider criminal behaviour and to making a community feel neglected, powerless, unsafe and insecure.

The Labour party has long taken the lead in identifying and tackling that complex continuum of behaviour, which ranges from comparatively low-level environmental offences such as dropping litter and fly-posting to spraying graffiti, vandalism and more serious crimes. To deal with crime effectively, we have increasingly recognised the need to tackle the full range of criminal and antisocial behaviour. It is essential that we do not ignore low-level offences and allow a degraded local environment to give both victims and offenders the message that antisocial behaviour does not matter.

The measures in the Bill should help all those involved in local communities, rural as well as urban, to create neighbourhoods in which people are happy to live—cleaner, safer and greener communities. That means clean and safe streets, well-designed public buildings and spaces, welcoming parks and village greens, and a countryside free of fly-tipped waste. All those contribute to people's sense of well-being and to their overall health. The purpose of the Bill is to contribute to people's quality of life. Our belief that it will do so is based on extensive consultations led by my Department over the past two years, including our "Clean Neighbourhoods" consultation last summer, which aimed first to identify the problems and then to explore the solutions.

Derek Conway (Old Bexley and Sidcup) (Con): On the issue of consultation, the Secretary of State may be aware that dog welfare organisations such as the Dogs Trust, the Kennel Club and so on—I shall not list them all, but no doubt they have contacted the Department—are concerned about the proposals for stray dogs in clause 68. What consultation has she or her colleagues had with the representative bodies of animal welfare charities that deal with stray dogs? I am sure that her intentions are good, but we would like to know what they have said to her.

Margaret Beckett: There has been general and wide consultation on the issue, but if the hon. Gentleman will bear with me I shall say a little more about dogs later.

The measures in this Bill respond directly to what local authorities and others told us in the consultation about obstacles to the enforcement of existing legislation, why some provisions are difficult to use, and about the changes that are needed if authorities are to tackle antisocial behaviour and environmental problems effectively. The Bill gives them the new powers and better tools for which they asked. It also gives new powers to parish councils so that the most local level of our democratic structures can play a part in making things better. Again, that recognises that there are problems in rural areas and that the best chance of tackling them is to empower parish councils to act in their own locality.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend has just mentioned an important part of the Bill, in which I declare an interest as a town councillor. Does she agree that it is wrong to regard the problem as either rural or urban, because waste goes from one area to another, usually, but not always, from urban to rural areas on the outskirts of larger cities? We must therefore tackle the problem overall, and does she agree that one way of doing so is by looking at the first tier of local government?

Margaret Beckett: Yes, I do. The issue that my hon. Friend and others have identified reflects the concerns of their contacts in local communities. Within the farming community, for example, there is widespread concern about the impact of some of those problems, and he is mindful of that.

The Bill requires crime and disorder reduction partnerships to tackle environmental crime where it is a priority in their area. That is something that the best partnerships are already doing, but others have been slower to recognise the evidence of the impact of such crime and to take action.

I should say at once that we do not want to be prescriptive about the strategies that those partnerships are required to develop. Where environmental crime is not much of a problem, we do not demand that it feature in a strategy—the whole point of the partnership approach set out in the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 is to tackle offending as it affects individual communities—but where local environments are degraded, and especially where antisocial behaviour has taken root, we do expect local partnerships to tackle the problem robustly. Our approach, which has been strongly endorsed by senior police representatives, should ensure that local partnerships consider all the issues leading to crime and disorder in their communities, including environmental crime. To help them do so, we have drawn on the results of our consultation to give greater powers and greater flexibility to authorities and agencies to tackle such problems.

For example, alleyways giving rear access to properties are common in our towns and cities. Sadly, many provide opportunities for crime and are a magnet for antisocial behaviour. We plan to address the problem of nuisance alleyways by enabling local authorities to gate them more easily. This will allow local authorities for the first time to gate all alleyways that provide a haven for crime and antisocial behaviour, but it will also allow greater flexibility to make gating reversible, should local conditions improve or local needs change.

Ms Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is a problem in respect of unadopted alleyways? As the Bill goes through Committee, will she consider whether additional funding can be found to ensure that unadopted alleyways are adopted, so that they can be dealt with under the new legislation?

Margaret Beckett: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point, which I am sure will be explored in Committee. Hitherto the major problem that has arisen in connection with gating alleyways has been access, and access legislation. That is what we are striving to overcome by means of the Bill.

Nuisance and abandoned vehicles often blight urban and rural communities alike. The Government intend to secure a major reduction in their number. The continuous registration scheme launched last year has resulted in a 65 per cent. reduction in the number of untaxed vehicles, and there has been a 30 per cent. reduction, for example, in abandoned vehicles in Kent following the national launch of Operation Cubit, which is a partnership between the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency, local authorities and the police and fire service to speed up the disposal of abandoned vehicles.

The Bill will also contribute to the Government's nuisance vehicle strategy, strengthening the existing powers of local authorities to remove abandoned vehicles from the streets and enabling them for the first time to do so as soon as an abandoned vehicle is identified. This should significantly reduce opportunities for arson and vandalism. Deliberate arson of motor vehicles costs some £230 million pounds a year. Common sense alone suggests that most of them are likely to be abandoned vehicles, so speedier removal should help to cut costs and reduce incidents that are both a nuisance and a danger.

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion) (PC): I welcome the Bill, and especially this part, which will be of great assistance to many in my constituency. May I ask the Secretary of State two questions about this part? First, has she responded to the recommendation from the Environmental Audit Committee that local authorities should have ease of access to the DVLA database to identify the owners of abandoned vehicles? That was a key recommendation, to which the Government have not yet responded. The Bill is an opportunity to deliver it. Secondly, although I welcome the extension of getting rid of vehicles from streets to areas to which the public have access, one of the problems in my area is vehicles abandoned on farmland, which become the responsibility of the farmer. What does the Bill have to say about that?

Margaret Beckett: Both the issues that the hon. Gentleman has raised might be best explored in Committee. I take his point about the database. There has been some discussion about whether and to what extent access creates a problem, but we believe that the powers that we are giving will assist local authorities. If, when the Bill is explored in Committee, there is any suggestion—and evidence to back it up—that it is defective in some way, we will look into that. We discussed fly-tipping in rural communities earlier, and I am well aware that, as the hon. Gentleman says, abandoned vehicles are also a problem in some parts of the country.

Huw Irranca-Davies (Ogmore) (Lab): Last year, tragically, a youngster was killed in an abandoned vehicle on unfenced private property in my constituency. If during the Bill's progress a way could be found of giving councils authority to enter such land to remove dangerous vehicles, it would be a great comfort to the family who lost their son so tragically.

Margaret Beckett: My hon. Friend has made an interesting point, which I am sure will be explored in Committee. Obviously there are problems with authorities' going on to private land without permission, but I take his point—as I am sure all Members do—about the problems that can be caused in certain localities, and the dangers to children.

The Bill allows authorities to tackle a not uncommon neighbourhood problem by making it an offence to repair or sell a vehicle on a road as part of a business. It will also make dealing with offenders more cost-effective, securing better value for money for the taxpayer. It is both expensive and time-consuming for local authorities to have to prosecute offenders through the courts, and their full costs are often not recovered even in the case of successful prosecutions. We are told that that is one key reason why authorities can be reluctant to prosecute for environmental crimes. To allow and encourage better enforcement, the Bill significantly increases the number of offences for which fixed penalties can be used as an alternative to prosecution.

The Bill makes a number of other changes that should promote enforcement. In particular, for the first time local authorities will be able to retain all receipts from fixed penalties. That too will help to offset the cost of enforcing the legislation. It must be right for offenders, rather than council tax payers, to bear the impact of such costs whenever possible.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): As my right hon. Friend will know, local authorities were first granted powers to retain receipts from fines by the Local Government Act 2003. Is she disappointed that, more than a year later, so many authorities have not taken up those powers? According to information from her Department, only 76 of 359 authorities have exercised them. Has she a message for those authorities?

Margaret Beckett: As my hon. Friend says, some authorities have used those powers well while others have been reluctant to do so. As I have said, there has been extensive consultation with authorities. That is part of the Bill's message. Although there are aspects that Members will want to discuss in Committee, we have done as much as we feel we can to address the major concerns of authorities, and to make it possible for them to use these powers to tackle problems that cause such distress in their communities. Having made the powers available, we hope and expect that authorities will use them when such problems arise.

Mrs. Cheryl Gillan (Chesham and Amersham) (Con): Will any part of the Bill give powers to the taxpayer? A constituent of mine wants a local authority to restrict the hours during which a playing field abutting his property is used. The noise from the playing field is making him ill and he is starting to become very distressed, but he cannot persuade the local authority to close the field during the evenings. What comeback is possible for the ordinary taxpayer when a local authority will not exercise its powers?

Margaret Beckett: I should have thought that existing powers could be used if the noise and difficulty were considered to be so great, but other powers in the Bill relate to noise, and it may be possible to explore the issue as the Bill proceeds.

I said a moment ago that local authorities would be able to retain the receipts from fixed penalties. Another important point is that in most cases they will be able to vary the amount of penalties to reflect local conditions. There will also be a power in all cases to offer discounts for early payment. Again, therefore, we have tried not just to incentivise enforcement but to give authorities much greater flexibility to shape their enforcement policy to what they judge to be local needs. To go back to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard), that will remove the excuse, if one may put it that way, for not using such powers, because local authorities will have much more flexibility to shape policy to local circumstances.

In the same vein, reflecting the desire for local solutions to local problems, we are extending the power to issue fixed penalty notices to parish and town councils and to the equivalent community councils in Wales. Those notices will cover a range of offences relating to litter, graffiti, fly-posting and dogs, all of which can degrade neighbourhoods.

Parish councils may often be best placed to deal with those essentially local problems. We recognise that not all parish councils will want or be able to take advantage of those powers, but others will welcome them and already have the necessary skills and resources. Extending powers to issue fixed penalty notices will strengthen the ability of local communities to deal with those problems. Parish councils, representing as they do our most local level of government, are often best placed to understand both the causes and the needs of the victims of such crimes.

Everywhere, litter is a growing problem, and the Bill contains a range of measures to help to tackle it. Under current law, littering on a footpath is an offence but littering in a private garden or in a river is not. We will close that loophole by making it an offence to drop litter anywhere, including on private land and rivers, lakes and ponds. That will make it clear once and for all that dropping litter anywhere is unacceptable.

All hon. Members will probably be familiar with the particular problem of littering on patches of open land. We will give local authorities a new power to require the owner or occupier of land that is heavily defaced with litter to clear it and to prevent it from becoming heavily littered again. That will replace the current system of litter control areas, which local authorities tell us they find burdensome, which they rarely use and which applies only to specific types of land.

Mark Tami (Alyn and Deeside) (Lab): My right hon. Friend mentioned fly-tipping. Does she accept that there is a particular problem with gas cylinders? Industry and shops no longer accept rival brands of cylinders. Not only are they dumped in rural locations but they are left in abandoned buildings, which could cause a particular threat to our fire service should a fire happen in that building.

Margaret Beckett: My hon. Friend rightly highlights a specific problem. I must admit that it has not been raised with me specifically, but I take his point entirely and I hope that the powers that we are giving will enable it to be dealt with.

On the streets, litter control notices can help in dealing with litter generated by businesses such as fast food outlets. However, they, too, are difficult to enforce, with local authorities currently required to seek a court order. We will dispense with that step to make such notices easier to use.

We will also give local authorities new powers to control the distribution of flyers and leaflets, both of which can contribute to street litter, although I say at once to ease anyone's anxiety that political leafleting will not be affected. The Bill confirms once and for all that discarded cigarette butts and chewing gum are litter, and that it is an offence to discard them in the street. That makes the law explicit and should remove any lingering doubts, whether among local authorities or others.

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): Does my right hon. Friend share my surprise about the reference in the amendment to the need to make producers more responsible, and does she welcome, as I do, the industry's steps to approach her Department to show at an early stage how it could play a role in this matter?

Margaret Beckett: As my hon. Friend may be aware, there has been extensive discussion between the industry and Ministers. I believe my right hon. Friend the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality will shortly visit one of the major companies. We are mindful of the need, as are the producers, as she rightly says, to engage in the discussions.

Graffiti often degrades our communities and is often the result of young people using spray paints illegally. The Bill tries to reduce the problem at source by reinforcing existing legislation banning their sale to those aged under 16, and it will also make it easier to prosecute retailers who sell spray paints to that age group. The provisions are in addition to the provision in the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003 that addresses the removal of graffiti in public spaces through graffiti removal notices. The Bill will extend that to cover fly-posting—another highly visible blight on our communities. As the Environmental Audit Committee pointed out in its report, the problem of fly-posting might be exacerbated by its potential commercial advantage in terms of low-cost event advertising. To help local authorities deal more effectively with illegally displayed advertisements, we are making it more difficult for those who benefit from such illegal advertising to avoid charges simply by claiming that they did not consent to it. We will also make it easier for local authorities to recover the cost of removing fly-posters.

Of course, the issue of waste goes beyond simple littering and fly-posting, as a number of interventions have highlighted. The illegal disposal of waste—fly-tipping—is a real problem in both town and countryside. As well as degrading the local area, it can have environmental and health risks, so we are also providing a range of measures to strengthen the legislation on, and penalties for, fly-tipping. That will enable the Environment Agency and local authorities to deal more effectively, and immediately, with those responsible. We intend to send out a clear message that this is a serious environmental crime that will not be tolerated.

The Bill will make it more difficult for those who transport waste illegally to evade the law. The circumstances in which enforcement agencies can currently stop, search and seize vehicles that could be involved in fly-tipping are somewhat limited, so we will widen and simplify their powers to do so. We will strengthen the courts' powers to deal with fly-tippers by raising the maximum penalty in a magistrates court to £50,000, and by harmonising the penalties for fly-tipping hazardous and non-hazardous waste to a maximum of five years in prison and/or an unlimited fine. The courts will also get additional sentencing powers.

The Bill contains a number of other provisions relating to waste that will help local authorities to carry out their waste management obligations more effectively. For example, they will be given the power to issue a fixed penalty notice for waste left out on the streets, provided that they have previously given clear instructions on the arrangements for waste collection.

Finally on waste, we will reform the recycling credit scheme, the original purpose of which was to encourage local authorities to recycle household waste. The scheme does not sit comfortably with the newer economic and regulatory measures that we have put in place to promote recycling and re-use. Reform of it will allow local authorities to agree alternative ways of encouraging recycling, as fit best with local circumstances. That increased flexibility will itself contribute to sustainable waste management, and will promote better working between waste authorities, the community and businesses. It ties in well with the announcement in our five-year plan of novel ways to increase recycling through a major new retailer recycling initiative in conjunction with supermarkets, which will be launched this year; and with a Waste and Resources Action Programme project to pilot, in conjunction with supermarkets, new approaches such as financial incentives, discount vouchers and new technology. Recycling has already more than doubled since 1996–97, and we are working hard with local authorities and other partners to build on that.

The Bill contains new arrangements for controlling dogs, replacing the current dog byelaw system. They give district and parish councils greater freedom of action through new powers that will be simpler and easier to use, without the need for central Government confirmation. They also give local authorities full responsibility for dealing with strays, in order to relieve—at their request—pressure on the police.

We are doing more to deal with the other nuisances that can make people's daily lives a misery. Nuisance caused by noise can be a major problem for those who live nearby. New measures for dealing with noise from malfunctioning burglar alarms, and from pubs and clubs at night, will help to alleviate these common disturbances. We are also extending the statutory nuisance regime to include two further nuisances that can degrade local quality of life: artificial light and nuisance from insects, both of which have given rise to public demand for greater action. Over-bright and badly sited security and other lighting can cause real problems for those who live nearby, and insect infestations attracted by activities such as sewage treatment works make local people's lives a real misery in certain locations. I pay tribute to my hon. Friends the Members for Brentford and Isleworth (Ann Keen) and for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy) for repeatedly bringing these issues to my ministerial team's attention as a result of their constituency experience, and for working with us on this issue. The changes that we are proposing will enable local authorities to intervene. While we hope that most disputes will then be resolved through mediation, legal action will be made possible in the last resort.

The Bill puts the Commission for Architecture and the Built Environment on a statutory basis. Its establishment as a private company was an interim measure, but one that left it outside the ambit of the Comptroller and Auditor General. The commission's role will be unaffected—it is not a new quango—but its accountability to Parliament will be enhanced.

The Bill will play a major role in the Government's strategy for improving the environment, for developing a more sustainable future and for dealing with more of the antisocial behaviour that can blight communities. It builds on the measures in the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 and the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003 and responds to calls by local authorities and others for practical tools that they can use to promote cleaner, safer, greener communities.

Few things contribute more to a feeling of powerlessness and disaffection in local communities than the persistence of sometimes relatively small-scale but distressing problems that no one seems willing or able to address. If, as our consultation suggests, the powers, flexibility and localised focus of the measures in the Bill will help to ensure that such issues are addressed, it will mean, for many of our fellow citizens, a real improvement in their quality of life. I commend the Bill to the House.

5.6 pm

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): I beg to move,

That this House declines to give the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill a Second Reading because the Bill focuses predominantly on urban issues while neglecting rural areas, creates another unnecessary quango and brings local authorities into conflict with police and other authorities which currently exercise powers in relation to abandoned vehicles and stray dogs; because the Bill introduces provisions, such as clearing up chewing gum as extensively and frequently as litter, which will be prohibitively expensive yet fail to take account of producer responsibility; and because the Bill contains many unnecessary provisions which would not be needed if existing legislation were properly enforced.

I begin by welcoming the Government's recognition of the growing threats to our environment. Part of the threat exists at the global level in terms of challenges such as climate change—an issue on which, so far, the Government's response appears to be all talk. The floods experienced in the north-west over the weekend are an example of the damage that climate change can cause locally, but we are not even hearing any talk from Ministers—not in Parliament, at least—about that.

I also accept that part of the threat to the environment is indeed evident at local level. I agree with the Secretary of State that many of the issues that matter deeply to a great many families and individuals throughout the country relate to what is going on in their immediate environment. The consequences of more litter, fly-tipping, graffiti, fly-posting, abandoned cars and so forth mean that more and more people are suffering from dirty streets, which can turn into run-down neighbourhoods and then to an increase in antisocial behaviour. Those consequences are part of our daily lives.

The threats to both the global and the local environment are important and both need action by the Government. Sadly, although they have begun to admit to the existence of the problem, all the Government have managed to do in this Bill is to cobble together a hotch-potch of measures, some of which are incoherent. Some may be individually useful, but in many cases, local authorities may struggle to enforce them. Many would not be needed at all if existing powers were being properly utilised and if other aspects of Government policy were designed to address the problems that have been identified.

A great many reports have confirmed the often depressing day-to-day experience of most city dwellers and of many who live in the countryside—the ugly intrusion into our lives and the degradation of our environment caused by careless attitudes towards the disposal of unwanted items, whether it be chewing gum, old cars or many other items. Another cause is the lack of respect for both the built and the natural environment and for property that does not belong to any particular individual. Increasingly, too, we suffer from noise and light pollution—forms of environmental damage that can be just as offensive as poor air quality and, in certain circumstances, equally damaging to health.

Damage to the environment derives from a great variety of sources, and Government policy can be one of them. In its 2002 report, the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee pointed to the ghastly fiasco of the fridge mountain. Substantial costs were also suffered by taxpayers because the Government accepted new EU regulations without having the faintest idea of their implications. Individual and corporate behaviour is another source of environmental damage and criminal elements are believed to be at work, too.

A variety of organisations have produced evidence recently about the scale of the problems that we face. ENCAMS reported a 12 per cent. increase in litter last year; and the Environmental Audit Committee highlighted a 43 per cent. rise in the amount of fly-tipping dealt with by the Environment Agency since 2001. DEFRA's own municipal waste management survey highlights a 38 per cent. increase in the number of abandoned vehicles on the street. I am not sure whether the people who drafted the end-of-life vehicles directive had that outcome in mind, but that has been the effect of its introduction. There are nearly 100,000 abandoned vehicles in London alone, three for every 100 households; many are unlicensed and a significant number get vandalised.

According to the Council for the Protection of Rural England, the area of land in England that experiences severe light pollution rose by 17 per cent. between 1993 and 2000.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): I found it incredible that the Opposition intended to vote against Second Reading and I have listened with bated breath for six minutes to a litany of wrongs, but not one remedy has been suggested by the hon. Gentleman. The Conservative party owes it to the electorate—this will be an election issue—to suggest alternatives to the measures outlined in the Bill.

Mr. Yeo: The hon. Gentleman will have to be patient for a bit longer. I was emphasising what I had rather assumed might be common ground between the Government and the Opposition: that there is a serious problem that needs to be addressed, a problem that, in any number of important respects, is getting worse rather than better.

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): Why vote against the Bill, then?

Mr. Yeo: We are voting against the Bill because we do not think that the remedies proposed are likely to be particularly effective and because we are concerned about areas of omission to which I shall refer shortly. We also suspect that the burden that the Bill will place on local authorities will not be matched by any accompanying funding.

Mr. Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): One of the reasons why the Opposition seek to vote against Second Reading is that they have created this false dichotomy between urban and rural areas. I represent a seat that would be described by the National Farmers Union as an urban fringe seat, and the NFU's evidence to the Environmental Audit Committee said that, in 2000, 67 per cent. of farmers complained of fly-tipping on their land. In what way will the Opposition's stance help me and my farmers who suffer from that problem?

Mr. Yeo: The Government have been in power for quite a long time and seem to have woken up to some of the issues. On fly-tipping, I am not opposed to all the measures in the Bill. [Interruption.] There are "Oohs" and "Aahs" of excitement from Government Members, but just because a Bill is so deeply flawed that without substantial amendment it would be better were it not to be passed does not prevent us from supporting some of its measures. Some of those relating to fly-tipping are important and we support them because we regard the problem of fly-tipping at least as seriously as the hon. Gentleman and the NFU members polled in the survey to which he referred. I am as keen as anyone to see more effective measures taken against what seems to be an increasing problem, to which I will refer again later.

Complaints about noise have doubled in the last five years and the number of noise abatement notices has increased proportionately. However, it is not only the environment that suffers; it is also the taxpayer.

[Mr. Yeo]

The Local Government Association has estimated that local authorities spend £35 billion a year on moving abandoned vehicles. The Environment Agency has estimated that fly-tipping costs the UK economy £150 million a year. Indeed, ENCAMS has suggested that the number of individual local authorities that have to spend more than £40,000 to deal with fly-tipping has quadrupled. The Greater London Assembly says that London boroughs and transport companies spend £13 million a year on graffiti removal, on top, of course, of what private individuals and businesses spend.

Part of the problem of waste is the result of our failure to achieve better performance in relation to recycling. Britain recycles only a quarter as much household waste as Germany does and within the total recycling rates achieved by Britain, there are huge variations from one local authority to another. Conservative-led Daventry recycles 44 per cent. of waste, closely followed by Conservative-led Lichfield. That puts to shame Labour-controlled Sunderland, Labour-controlled Manchester and Liberal Democrat-controlled Liverpool, each of which musters a paltry 2 per cent. waste recycling rate.

Alan Michael: Very selective.

Mr. Yeo: I will be less selective, then. The 10 worst local authorities, none of which managed to recycle more than 4 per cent. of its waste, consist of nine Labour authorities and one Liberal Democrat authority. None of the worst performers is Conservative. By contrast, of the 10 best-performing local authorities, which all recycle more than 27 per cent. of waste, or seven times as much as the worst ones, five—surprise, surprise—are Conservative authorities, four are in no overall control and one is Liberal Democrat. Not a single one of the best performers is a Labour authority.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): Does the hon. Gentleman accept that it is widely considered that in many circumstances fly-tipping is a direct result of people attempting to enforce better recycling and what goes with it, rather than not enforcing better recycling? Given what he has just said, does it make any sense at all for his party to vote against the Bill?

Mr. Yeo: I am not sure that I understood what point the hon. Gentleman was trying to make. If our recycling performance were better, the problem of waste would diminish and some of the adverse consequences that we are debating would take care of themselves. If there were less waste to be disposed of, because more was being recycled, the challenge we face would be at least partly addressed.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman will recall that when his party was in power he got the country to reach the position in which 7 per cent. of waste was being recycled. The figure is up to 17 per cent.—more than double—and we are on track to get it up to 25 per cent. Will he not at least acknowledge that under a Labour Government and with the measures that we have brought in to assist local authorities, the situation has got a great deal better than it was when his party was in power?

Mr. Yeo: I would be horrified if we had not continued to make progress as a country in raising the recycling rates, and what is absolutely clear is that that improved performance is almost entirely the result of Conservative local government. Conservative authorities are consistently achieving recycling rates above the national average, and the national average is consistently being held down by Labour local authorities. I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for allowing me to make that point even clearer than I had already done.

Mr. Michael Foster (Worcester) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman is describing who is responsible for the better recycling rates. Worcester city council, which is Conservative controlled, has improved the rate of recycling from about 6 or 7 per cent. to 17 per cent. as a direct result of a £400,000 grant from the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs to recycle household waste. Who does the hon. Gentleman view as being responsible for that improvement—the Conservative-controlled council or the Labour Government?

Mr. Yeo: Clearly, what happens locally is the direct responsibility of the council. The hon. Gentleman has raised an interesting point, however: he suggests that funding from central Government is one means of achieving better waste management. I wonder if he can recall a single reference to any such link in the Secretary of State's half-hour speech—I think that that was how long she spoke for. The Government are giving significant extra powers to local authorities in the Bill, but they are not providing a single penny to assist those authorities to make use of those powers.

Margaret Beckett: May I point out to the hon. Gentleman that considerable resources have been made available through the spending review and various Budgets by the Government? This Bill is not the vehicle for that major source of funding. May I also point out to him that, in relation to his litany of who is and is not doing well—I accept that some councils are not doing well, although they are of every political party—one of the principal reasons for improvement in a local authority's performance, apart from the kind of funding to which my hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) has just referred, is the targets set by the Government, which authorities are required to try to reach?

Mr. Yeo: Let me correct the Secretary of State. As I pointed out, but as I will repeat, not one of the worst performing councils is Conservative. Nine of the 10 worst are Labour, and one is Liberal Democrat. She has made a further interesting point, however, by drawing attention to the resources provided by the Government. We all know that funding for local government has now been grossly distorted for political reasons by the Labour Government, to provide more funding for their friends in urban, traditional Labour areas—the very authorities that are falling down on the job in relation to recycling.

Mr. Blizzard: May I try to spell out the issue to the hon. Gentleman even more clearly? Conservative-controlled Waveney district council would definitely have been at the bottom of that league, up until about a year ago. It is not at the bottom now, but what made the difference was the £400,000 grant given by my right hon. Friend's Department specifically for a recycling scheme. That money was not part of a funding formula. It was the Government grant that made the difference.

Mr. Yeo: I congratulate the Secretary of State on her wisdom in holding back such a grant until Waveney district council was under Conservative control. At least at that point she could be sure that the resources would be effectively used.

I want to return to the resourcing issue so that we are absolutely clear on it. The Secretary of State said that previous spending rounds had provided extra money for local authorities, which, of course, I accept. Is she saying, however, that the settlements already made reflect the extra costs that local authorities will incur if they choose to exercise the powers under the Bill, or are they expected to rebalance their budgets to use those powers?

Margaret Beckett: We do not accept that local authorities will face substantial extra costs, for a number of reasons. First, we are talking about powers for local authorities, not duties—they are not required to exercise them, and I have little doubt that unless they believe that the exercise of such powers will be cost-effective, they will not choose to do so. Secondly, as I pointed out earlier, they will be able to retain fine income, so that if there are serious problems, they will have resources available to deal with them. In many cases, we are simplifying and providing greater flexibility, so that powers, which in some cases already exist, can be more effectively exercised. In those cases, local authorities are already resourced to carry out such activity. In many cases, there may be a net saving to local authorities. Certainly, we do not anticipate substantial extra burdens.

Mr. Yeo: We are teasing out some interesting information. First, the Secretary of State has just admitted that some of the powers in the Bill are not really needed, as local authorities already have powers to deal with the problems. Secondly, it was widely suggested by Labour Members that achieving better performance was linked to extra money. Now the Secretary of State is saying that there will be no extra money, and no substantial extra costs to bear. I think, however, that that statement acknowledges that there will be some extra costs involved, and it will be interesting to see what the Local Government Association says about that. Then, most tellingly, she said that there would not be duties, only powers. That seems to lead us directly to the conclusion that if local authorities are merely to be given extra powers but no extra money, it is widely assumed on the Government Benches that they will be able to do no more than they did before, so the benefits that may flow from the legislation seem, even in the Government's eyes, rapidly to be growing smaller and smaller.

Mr. Simon Thomas: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Andrew Mackinlay: Ask him what he is going to do about all those problems. That is what we really want to know.

Mr. Thomas: I do not need any help with my intervention, thank you very much.

I can understand the point that the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) was making about the Government's tendency to give local authorities extra duties and responsibilities, but not to fund them. I agree with him wholeheartedly on that, although it is not something that would make me vote against the Bill, which addresses a series of problems. Does he have concerns that his local authority, or others, are spending much time and energy chasing around dealing with abandoned cars and fly-tipping and sorting out with the Environment Agency who is responsible for what—whether it is major fly-tipping and thus the Environment Agency's responsibility or minor and thus the authority's? At least the Bill helps to sort out who is responsible for what, although it does not follow through on the funding responsibilities. The hon. Gentleman is right about that, but does he at least agree that the Bill brings a clarity that is lacking at present?

Mr. Yeo: Yes, I broadly agree. That is a fair point and, in view of the fact that there are some positive elements in the Bill, if my advocacy at the Dispatch Box does not succeed in persuading the House to vote for the Opposition's amendment, it will proceed to a Standing Committee next week—a fairly reasonable assumption—when we can explore further some of the points that the hon. Gentleman has just made.

Sir Paul Beresford (Mole Valley) (Con): As the Bill tightens responsibilities, and as it is supposed to be helpful, does my hon. Friend find clause 47 curious? It removes the requirement to contract out waste disposal functions. I can understand from a dogma point of view why the Government might take that on, but it is a very specialist area that involves huge capital costs generally. The contracts are long. The regulations and complications are intense and encyclopaedic. I am slightly worried that some mind-bogglingly dull local authority, of the wrong political complexion, will grab the provision with both hands and blunder in, with no competition, at great cost and great danger to its local people.

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend speaks on the issue with great authority, not only as one of the most successful local authority leaders of the last generation but also as a Minister who dealt directly with many such matters in the last Conservative Government. I entirely share his concern. I had intended to mention clause 47 later in my speech, but I shall do so now. The Secretary of State did not, I think, allude to it in her speech. It is difficult to understand what benefit the Government expect to achieve by its introduction, and we shall certainly try to remove it from the Bill if the opportunity arises in Committee. I wholly share my hon. Friend's concerns about the clause; only harm can come from the proposal.

The need for action is clear from the statistics that I quoted and the background that I have outlined, where I think there is common ground between the Secretary of State and me. What is less obvious is how the Bill actually helps. As I said earlier, I welcome a number of its provisions. Preventing people from running a used car business that involves parking their stock in front of other people's houses will be welcomed in many neighbourhoods, including some in my area. Even though I represent a largely rural constituency, there are some London overspill areas and estates that were formerly entirely council housing, and that problem has arisen in some neighbourhoods. In that respect, as in many others, however, I wonder whether existing powers, if properly utilised, would not be sufficient to tackle the problem.

Action to curb litter will also command support, as will powers for local authorities to seize fly-tipped vehicles and attempts to curb fly-posting. Those are all important steps in the right direction. However, I have concerns about the Bill that relate first, to how effective it will be; secondly—a point that we have touched on already—to the costs of enforcement; thirdly, to its somewhat intrusive nature in certain respects; and fourthly, to those things that are omitted altogether.

Taking the enforcement issues first, the Bill will give local authorities extra power to deal with the growing problem of abandoned vehicles. I am not absolutely clear how the role that local authorities will be asked to play fits with the role of the police, but, no doubt, that can be explored in more detail in Committee. I am not clear why the Government believe that the new arrangements will be so much more effective than the present ones.

A central difficulty will surely remain in tracing the owners of those vehicles. That will not get any easier as a result of the Bill, although the hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas)—I am not sure whether I pronounced his constituency correctly, but I know where it is—made a constructive point about that. In the circumstances, it seems unlikely that more than a handful of successful prosecutions will be brought. Even if local authorities can keep the proceeds of the fixed penalties levied on those who abandon vehicles, there is still a risk that the cost of pursuing offenders will exceed the income that they may generate. Local authorities must either burden council tax payers further or simply ignore the problem, despite the changes introduced in the Bill.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): I am listening carefully to the points that the hon. Gentleman is making. It is some 25 minutes since he rose to speak. It is some 18 minutes since he gave a commitment to my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay) that he would get around to the alternatives that the Conservatives would propose. We have just passed Christmas and next Christmas is coming fast. When will he get around to those alternatives, rather than saying what is wrong with the Bill and that he will vote against it?

Mr. Yeo: I can give the hon. Gentleman a bankable assurance that I will do so by the start of the general election campaign. He may have more knowledge of when that will be than I do.

Effective action is certainly desirable against the growing menace of litter, but we have concerns about the unrestricted or widespread use of fixed penalties, not least because of the risk that they may quickly become a revenue source of their own for local authorities, rather than a deterrent to prevent litter from being dropped in the first place. The example of speed camera partnerships is a warning of what may happen when bureaucratic or unaccountable bodies see an income stream that they can tap into.

The Bill contains stronger measures to control outdoor advertising. I accept that uncontrolled fly-posting and illegal advertisements disfigure some neighbourhoods, but I share the concerns of the Campaign to Protect Rural England about the growth in moveable hoardings on trailers, and it is not clear whether the Bill will help in that respect.

My hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) will deal in more detail with the waste provisions in the Bill when she speaks later. I want to move now to the crucial issue of noise and light pollution. The provisions in the Bill on noise may be valuable in tackling specific problems such as intruder alarms, although their effectiveness will depend heavily on whether local authorities decide to spend money on using them. The bigger noise problems, such as the noise from increased traffic and aircraft, are regrettably not addressed by the Bill, despite the fact that they affect a growing number of homes.

The consultation procedures, for example, for air traffic decisions, such as those that have led to an increased volume of air traffic over my constituency—South Suffolk—are seriously deficient. Similarly, the Government's present programme for introducing quieter road surfaces is very leisurely to say the least. The result is that villages such as Sproughton in my constituency must wait for years for relief from the noise from the nearby A14. Vehicle and aircraft noise is a bigger and more urgent problem for many residents than anything covered by the Bill, and I regret the fact that the Government are making no attempt to tackle it. Furthermore, the Government's introduction of 24-hour drinking is also likely to lead to more disturbance at normally quiet times of the night.

The Bill acknowledges growing public concern about light pollution, but I am afraid that the effectiveness of its provisions will be considerably reduced by the lengthy list of exemptions. I fully recognise the concerns of people who fear the consequences of yet more statutory regulation intruding into aspects of daily life, which common sense suggests could be safely left to self-regulation and voluntary initiatives. The Secretary of State herself said that she hoped that in many cases disputes about light pollution could be resolved by negotiation. We will want to explore those provisions in more detail in Committee.

Hugh Bayley: Which of the long list of exemptions on light pollution would the hon. Gentleman's party not support?

Mr. Yeo: That is exactly the sort of issue that we want to explore in Committee. There are situations—[Interruption.] Let me give an example of one that affects my constituency. Felixstowe port is one of the most successful in the country and has expanded to the point that its lights are visible for many miles around. That has become an issue of great concern and it will be of concern if there is further expansion on the Essex side of the estuary. There are categories such as that—

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): Airports!

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend mentions airports.

We should take the opportunity now that the issue of light pollution has been recognised in the Bill at least to explore whether other categories can be brought under some measure of control, because the effect of such lights is reaching a larger group of people. Let me emphasise that in principle it is highly desirable that there should be large parts of Britain where it remains possible to enjoy silence during the day and darkness during the night.

I question what benefit there is from giving a statutory basis to the Commission for Architecture and the Built Environment—a body that has certainly not been without controversy during its short life so far. I note that, despite what the Secretary of State said about accountability, the Bill does not require the body to publish an annual report. As I have said, she has been coy on the subject of costs. That is no surprise at a time when public borrowing is spiralling out of control. The Government may not wish to face up to the fact that their policies are placing extra burdens on local authorities, but coping with those burdens may mean even bigger increases in council tax. After all, the Environmental Audit Committee pointed out that the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003 would be more effective at curbing fly-tipping if the Environment Agency and local authorities had more resources to use the powers that the Act gives them.

Let me draw attention to some things that are omitted from the Bill but are directly relevant to clean neighbourhoods. DEFRA has admitted that in 2003 air pollution in urban areas was recorded as moderate or higher on 50 days on average per site measured, and in rural areas on 61 days on average per site measured. In both cases, those figures were more than double the comparable figures for 2002. The Bill is conspicuously silent on the subject of air quality, despite its obvious environmental and health importance.

I mentioned at the start of my speech that global issues such as climate change can have devastating local consequences. Nothing in the Bill addresses those challenges or even acknowledges the link between them. One week after Britain failed, along with Greece, the Czech Republic and Poland, to participate in the launch of the European Union emissions trading scheme, I can understand Ministers not wanting to talk about these issues, but the fact that despite having had years to prepare, Britain is not participating in one of the most important initiatives designed to tackle climate change should be a matter of shame for Ministers. It exposes the Prime Minister's claim to be putting climate change at the centre of his chairmanship of the G8 and presidency of the EU as nothing more than a hollow fraud. It is just talk, and very unconvincing talk at that.

Linda Gilroy: The hon. Gentleman has just mentioned climate change, which is not, as far as I can see, mentioned in the reasoned amendment. I bring him back to the issue of chewing gum. The reasoned amendment says that the Government are failing "to take account of producer responsibility".

Will he be clear on what precisely he means by that? What producer responsibility would he expect? The answer would be of great interest to the hundreds of my constituents who earn their living in the Wrigley's factory.

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) is in discussions with Wrigley's—[Interruption.] We are not jumping to conclusions. She will deal with the problem because it is part of the Bill in which she takes a close interest. She will deal specifically with the concerns raised. Of course I understand that a business will be anxious about the possible impact of more stringent legislation on one of its products.

Andrew Mackinlay: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Yeo: No. I will not damn the hon. Gentleman by saying that he is a friend of mine, but nevertheless I have given way enough.

The Bill is being introduced at a time when the issues with which it deals are becoming more urgent and serious. However, it does not provide evidence of a coherent Government strategy to deal with waste and pollution—things that damage the quality of many people's lives every day. Although we will use the Committee stage to make improvements, we remain concerned about the effectiveness of some of the provisions, the enforceability of others and the meddlesome nature of yet others. We are doubtful that local authorities, on which more responsibility is being placed, will be keen to embrace all the new measures unless they are accompanied by extra cash to implement them. The Bill ignores too many things. For all those reasons, I urge the House to support our amendment.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): The Bill is significant in that it recognises and responds to the needs of local residents. For the past couple of years, I have had the great privilege of touring the country and talking to groups of people about what they would like future policy to contain. What struck me was the priority that they gave to their local environment. They want their local streetscapes lifted and their environment enhanced. That applies in both urban and rural areas.

[Paddy Tipping]

I note with interest, for example, that the National Farmers Union, the Country Land and Business Association and the Campaign to Protect Rural England broadly support the measures. If read carefully, the Bill can be seen to work for both urban and rural communities. For their own political interests, some people want to drive a wedge between the urban and rural communities whereas they are, in fact, integrated and need to work together.

Mr. Drew: My hon. Friend can add to that list the Local Government Association, which also comprises Conservative authorities. It does not argue that the Bill imposes additional costs. It is very much four-square behind it.

Paddy Tipping: It is the case that the LGA supports the Bill. It has been a strong advocate for a long time for more effective environmental legislation.

Let me mention some of the groups that I met. Kay Henshaw and her neighbours on Wigwam grove, Hucknall were fighting for the removal of litter and fences and for trees and grassland to be maintained properly. When the people in Rainworth were asked for their priorities, they wanted cleaner and safer streets, more trees, more flowers and better maintenance of grassland. The people who formed the Ollerton traffic action group wanted to stop traffic ingressing into their area. I also met farmers such as the Hammond family, who farm close to Bestwood country park, who were concerned about fly-tipping and abandoned cars on the urban fringes.

My hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Rothwell (Mr. Challen) made a good point about the importance of urban fringes. We must build on the work of the Countryside Agency to ensure that our urban fringes are more than places where cars go to die and are not the final recipients of refrigerators. Urban fringes offer exciting opportunities. Reforming the system of paying farmers gives us an opportunity to intervene.

I argue strongly that people support the Bill because they know what happens when their neighbourhood is blighted. We all know too well what happens where streets are littered, where pavements are cracked and not repaired, where gardens are overgrown and where cars are abandoned or are repaired on the street. The Bill tackles that for the first time. It is in those neighbourhoods that we get crime and antisocial or nuisance behaviour. People feel strongly that if we can build cleaner, greener, stronger communities, and if we can adopt an attitude of no tolerance not only towards crime but towards environmental crime, we can build better communities. That is what inspires people. What hard-working people want is a better environment—a better place to bring up their children.

I believe strongly that the Bill provides a cornerstone for building such an environment. It will not be easy, but there are indications in the Bill that we are going in the right direction. There is a clear recognition that the problem cannot be solved by one Department, one agency or one group of people. The measures in the Bill are closely intertwined with those for dealing with antisocial behaviour. We have to take a comprehensive approach to lifting our communities and to building better, safer places. That is why it is important that the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and other Departments, such as the Home Office, are involved in promoting the Bill.

It is significant that, building on the antisocial behaviour legislation that the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality was instrumental in piloting through the House some years ago, crime and disorder reduction partnerships are to take environmental nuisance behaviour into account when making their plans. If we want cleaner, safer neighbourhoods and communities, it is fundamentally important that those working partnerships put that aspiration at the heart of their plans.

I am pleased that town and parish councils are to be given new powers, a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew). If we believe in localities, we must trust local people to make decisions, and we must be big enough to recognise that the decisions that they make will not always be those that we would make. It is right that things should be different in, say, Nuneaton, Newcastle and Nottingham. There are different problems and different solutions, and we must empower people to move towards those solutions.

We need to involve people in this process. First, we must empower local authorities, which are increasingly recognising the importance of high quality streets and communities. But they must not be shy of involving local people in those discussions because, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, people know the needs in their area, and they know the solutions, too. Local authorities need to think more strategically. They need to empower local groups to take action themselves. We must move forward on the new localism agenda. We should not be afraid of volunteerism. These are people's streets; these are people's communities; these are people's problems. We must help them to find solutions.

Mr. Challen: Does my hon. Friend agree that although the Opposition seem to fear that fixed penalty notices might simply become a new revenue stream for local authorities if those notices are in the hands of town and parish councils and other local authorities, there will be greater accountability and transparency in the way that money raised from them is spent, if it is spent, on cleaning up local communities?

Paddy Tipping: My hon. Friend is absolutely correct. The issue is one of trust and devolving resources. We must ask people how they would spend the money, and the response will differ across the country. To be candid, we have not been good at doing that, but I hope that we will get better at it.

Local authorities face costs—for example, the Bill contains provisions for gating orders, building on the provision in the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000 to close footpaths in high-crime areas. We all thought that that was a big step forward, but it has proved to be enormously difficult. One of my local authorities, Gedling borough council, expended a lot of staff time on trying to resolve those issues in the Bigwood area. I accept that some alleyways are the focus and locus of antisocial behaviour, but we have to be careful about using gating provisions. We have to consider why the provision in the 2000 Act has not worked. It has not worked because, at times, there is a clear conflict between the need to deny a venue for antisocial behaviour and people's legitimate right to take a short cut to school, to work or to the bus station. Many of the details of gating orders will be set out in regulations to be published later by the Secretary of State. I think that the Standing Committee should analyse the provisions so that we can be sure about simple matters such as who does the gating, who pays the costs of gating and who maintains the gates.

Local authorities will give priority to the issue, but I think that the most important thing we can do is to raise consciousness of the fact that antisocial behaviour and environmental crime are nuisance behaviours. Alongside the provisions of the Bill, we must drive forward a programme to ensure that people understand the significance of clean, green and prosperous communities. Cleanness and greenness will increase the prosperity of neighbourhoods, so that they are places to which people return rather than places from which they flee to rural areas.

The Bill refers to changing the regulations on the financial position on waste. I am rather disappointed that there is no suggestion of direct or variable charging. The Government have a good record on recycling: people said that we would never reach the 17 per cent. target, but we are on track to do that and we shall do more. Alongside the current measures, however, there is a strong case for financial instruments so that people who recycle more are rewarded in some way—perhaps by a reduction in their council tax. I have examined the long title fairly closely and I believe that the issue is one that the Standing Committee may discuss at some length.

The Bill paves the way to a better future. People want a better place to live. Hard-working people have high aspirations for their families. They know that houses in clean, green, well-maintained streets are more valuable, but what could be more valuable than a place that is safe for children and is not polluted by litter, antisocial behaviour, noise and light? The Bill contains new measures on all those problems. It gives people the tools for the job. We must provide the resources and find the processes that will make it work.

Sue Doughty (Guildford) (LD): Let me make it clear at the start that we welcome the Bill. All the evidence that we have seen suggests that the penalties are not strong enough to deal with problems such as fly-tipping, graffiti and the sheer volume of rubbish on our streets. In several Adjournment debates, the House has discussed how to deter people from committing environmental crimes. We know that action is needed. Although the Bill has drawbacks, the problems can be dealt with in Committee, resulting in an improved Bill.

We have to get across to people the message that they share responsibility for the appearance, the feel and the safety of our communities and that environmental crime matters. However, the Bill jumps around—in some ways, it is a dog's breakfast of a Bill, the result of the Government's failure over the years to consider whole systems for legislation. Now, we are left to tidy up. We have had a slew of legislation on tangential issues. The Waste and Emissions Trading Act 2003 was introduced solely to deal with reducing biodegradable waste, but it could have done so much more: it could have covered littering, fly-tipping and many of the other issues dealt with in the Bill. The Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003, which the Bill would amend, could have dealt more effectively with graffiti and fly-posting. The Commission for Architecture and the Built Environment is to be dealt with in the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill, rather than in a planning Bill. I get the feeling that we are taking the populist approach of giving people what they want ahead of the general election, but we know that people are asking for much of what is in the Bill, so while we regret that many of the issues have not been dealt with before, we will support the Bill that includes them.

We want clean and safe communities. It is essential that there is much better management both of the big problems, such as fly-tipping and the damage it causes, and of the smaller, more mundane problems of littering and chewing gum that cumulatively spoil our environment. When a neighbourhood is littered, when graffiti is present and where fly-posting is rife, the area is degraded and degenerated. When we fail to dispose correctly of the products that we have used or no longer require, we have a mess on our streets, in our rivers and in our countryside.

The Government have a mess on their hands now. Total municipal waste increased by 19 per cent. between 1997 and 2003. We are at the bottom of the European recycling league and municipal waste is continuing to increase. Our streets are littered with more abandoned cars than ever before: in the past two years their number has increased by 37 per cent. to more than 300,000 a year. The amount of high-level radioactive waste has increased by 9 per cent. and no one knows what we are going to do with batteries. Fly-tipping continues to increase—by how much we do not know. Last summer, I forecast that fly-tipping would increase as a result of DEFRA's last-minute approach to the provision of facilities for hazardous waste, but the Government say that it has not—their figures do not show an increase. I went back to the people who were reporting the increase—the farmers on whose land lorry-loads of asbestos have been dumped. They tell me that, if they report the matter and the perpetrators are not caught, the authorities charge the farmer for tidying up, so they say nothing. There is a slew of unreported waste littering our commons, our farms and our countryside. It must be dealt with, which is another reason why we support the Bill.

I have met farmers who have repeatedly been stuck with the problem. Even if they have seen someone dumping waste on their land, the Environment Agency has not had the resources to follow up on detection so that it can secure a conviction and penalties. Under the Bill, the Environment Agency will continue to face a shortfall in its resources for detection. Getting a conviction and penalties is great, but detection is extremely important.

Mr. Drew: Does the hon. Lady accept that some landowners—only a few—abuse the system? Waste is brought in and they do not ask too many questions about what is being tipped. We need the Environment Agency to be more proactive about enforcement. Does she share my hope that the Bill will achieve that?

Sue Doughty: The hon. Gentleman is making an important point and one with which we must deal. There is a difference between people who are willing to litter the countryside or have their land used in that way and those who are innocent victims of others who arrive at night, dump stuff and disappear, to leave others with the cost. I am worried about the Bill requiring owners to clear their land if they were not responsible for the litter or the dumping.

It is amazing that the Tories are not supporting the Bill. They say that it "focuses predominantly on urban issues while neglecting rural areas".

That is flawed thinking. Does the Opposition's amendment mean that it does not matter that streets look like tips? Does it mean that people should have to tolerate mess day after day? Does it matter that not enough is being done about abandoned cars? Do the Tories think it acceptable that someone living in a private house should set up a car dealership and park cars along the road to the detriment of the entire community? That is being allowed in Guildford, and nothing is being done to eradicate the problem. I am astonished. Do the Tories want fly-tippers to keep the means by which they commit their crimes and not have the vehicles that are being used for that purpose seized?

It seems that a hugely imaginative step is being proposed. It is one that the Environmental Audit Committee recommended, as did other bodies. We can start to see some remedies taking effect. If we are to have more building in the south-east on brownfield sites, we need to manage the waste that will be produced. Construction waste must be better managed and we must introduce legislation to deal with that issue, but the Tories oppose that approach. Will they be happy when construction waste continues to appear on farmland, in quarries and on commons? Is that what they want? They do not want to deal with fly-tipping on farmland, even though the National Farmers Union supports the Bill. Are they no longer talking to farmers?

The Local Government Association, which is chaired by the Tories, is backing the Bill. As I have said, the Tories are not doing so in the House. The Tories do not want spot fines for those who drop chewing gum on the streets, yet councils face enormous costs in clearing that nuisance. Westminster city council—I think that it is Tory run—spends £90,000 a year on removing chewing gum. There are 300,000 pieces of gum in Oxford street, but nothing is being done to change the disgusting habit of throwing used chewing gum on the streets. It seems that that is what the Tories want. Their approach is opportunistic. They are running after a bandwagon that is missing.

Dr. Whitehead: In pursuing the hon. Lady's puzzle about why the Conservatives are opposing the Bill, can she offer us any explanation? Was it Christmas? Was it a decision taken immediately after a long Christmas lunch? Has the hon. Lady any view on the matter?

Sue Doughty: The hon. Gentleman tempts me but I will not go along that route. It is a question that requires a few moments in the early morning while we lie awake worrying about the matter. It is something that can be questioned. I am not sure about the reason.

I am worried that the Tories are not proposing anything to sort out the mess. Rural policy is wider than restoring fox hunting. The problem with environmental crime is poor management. Fly-tipping in the countryside is being left for landowners to sort out. There is a lack of management.

Dogs are out of control and present a nuisance. As the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) said—he is no longer in his place—it is not a matter of urban versus rural. It is an issue that affects us all. If we are to get tough on crime, we must not walk away from environmental crime that ruins communities.

The Bill deals with what is obvious and visible, but it wills the end without the means. We want to ensure that funding is available to local government. It is clear that it will need pump priming. I accept that there may be savings in the end but there must be a realistic beginning. I was interested when the Secretary of State touched on that topic. I look forward to hearing more about it in Committee.

We are faced with increased mountains of hazardous waste. The door is wide open for cowboys and we need to do more to tackle the problem. There are only minor penalties on conviction for those who spoil our environment. Perhaps we are all in agreement that they are too low. They do not provide an incentive to stop the man in the white van agreeing to remove rubbish and then dumping it as soon as he can. They do not do much to stop fly-posting or anything to deal with the litter associated with street handouts. It is clear that the penalties need to be increased if they are to present real incentives.

As the Environmental Audit Committee said, we also need to ensure that courts are prepared to impose real fines and not opt for the lowest penalty when the issue comes to court.

The Secretary of State suggested that owners should limit access to sites subject to fly-tipping. We need to ensure also that when that is done a periodic review is undertaken. When alleys are gated off in urban areas or lanes in the countryside, there should be full consultation to ensure that access is still available to farmers and that they are not penalised.

The Bill could do much but it has weaknesses. There is the fixed penalty system. Who is handing out the fines? Are there opportunities for appeal? What is the position of persistent offenders? The garage to which I have referred—it was a private house a few years ago—constantly exceeds the number of cars that are permitted to be parked on the road. That situation is factored into its costs. A fine of £100 is probably not sufficient in those circumstances.

Will councils employ private contractors? If so, how will they be managed? In my constituency, and I am sure in many others, car clampers have come to work on behalf of councils. They have been predatory and disgraceful in their way of working. They have extracted penalties equivalent to a week's wages. There seems to be little opportunity of appeal and I want to ensure that people are entitled to justice when issued with fixed penalties.

We have problems with parish councils that become litter authorities. I am not criticising the larger parishes that are successful and hold elections for their members but there are too many parishes where the members are unelected. I would not want an unelected parish council to have the powers that are proposed. If we want quality parish councils, we want elected parish councils.

Alun Michael: The hon. Lady makes an important point. Does she agree that the Government were right to make the elected requirement a key element of the quality parish councils, and encourage parish councils to make use of the powers that the Bill will provide in the context of becoming genuine, well-run and elected councils?

Sue Doughty: I welcome the Minister's comments. I hope that we will hear more in Committee about how the process will work.

We have a problem with Traveller encroachment. Somehow, it seems that farmland is, again, no longer considered important. Those of us who have farms in our constituencies constantly hear of the devastation that may be caused after Travellers have illegally occupied land and left it in a mess, with asphalt laid and other problems. These are issues that we need to consider in Committee. It is clear that they need sorting out. I have no problems with prosecutions where people fly-tip. If there are powers to take away vehicles, and those vehicles are used to tow Travellers' caravans, there needs to be clarity, because there may be a human rights issue. I hope that the Government will be able to provide clarification.

I agree with the hon. Members for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) and for Ogmore (Huw Irranca-Davies), who mentioned the tragic incident involving a child in a car in the countryside. We must deal with abandoned cars in the countryside as well as in the streets. Abandoned cars are a blight on the countryside, cause pollution and, as we have heard, are a hazard.

There is also the problem of houses in multiple occupation where there are broken-down cars awaiting repairs. The Government are right to draw attention to the problem. With increased brownfield development and infilling in towns leading to reductions in parking places and several people sharing a house, there is often not just one householder. If two cars break down that belong to two owners in one house, how will the Government deal with that? There is less off-road parking for private vehicles than there used to be, particularly in urban areas. There is a balance to be struck between the people who live in an area, who have a reasonable right to maintain their cars on the street if there is nowhere else available, and the people who live around them. More clarity is required.

Mr. Patrick Hall (Bedford) (Lab): I certainly agree with the hon. Lady about people who may need to maintain their car on the street, but would she not draw a distinction between an individual maintaining one car and someone running a business in the street?

Sue Doughty: The hon. Gentleman is right. We do not want people to repair cars on the street for profit and there is nothing in the relevant clause that we dispute.

There are gaps in the Bill, including, for example, the import and disposal of nuclear waste. Liberal Democrats, including my hon. Friend the Member for Lewes (Norman Baker), regularly urge the Government to address the problem of nuclear waste, and it is time that they did so. Only last month, however, they announced that they are going to allow foreign nuclear waste to be buried in the UK. It is a pity that the way in which we deal with nuclear waste is not covered by the Bill.

There is no mention of penalising people who deliver junk mail, even when householders express a preference about not receiving it. We are the junk mail capital of Europe. We do not need all that junk mail and if someone says that they do not want it, we should make sure that their wish is respected.

Mr. Challen: What about "Focus"?

Sue Doughty: "Focus" is a high-quality leaflet and I am sure that no one would regard it as junk mail. [Interruption.] As I have just been told, it is informative and factual.

We welcome the freedom that the Bill gives to local authorities. Unlike the Conservatives, we welcome an end to the insistence that an authority should always contract out the functions of disposal. Surrey county council, for example, is bound into an inflexible 25-year contract that costs a fortune to maintain and does not allow it to move easily to more sustainable waste management. That is wrong. If a local authority has the skills and the ability to undertake disposal and can compete with private business, why should it not do so? We should create the flexibility to put better waste strategies in place.

There is another dog that did not bark. People have talked endlessly about allowing councils to make variable charges for waste management. In its report of December 2002, "Waste not, Want not", for example, the strategy unit identified a package of measures to reduce the growth in waste volume, including more freedom for local authorities to introduce variable charging and schemes that reward households that increase their recycling and reduce waste volumes. Such schemes included council tax discounts for households that compost waste, rewards and prizes for homes that recycle rubbish and variable charging schemes to reduce council tax for people who recycle the most.

The Secretary of State, however, appears to be going backwards. In The Sunday Times of 8 August 2004, she accepted that while there were political risks there was "potential for significant long-term gains."

What are those risks? There is unanimity among the main parties in the Local Government Association, which supports the proposals. In Parliament, however, that is not the case. Have the Government rejected the proposals out of cowardice, and are the Tories going backwards because they prefer to accuse others of stealth taxes than introduce constructive proposals of their own? Another Government scheme that could result in increases in recycling will not see the light of day.

Moving on to the problem of noise, I agree with the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) that the Bill does not go far enough. It deals with faulty burglar alarms, but not faulty car alarms, which plague some individuals. Excess road and air noise are a sheer misery for certain neighbourhoods. Constituents of mine who live by the A3 suffer day in, day out from excess noise—they cannot sleep and their walls rattle. That is not acceptable, but there is nothing in the Bill to deal with the problem. However, we welcome the opportunity to gate alleys and snickets. There was a successful pilot in Liverpool, where 5,200 alley gates were installed. Domestic burglary has been reduced by 24 per cent., but we must ensure that access is granted to people who require it. We must consider what happens when they no longer need access, but we must also make sure that the emergency services fully support such gating. They must be provided promptly with information and maps so that they know which roads are open and which are not. Too often, the police are not provided with such information, and they lose the opportunity to catch miscreants because they do not know where to go.

We welcome action on light pollution, but there are worrying exemptions. In Committee, I hope that we can discuss permissive action. BAA invited us to take part in an environmental safari at Gatwick airport, so that we could see how it had attempted to reduce light emissions and make the transition to lighting from renewable energy sources. It has undertaken a voluntary initiative to save money and reduce light, but exemptions should be introduced only after consultation. They should not be automatic, because much more needs to be done. If a car showroom is opened close to a residential area light is shed everywhere. The problem is not picked up in the planning application, and it is only when the garage has opened that the council says, "We never expected that to happen." People need lighting for safety purposes, but it should be directed downwards, not outwards and upwards.

The Bill should address the problems caused by other pollutants. After a weekend of devastating storms and floods leading to loss of life and huge damage—the House will sympathise with the distress experienced by the people of Carlisle—the Government have missed the opportunity to tighten local government powers on climate change adaptation and mitigations. Climate change is the responsibility not just of national and international Government but of local government. We are concerned about the way in which fixed penalty notices will work and we need to look at that in Committee. On Thursday, we will debate the report by the Select Committee on Environmental Audit on some issues covered by the Bill which, in general, we support. It needs to be improved, but it is definitely time to introduce it.

Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford) (Lab): I very much welcome the Bill, not least because tackling environmental crime has been a constant theme of my time as a constituency Member.

The very first lobby that I received after becoming a Member of Parliament in 1987 was from tenants of the Silwood estate in Deptford, who came to see me because 10,000 tonnes of spoil and waste had been dumped on the fringes of their estate. I soon learned that environmental authorities had limited powers to deal with the problem. Although I castigated them for failing to do so, I knew that it would be difficult for them to achieve very much. I was warned early on of the personal danger that I would face if I tried to tackle the criminals who were dumping the waste. A year later, I won a place in the ballot for private Members' Bills, and introduced powers to register waste carriers and to stop illegal carriers and dumpers in the Control of Pollution (Amendment) Act 1989. Since then, those powers have passed to the Environment Agency, but it is often local authorities and vigilant constituents who identify the criminals, which is why local authorities such as Lewisham have campaigned for extended powers for local authorities to tackle fly-tipping. I am delighted that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and her colleagues have responded positively and introduced a raft of powers to do so in the Bill.

Other people's rubbish is a constant affront to most residents, and local authorities have a hard task dealing with the antisocial behaviour of a minority of residents and businesses. The courts may not regard leaving piles of rubbish in plastic bags on the landings of communal blocks as a serious matter, but such behaviour is soul-destroying for other residents. It is also hazardous, as bags leak, break, stain the walkways, create smells and physical hazards, and attract vermin. Lewisham council has secured two convictions for such offences and has 13 prosecutions pending. The council has been using existing legislation but very much welcomes the fixed penalty notices in the Bill, which will enable it to deal much more effectively with residents and businesses that leave their bins and rubbish in the wrong place. Likewise, the extension of responsibility for clearing illegally dumped waste to landowners as well as occupiers offers the prospect of clearing up those gardens with which we are all so familiar in private properties that are often vacant.

Local authorities need to tackle other sources that give rise to fly-tipping, such as local businesses that fail to produce waste transfer notices and arrangements. Using existing legislation, Lewisham council has secured 10 convictions over the past year, with more pending. But Nigel Tyrell, head of environment at Lewisham council, points out that for a large waste producer it could be cheaper to pay the proposed fixed penalty fine of £300 than to have a contract with a bona fide waste collection scheme. Local authorities will have to judge whether the existing legislation or the new fixed penalty fines are more appropriate in such instances to secure behavioural change.

The illegal commercial waste disposal operators continue to cause most damage. Recently, residents on the Honor Oak estate in my constituency reported frequent sightings of a lorry that pulled off the main road into their garage area, switched its lights off, deposited a load of rubbish and quickly drove away, its licence plate completely covered with mud. That is the kind of operator that local council officers want to get their hands on. I am delighted to see new powers in the Bill for the immediate searching, seizing and impounding of such offending vehicles. All too often in the past, such criminals have evaded justice, particularly when the driver was able to say that he was acting on his employer's instructions. The removal of that defence is significant. It was excavation work in docklands 20 years ago that began the massive fly-tipping of spoil in Deptford. The much welcomed development of the Thames gateway now poses a similar problem for Lewisham. We will need all the new powers in the Bill to combat today's criminals.

Lewisham has a proud record of environmental activity and already includes the environment in its crime and disorder reduction partnership. Over the past nine months Lewisham has removed more than 5,000 items of graffiti within six days of their being reported, which amounts to 30,000 sq m of graffiti. It has held 15 graffiti-busting days with residents, councillors and local businesses, reduced the average time to remove fly-tips to 1.7 days, removed 538 untaxed vehicles and 1,165 abandoned vehicles, and—despite the fears of the Opposition that this is so difficult—successfully prosecuted 30 people for the abandonment of their vehicles and 83 people for fly-tipping and litter.

The new power to remove and crush hazardous vehicles will have a significant positive impact on our street scene, and new powers to deal with people repairing vehicles on the road will also be extremely welcome to residents who have to live alongside those nuisances, but although car repair shops are, thankfully, not on every street corner, litter and graffiti often are. It is a sad reflection on our society that the Government must legislate further to tackle those scourges and use yet more taxpayers' money to clear up after the minority of vandals.

I hope my right hon. Friend the Minister will see that the extension of litter offences is backed by a public information campaign aimed especially at young people. I hope, too, that residents will appreciate that council sweepers cannot return every five minutes to sweep up the litter of wrappers and fast food boxes constantly dropped outside newsagents and takeaways. Litter clearing notices and street litter control notices will, I know, be used to great effect locally. I am particularly pleased to see the power to restrict the distribution of fliers, handouts and pamphlets that can end up as litter. Recently, on a walkabout on the Crossfields estate in my constituency, I saw great bundles of fliers placed on the bottom step of the concrete staircases to the flats. In no time at all, such fliers are blowing all over the landscaped public areas of the estate and should definitely be banned.

Along with graffiti, fly-posting is probably the other offence that most ruins a local environment and creates an air of neglect, dirt and criminality. Lewisham council has half a dozen cases pending under current legislation, but that legislation, requiring the council to show that the beneficiary consented to the fly-posting, is highly deficient. The new powers should transform the council's ability to tackle this offence, which is particularly extensive in Lewisham.

The Bill is excellent. It tackles the many offences that ruin our local environment and cause such irritation and hardship to our constituents. As I have described, my borough is extremely active on a wide range of issues covered by the Bill and will undoubtedly do much more when it is given the new powers. It will also make excellent use of the revenue that it is able to retain from fixed penalty notices. All efforts to deter, detect and punish those involved in environmental offences are to be applauded, but we will never be able to do enough to keep our neighbourhoods clean unless we change attitudes and behaviour. I warmly welcome the Bill and hope that in due course it will be much used by our local councils, and that our constituents will join in the spirit of it as well.

Derek Conway (Old Bexley and Sidcup) (Con): I am grateful for the opportunity to contribute briefly to the debate. I shall concentrate on the animal welfare aspects of the Bill, about which I questioned the Secretary of State during her opening remarks. Many colleagues in the House know me best for my partiality to cats, as I have been chief executive of the largest feline welfare charity in Britain. I am delighted to see the hon. Member for Broxtowe (Dr. Palmer) in his place. He is a distinguished supporter of cat protection. However, the subject of my remarks tonight is dogs.

As a result of my work with cats, I have frequently come into contact with the dog welfare charities in our country, particularly the larger ones, such as the Dogs Trust and the Kennel Club. Because of that contact, a number of them have raised with me their concerns about the content of the Bill. They are not against the Bill and they are not cynical about it, but they have concerns, which they have also expressed to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess), who is a remarkable champion of animal welfare. I am delighted that he is present, and I hope that he will catch Mr. Deputy Speaker's eye to raise our concerns.

The Minister kindly wrote to us during the parliamentary recess. His letters during a recess are always welcome and make relaxing reading. On page 2 of his letter he extolled the fact that the Bill would bring in a "simplified system" for dealing with stray animals. The Bill repeals section 3 of the Dogs Act 1906, which gives the police power to seize stray dogs in public places. The Bill also amends section 150 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990, which gives the opportunity for dogs to be taken to police stations when they are found. The responsibility will pass from the police—not that they were dealing with it exclusively—to local authorities. That may well work, but a number of us have reasonable doubts. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh), who will represent the Opposition in Committee, will press the Government in detail. I wish I could be there to support her, but as I shall be chairing the Committee considering the Identity Cards Bill next door, I shall have to wait for the breaks to find out what progress she is making.

The council dog warden scheme is remarkable. There are many dedicated men and women out there in the most dreadful conditions and weather, in poky little vans, doing a great deal to round up stray dogs and find their owners or, if they cannot, have the dogs taken into care. The dog wardens, who are represented on a number of animal welfare charity forums, do a splendid job for pretty poor pay and in dreadful working conditions. They do that job pretty well 9 to 5, Monday to Friday. There are exceptions, but not many.

Out-of-hours cover is necessarily provided by the police. Although the Government will doubtless elucidate this in Committee, I can find no reference in the Bill to what will happen after 5 pm or before 9 am and on Saturdays and Sundays, when council dog wardens are not available. No doubt the Minister will also tell us the cost involved, but that too is not really dealt with in the Bill.

[Derek Conway]

Where will a wandering dog be taken? If a dog is worrying children in a park, who will come? Most people would think of calling the police, for not enough dog wardens are floating around local authority areas for them to be on patrol as often as the police should be. In many of our constituencies, there is likely to be confusion over who is responsible for controlling stray dogs that worry children in public play areas.

In an excellent briefing, which I hope will be given to those appointed to the Committee—if not, I shall ensure that they receive it—the Kennel Club poses a number of very good questions about that, and about the cost issue. A 1998 independent study estimated the council cost at some £15 million, but the O'Dowd report on police costs suggested £1.8 million. I am no mathematician, but even I can work out that there is a bit of a gap between £1.8 million and £15 million. Clearly it is difficult to put a figure on this, but it is incumbent on the Government to do so if they expect the House to change arrangements that have been in force for so many decades. I hope that the programme motion will give the Committee an opportunity to consider the issue in some detail.

It is not clear whether, once the police arrangements have gone, enforcement of care for strays will become a local authority responsibility 24 hours a day, seven days a week. There is no such requirement in the Bill. I hope the Minister will tell us whether he will issue guidance to councils, and what enforcement will be possible if councils have neither the money nor the will to carry it out themselves.

Animal welfare charities do a phenomenal job in caring for stray dogs. Obviously everyone knows about the RSPCA: I do not think we need blow its trumpet too much. Dogs Trust is undoubtedly a leader in the field, but excellent work is done by the Blue Cross, by a wonderful organisation called Wood Green Animal Shelters, and of course by the Kennel Club, which is the oldest such charity. They have come together in a forum called the Pet Advisory Committee, in which local authority dog wardens are also represented. I hope that, on Report if not in Committee, the Minister will assure us that he and other representatives of his Department have met members of those welfare charities—as well as the Pet Advisory Committee and dog wardens—to establish that the proposals in the Bill will work.

This is a big problem. Dogs Trust, known to many as the National Canine Defence League, helps more than 12,000 dogs each year in its 15 centres. That is an awful lot of stray dogs. It also spends £2 million a year on neutering dogs whose owners receive state benefits. More bodies than just local authorities are trying to cope with the problem of unwanted dogs, and Dogs Trust in particular helps council dog wardens. The fact remains, however, that there are more than 5 million dogs in this country—although the 8 million cats are clearly in the lead—of which about 105,000 stray. That is of course a natural instinct; they are not yobboes, and should not be subject to antisocial behaviour orders. They foul pavements, which is also natural. In some respects they even emulate the House of Commons: they make a noise, which for many of us is a natural function. The general public, however, understandably want to see some control, especially those who do not like dogs.

I appreciate that the Minister is trying to do something about those problems, but I am sure he will bear it in mind that dogs, in particular, provide an enormous amount of companionship for many of our constituents. They give huge enjoyment, especially to children, and I think they genuinely improve the human lot. When society seeks to control this wonderful species, as it seeks to do in the Bill, we have a duty of care. I have known the Minister for 20-odd years and I believe his intentions are good, but I regret to say that I do not think he has addressed that duty of care in the Bill. As it stands the Bill is simply a shrug, which is not good enough. I hope that he will deal with the issues I have raised—if not tonight, in Committee and on Report.

Mr. Michael Foster (Worcester) (Lab): I can assure the hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Derek Conway), on the basis of dealings I have had with my right hon. Friend the Minister on animal welfare issues, that my right hon. Friend will be assiduous in considering the animal welfare implications of the Bill—as he has been in the case of other Bills that have come his way.

I welcome the key provisions of the Bill, which are intended to drive up local environmental quality. The Bill will also play an important part in tackling antisocial behaviour in places such as my constituency. I want to focus on the aspects that will benefit constituents who have raised problems with me over many years.

Gating orders are an urban issue. Planners seem to have designed short cuts and public access routes to facilitate easy escape from the police rather than easy access to local facilities. An example is the alley backing on to the Fairway in Worcester, which links Otley close to Tolladine road. The pathway is unlit and contains two 90-degree turns, so people cannot see from one end to the other. Certain individuals have used that footpath to push over brick walls, damage fences and urinate into people's gardens. That is unacceptable behaviour, and gating orders might enable us to end such problems.

I am, however, acutely aware of the potential conflict—raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping)—between those who suffer from antisocial behaviour, who are victims of crime, and law-abiding people who just want to go from their homes to local facilities. I would like to know how the Minister expects local authorities and crime reduction partnerships to deal with that conflict. Who, ultimately, will have priority—victims of antisocial behaviour, or those who argue on libertarian grounds that they should have the right to use a footpath? If time limits are imposed, allowing gates to be closed in the evenings or whenever it gets dark, who will be responsible for the prompt closing and opening of the gates?

Gating could perhaps be used as a way of tackling antisocial behaviour on the part of older youths abusing children's play areas. There is a play area in Barley crescent and Tolladine road, and another in Great Oaty gardens, Warndon Villages. They are designed for children of five, six and seven, but tend to be occupied late in the evening by teenagers and older young people. Those whose homes back on to the play areas are subjected to the throwing of bottles into their gardens, and to fireworks and noise. Playgrounds are set on fire, and unwanted waste is generated. The play areas also attract individuals who seek to capitalise on the presence of groups of young people who may be particularly vulnerable to the selling of drugs and other illegal substances. The detached youth team in Worcester has worked hard, but the local council has failed it in not recognising the problem and in taking so long to establish a strategy.

I think that we would all accept that the antisocial behaviour and crime that abandoned cars tend to attract and promote are a real problem. A notice placed on a windscreen is like a green light for vandals, who think, "No one cares. Let us have some fun and damage that car." I welcome the fact that we will have speedier action on such behaviour.

In Worcester city last year, 414 abandoned cars were dealt with by the local council, so the issue affects areas that are perceived to be nice and middle-class and middle England, as well as more challenging areas. Therefore, I was dismayed to read a month or so ago that the local Conservative ruling group on the city council decided that dealing with abandoned vehicles was not a priority area for action. The Conservatives are trying to put over a party political argument in their motion, but it is one that my constituents will fail to understand.

Nuisance parking is not a recent phenomenon but it is a growing problem. For example, it is dangerous to sell cars on busy highways such as the London road going in and out of Worcester, and cars parked on the grass verges of streets such as Windermere drive are an eyesore. They reduce and devalue the amenities of the land in that area.

Litter cleaning notices will be a much welcomed, more flexible approach. We can start to enforce more responsible behaviour, so that wider communities are not disadvantaged by irresponsible individuals. I have walked Teme road and Avon road with the chief executive of the city council. Those areas are a disgrace and certain individuals are letting down the neighbourhood. Although one-off measures such as bulk waste or refuse collection are used to make an immediate clear-up, within a few months the area goes back to its normal state because there is no regular enforcement.

That is why I welcome the fixed penalty notice scheme and the different treatments that the council can apply. If the litter and waste are seen to be detrimental to the amenity of the locality, the local authority can take action, rather than having to wait to see whether an environmental health hazard is posed by all that litter and waste. The work of good local councillors such as Geoff Williams and Roger Berry in those areas can be supported by the Bill.

On graffiti, Worcester city has had the benefit for a number of years of a local benefactor, Mr. Cecil Duckworth and the services of his Duckworth Trust in helping to clean up the city and to rid it of graffiti. He is particularly keen to see graffiti dealt with and the problems caused by chewing gum highlighted because those are the two main problems that his group of workers has been working on. He was surprised, as I was, at Liberal Democrat opposition to provisions in the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003 to restrict the sale of spray paints to those aged under 16. It is rewarding to see the Liberal Democrats' conversion on that matter, which I believe is what we heard this evening. I welcome the pressure that will be put on local authorities to ensure that the Anti-social Behaviour Act provisions on spray paint sales are enforced.

On the issue of future changes to local government structure, the Minister needs to be aware of changes that will increasingly need to be made to introduce more local community involvement. In Worcester, we have a two-tier local government structure, which has become increasingly outdated and needs to be changed, but the move to a unitary authority would create a larger local authority body responsible for the enforcement of many of the matters that are raised in the Bill. Therefore, I ask the Minister to consider, as the Bill makes progress, how powers can be delegated to the equivalent of parish and town councils in urban areas or to local area forums.

In summary, I welcome the measures, which are long overdue. I believe that they will help local government to reconnect with local communities, so that my constituents no longer hear the excuse that legislation does not allow local government officers to deal with the problems that they see day in, day out.

6.44 pm

Mr. David Amess (Southend, West) (Con): I assume that all Members of Parliament wish to live in a clean environment and a pleasant neighbourhood. If they do not, they are not representing their constituents because that is what each and every one of our constituents wants. The question is, and I have listened to the criticism of the Conservative party opposing the Bill: will this Bill achieve that which our constituents want?

I received a letter today from a constituent who posed that question. He says:

"Leigh on Sea is a wonderful Town populated by decent people, it has an excellent sense of community and feels safe to all, that is until it gets dark.

In recent months gangs of youths can be heard shouting screaming up and down the Leigh Road, often marauding down the quiet residential streets causing minor damage and being a general nuisance. On many occasions youths can be seen walking along swigging from large bottles of cider or cans of beer.

I feel the biggest problem however is the graffiti, they seem to go on the rampage about twice a week scrawling over shop fronts and anything else that takes their fancy, as I said this seems to be getting worse on a weekly basis. The problems this causes can be easily realised, the primary inconvenience must be constant expenditure redecorating the defaced areas.

I am sure that the shop keepers must inform the Police, however I also believe that there is a Public mentality that 'there's no point complaining as nothing gets done anyway' or that 'the Police are powerless against these pests'".

I am delighted that the Government acknowledge that the problems of nuisance parking, abandoned vehicles, littering, graffiti, fly-posting, dogs behaving badly, audible intruder alarms, noise, abandoned shopping trolleys, insect infestation and artificial lighting nuisance have all got worse since the Government came to power in 1997. However, this Bill does nothing whatever about the underlying issues that cause all these problems.

[Mr. David Amess]

Mr. Challen: Given what the hon. Gentleman has just said, why is it that there are so few Conservative Back Benchers here today? Is it conceivable that they have stayed away because they do not want to be associated with the blunder of their Front-Bench team in opposing the Bill?

Mr. Amess: I doubt that very much. I think that Her Majesty's loyal Opposition are increasingly disgusted by the way in which Parliament is treated by the Government.

There were a couple of major news articles in the national newspapers commenting on the Bill. One said:

"Only yesterday, there were two more additions to the depressingly long list of ways in which we must now expect to be policed or regulated. An army of busybodies is to be employed to issue fines to people who drop litter. And, even more ingeniously, people who cause unnecessary 'light pollution' are now also to be fined.

The public reaction to this will be one of deep distaste. Most of us know how we should behave if our lives are to be remotely enjoyable. We also know that government has, or should have, better things to do than pass laws that only aggrieve the respectable majority."

Another article from a national newspaper said:

"We have been forced into a kind of police state, in which regulation after regulation is imposed to ensure we act in a way of which the Government approves."

On the specific point of fixed penalty notices, I was attracted by the Law Society brief which express reservations about the further expansion of the use of fixed penalty notices. In Essex, for example, we have a record amount of revenue from fines imposed as a result of speed cameras. The Law Society feels:

"It is essential that only properly trained officials are allowed to issue Notices."

It also says:

"If the majority of Notices are issued against the more deprived members of society, their financial situation will only be made worse.

The level of a Fixed Penalty Notice does not take into account the means of the recipient and could therefore have a disproportionate effect on someone reliant on benefits. The Government must weigh the risk of further social exclusion with its commitment to tackling the 'causes of crime'."

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Derek Conway), I think that we are entirely right to take this opportunity to speak on behalf of dogs. I fully support the work of Dogs Trust, undertaken under the leadership of its chief executive, Clarissa Baldwin. I faithfully enter my black Labrador, Michael, every year in the Westminster dog of the year show, and I am not yet embittered by his failure to win on seven occasions. However, I do hope that, in summing up, the Minister will address the points that Dogs Trust has brought to my attention.

Part 6 deals with dogs, chapter 1 deals with dog control orders, and chapter 2 deals with stray dogs. Like Dogs Trust, I have no objection to the principles behind the Bill, but I have considerable misgivings about the implementation of chapter 2. As my hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup said and as Dogs Trust points out,

"Current legislation lays responsibility for dealing with stray dogs jointly between the police and local authority. The Environmental Protection Act lays a duty on local authorities to appoint a person to deal with stray dogs, hold them for a period of seven days and then to dispose of them, usually to a re-homing organisation such as Dogs Trust. This person is usually called the Dog Warden or Animal Welfare Officer.

In practice in most local authority areas the Dog Warden service is active during normal . . . working hours. Dogs found straying during these hours are collected and dealt with by the Dog Warden and, in general, there is a reasonable level of service.

However at night and at weekends when the Dog Warden service is not available the police have a duty to accept stray dogs. Usually the Dog Warden collects such dogs when they come back on duty and become responsible for their care. Because most dogs stray by accident and most are exercised in the evenings and at weekends it seems likely to Dogs Trust that a significant proportion of stray dogs will stray during the same period. This supposition is borne out by anecdotal evidence."

I very much agree with Dogs Trust that

"local authorities must provide 24 hour cover for the Dog Warden service."

I am also attracted to what the Kennel Club has to say on this issue and I fully support its endeavours, under the leadership of its chief executive, Mrs. Rosemary Smart. It has drawn my attention to clause 68, which deals with responsibility for receiving stray dogs, the costs in respect of which my hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup has already referred to. The Kennel Club "would like to see an obligation placed on local authorities to provide an around-the-clock service for stray dogs".

Clauses 55 to 58 deal with streamlining the dog control byelaw system. I hope that DEFRA Ministers will carry out proper consultation before drafting model offences and establishing the process that local authorities should undertake in making dog control orders, and that they will establish that interested parties should be consulted. Clauses 59 to 62 deal with fixed penalty notices, and I hope that the Minister will consider getting DEFRA to set a national figure for fines for breaches of dog control orders.

Since 1997, the House has introduced a huge amount of legislation, much of which is never enforced. This Bill is all about electioneering. More duties are being placed on local authorities, without proper funding. Yet more legislation will be placed on the statute book that will not be enforced, and it will not produce what my constituents want, which is a cleaner neighbourhood and a better environment in which to live.

Mr. Patrick Hall (Bedford) (Lab): I want to discuss the deeply antisocial act of abandoning vehicles, and initially to draw on the experience of a constituent of mine, Mr. Chris Meadows, who is co-director of a company that manages an apartment building in Bedford. Over the years, the company has paid hundreds of pounds to have abandoned cars removed from its car park. In order to identify the owner, it writes to the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency giving a description of the vehicle and its registration number and requesting the name and address of the registered keeper, for which a fee of £2.50 is payable. On receiving the information, the company writes to the keeper, who invariably does not reply. It then instructs a private contractor to remove the vehicle, the cost of which is £30.

Bedford borough council will take instructions from private property owners to remove such a vehicle, but the fee is £88.13. The council sends an officer to inspect the site and, depending on the state of the vehicle, a decision is taken whether to remove it within 24 hours or seven days. The appropriate notice is stuck to the vehicle, which in itself can attract acts of vandalism, thereby rendering it a greater hazard than it was originally. If a seven-day notice is attached, removal takes place a little later than that and the vehicle is stored for some 10 days, or possibly for a lot longer if it is still taxed. If no one claims it at the end of the relevant period, the council sells it to a breaker for disposal. The whole process can take a few weeks. The costs are borne by the landowner and, as I have suggested, they are much too high, as my constituent has discovered.

In cases where a vehicle is abandoned on private land—perhaps in a prominent location—and is likely to become a hazard, and where the owner is not known or is not prepared to co-operate, councils have to place a 15-day notice on it. In those circumstances, cost recovery can prove very difficult indeed, which explains the reluctance of some councils to act in such cases. But where a council does act, it is the council tax payer who invariably foots the bill.

The Bill, combined with other legislative changes that I shall refer to later, will assist in improving the way in which abandoned cars are dealt with. The key is the speed and scope of action. Instead of waiting seven or 15 days, councils will henceforth be able to remove a vehicle immediately, which in practice will mean within 24 hours. Of course, councils can so act now, but only in respect of vehicles that are found to be in a dangerous or wrecked state.

It was pointed out earlier that because the Bill establishes a discretionary power rather than a duty, it need not be acted on. However, it is pretty certain that it will create a general expectation among the public—and, I hope, among councils—that the common practice will be the removal of such vehicles within 24 hours: removal not only from the public highway and public land, but from private land, unless, of course, the landowner has given permission for the vehicle to be there.

According to clause 11, private land includes a road "within the meaning of the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984", which means any road to which the public has access. Crucially, that includes roads owned by housing associations and registered social landlords, for example, but what about other land owned by RSLs to which the public has access? If car parks, play areas and greens are not included, in practice the Bill's scope will be severely limited. I am sure that the Government intend that such areas be included, but the wording of clause 11 is far from clear in that regard. I look for reassurance on this point—perhaps right now.

Alun Michael: Perhaps I can offer my hon. Friend that assurance. I agree that it is important for people to understand where legislation applies, and it is frequently the case that people get confused and wonder which areas are intended to be covered. I will be happy to give further chapter and verse about that when we debate the issue in Committee. I certainly underline the importance of the point that my hon. Friend is raising.

Mr. Hall: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that helpful intervention. I also look for assurance that the Bill will deal with the issue of deliberate abandonment, about which I believe the courts have set some tests. That will be essential if the welcome idea of serving a fixed penalty notice on a known perpetrator for abandoning a vehicle is to become an effective deterrent.

Finally, I want to stress the efficacy of keeping accurate records of car ownership—or, more precisely, of the registered keeper of vehicles. The Finance Act 2002 amended the Vehicle Excise and Registration Act 1994, and from January 2004 brought in continuous registration, which involves a monthly computer check of vehicle licensing by the DVLA. It has the ability to fine people up to £80 for not renewing or declaring a statutory off-road notice.

I know that my constituent, Mr. Meadows, hoped that this change in the law would require the registered keeper to be responsible for the costs associated with the vehicle in addition to the licence fee. I understand that, technically, it does not do that, but since the change was enacted, the DVLA generated an additional 4 million vehicle licensing, registration and SORN transactions in the first nine months of last year in comparison with the first nine months of the previous year—a considerable increase in business. More people are coming within the system and more accurate records mean that more people are traceable when it comes to parking fines or towing-away costs for abandoned vehicles.

It has to be acknowledged, however, that it will still be difficult to tackle people who deliberately operate outside the system—those who give false names and addresses and who frequently change address. They are the very people who disproportionately cause problems to everyone else through criminal and antisocial behaviour involving vehicles—not paying the road tax, for example, not registering ownership or not insuring vehicles, never mind abandoning them when they are no longer needed.

The reforms proposed in the Bill and the benefits of continuous registration will put the squeeze—if I may use that expression—on abandoned cars, but will not remove the need for more and more effective on-road enforcement. Thus, savings that should follow from speeding up the process may well need to be absorbed elsewhere. As to people who operate outside society and rely on false identity, we will not have the means to make life more difficult for them unless and until we introduce something that is not mentioned in the Bill—a system of identity cards.

In conclusion, I welcome the Bill, and especially its provisions to deal with abandoned cars. It proposes constructive steps, as I see it, without pretending to offer a total solution. It is part of a process. In my view, that process is in tune with my constituents' aspirations to tackle antisocial behaviour and improve the quality of the public realm.

7.4 pm

Mr. Neil Turner (Wigan) (Lab): I was rather perplexed when I saw that the Opposition were going to vote against the Bill. It seems to me that the problems that the Bill deals with are equally likely to occur in the northern parts of the rural area of my constituency as they are in the urban areas, and I would have thought that that was the same throughout the country.

Equally perplexing is the reference in the Opposition motion to the Bill bringing

"local authorities into conflict with police and other authorities which currently exercise powers in relation to abandoned vehicles and stray dogs".

One of the main points of the Bill is to give local authorities the ability to construct an overarching strategy to tackle many of those issues. The fact that powers are currently spread across different authorities and agencies is what brings the conflict into being at the moment, but the Bill is designed to tackle rather than exacerbate the difficulties to which the Opposition allude. I was also pleased to see that the quality of the local environment can be taken into account in crime reduction partnerships. It is important for them to have that ability.

I want to discuss part 6, which deals with dogs. Neither of the two Opposition Members who spoke about them is in his place at present, but I am sure that I am not alone among Government Members in having received many complaints about the packs of stray dogs that roam about the estates within our constituencies. They can cause huge problems for our constituents and they are difficult to deal with. The police attach low priority to that problem for understandable reasons: it is not one of their major concerns and looking after packs of dogs is not high among their priorities. Passing responsibility over to local authorities, which are generally more responsive to local needs, is a better way of tackling the problem.

I am not wholly clear about the changes proposed for dealing with dog fouling—another common problem in our constituencies. It appears from a cursory reading of the Bill that the fines can be levied only in places where a dog control area has been established. That seems a retrograde step—I hope that the Minister will be able to give some assurance, either in his summing up or in Committee, that that is not the case. I hope to hear that fines for dog fouling on pavements can be levied throughout our constituencies.

Moving on to fixed penalty notices, it is important that they are applied within the scale of fines that courts can levy for similar offences. Not doing so would undermine the belief that there is justice in the system. Once people feel that something is unjust, it undermines public confidence in the system. It is immensely important that people are supportive of the Bill. It is equally important that fixed penalty notices are viewed as an effective deterrent. I generally welcome the idea of allowing local authorities to vary the level of fines, which shows their responsibility and responsiveness to their communities. However, I am not fully convinced that local accountability in this particular case is more significant than the deterrent value of having a clear national tariff. It is another matter that I hope to explore with the Minister in Committee.

Similarly, I am unclear about the hypothecation of fines to local authorities and hope to discuss that further in Committee. I understand that it will provide an important new source of funding and enable local authorities to carry out their duties and responsibilities specified in the Bill. However, I hope that hypothecation will not mean tying down authorities too much, forcing them to use the funds gained from the fines to deliver goals specifically defined in the Bill. I want them to be able to use those funds for other purposes if they so wish. That is the thrust behind the present good idea of allowing good and excellent councils more discretion. I hope that we will continue to allow that to happen. As I understand it, the comprehensive performance assessment includes measures of environmental quality, so good and excellent councils will be in danger of losing their status if they do not achieve in that respect. I feel that that already provides sufficient incentive for councils to act in ways to promote the environment and that the proposals on hypothecation are therefore unnecessary.

The hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) mentioned clause 47, which gives powers to local authorities to run their own waste disposal authorities. As a former chair of an effective waste disposal organisation that was dismembered, on purely dogmatic grounds, by the previous Conservative Government, I welcome the proposal and hope that some local authorities are able to do that. I fear that it might be too late and that the huge costs involved will prevent it, but at least the proposal removes the pure dogma that existed previously.

The Bill will do much to improve people's attitudes to the environment. Statutes can do this, as we have seen in road traffic, where the wearing of seat belts and crash helmets and the use of breathalysers have made people more aware of road safety. That will be the case with the Bill. It is also important that we continue to educate and raise awareness through the work done by the Wigan-based ENCAMS authority, which enthusiastically supports the Bill, despite the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) did not include it in his list of organisations. ENCAMS works closely with schools and community organisations to raise awareness of problems such as litter.

The Bill will improve the environment in urban and rural areas and in communities throughout the country and it fully deserves our support. I shall be happy to vote for it tonight and will support it in Committee if chosen to be a member.

Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): Some of the hardest problems brought to me by constituents at surgeries concern antisocial behaviour and bad neighbours. These problems—noise, litter, abandoned vehicles, graffiti and vandalism—are associated with urban areas but, as many hon. Friends have pointed out, they are not exclusively urban problems. It is a surprise that so few Opposition Members representing rural communities have attended the debate.

When these problems take hold, they can change the character of a neighbourhood quickly. When there is litter in the gutter, people begin to think that it is acceptable to chuck litter in the gutter. The same goes for dog fouling, or when people park inconsiderately on the pavement or grass verge, chewing up the grass in front of people's houses. If there is not prompt action to deal with that, and if the community does not see that the inconsiderate driver pays a penalty for his actions, these problems will mushroom.

Conversely, when prompt action is taken, and when that action is taken together with enforceable and enforced penalties applied to transgressors, it helps to instil a sense of community pride and people become less willing to transgress the rules that are clearly established in their neighbourhood. Prompt action helps.

Fortunately, the Bill has received a good measure of support in local government from all political parties, which makes it all the more surprising that the official Opposition plan to vote against it. I have looked closely at the representations made to the Government by City of York council, my Liberal Democrat-controlled local authority. The council welcomed many of the measures—a welcome that was reiterated by the hon. Member for Guildford (Sue Doughty), who speaks for the Liberal Democrats.

The council welcomed the proposal to include environmental crime as a specific issue for local crime reduction partnerships. The council supports the decision to extend the litter offence to all types of land, including aquatic environments; that is, to the River Ouse and the River Foss. In York, the river is an important part of the landscape and townscape, an important recreational amenity and a source of drinking water.

The council welcomed the extension of cleansing notice powers to include graffiti and fly-posting in areas outside London and welcomed the proposal for fixed penalty notices for people who put out their refuse on the wrong day. We all know the problems that that can cause when cats, rodents or other animals get into the plastic bags and scatter the refuse around. I could go on but I would rather make progress. I thank City of York council for its support for this timely Bill.

I particularly welcome the measures that the Government are taking to tackle noise from private parties, licensed premises and malfunctioning burglar alarms, and their decision to take on the problem of light pollution, which has attracted people's attention more recently. That is seen as a particular problem in the countryside but it can be a problem in urban areas in public parks or open spaces or with light from industrial estates.

City of York council said that, because this was a new area, some guidance would be needed from the Department, perhaps in the form of a code of practice suggesting how local authorities should respond and what levels of light pollution would require enforcement action.

The council said that free literature distributed by retailers, pubs and clubs often results in litter and that that is a city-centre problem in York at all times of the day and night. The council welcomes the proposals to require consent to be obtained from a local authority by the people distributing such literature, but it makes the point that that in itself will not solve the problem because it is not the companies who produce the literature who drop it on the pavement—it is people. The enforcement powers, including the fixed penalty notices for dropping litter, are important, too.

Last but not least, I should like to say a word or two about chewing gum. I particularly welcome the proposal in clause 27 to amend the Environmental Protection Act 1990 to define cigarette butts and chewing gum as litter. When I raised the issue at Prime Minister's questions on 8 December, it provoked some chuckles of amusement from the chattering classes, who are no more present than the Opposition this evening. The BBC in particular thought that it was a peculiar issue to raise at Prime Minister's questions.

Some of us see the masses of e-mails that we get as a form of litter in itself, but I have to say that I received very strong support for what I said about chewing gum from many members of the public by letter and e-mail. One e-mail, from Mrs. Inge Knight, said:

> "Thank you for raising the question of chewing gum litter . . . If our council tax bill highlighted the cost maybe the amusement would fade somewhat and your excellent suggestion would be taken up. As you so rightly pointed out, the problem is easily solved, and the manufacturers could make themselves popular overnight, if they had the wit to provide easy disposal within the packaging. Maybe you should contact the Patent Office yourself, Mr. Bayley!"

I can assure her and the House that I will not do so because I do not want to stop the sensible suggestion that chewing gum be marketed in packaging that allows people to pop it somewhere in the back of the packet so that it is not dropped on the ground.

After I said what I did at Prime Minister's Questions, the Biscuit, Cake, Chocolate and Confectionary Association, which represents manufacturers, wrote to tell me that it works closely with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the Local Government Association, the Institute of Waste Management, the Department for Education and Skills and others to find ways to tackle the problem. In particular, it proposes a campaign later this year, paid for by the manufacturers, to try to persuade people not to drop gum on the ground and I welcome that.

The manufacturers association asserts that gum litter is caused by the irresponsible behaviour of a minority of chewers. I do not know whether that is true, but if it is, that minority does an awful lot of damage. The LGA estimates that local authorities in England spent £150 million last year on removing chewing gum from our streets. The average clean-up cost in a town centre is about £20,000. The hon. Member for Guildford mentioned that Westminster city council spent £90,000 last year cleaning Oxford street. That took seven weeks, but within 10 days the problem had returned. The council estimates—I wonder which council official was sent out to count them—that there are 300,000 pieces of gum on Oxford street.

I support the polluter pays principle and welcome the Government's proposal of fixed penalty notices for people who drop litter, including chewing gum. I am glad that local authorities will retain the fixed penalty revenue, but I do not think that that will raise the £150 million that it costs to remove the gum. The producers must do more. I am not the sort of person who leaps at the suggestion of putting a tax on producers—there is no guarantee that the tax income would get into the hands of the people who do the clearing up—but I do think that the producers need to do something about their packaging, and I ask the Minister to confirm that the joint chewing gum action group involving the Government and the manufacturers will address the issue.

Ms Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North) (Lab): The fact that so many Labour Members are taking part in the debate shows how much people care right across the country about the need to tackle pollution, fly-tipping and littering in our neighbourhoods. I welcome the debate, but I wish we were having a proper one, not looking across the Chamber at empty Benches. In my constituency, these matters are just about at the top of the list of what people have to deal with and I welcome the fact that Ministers are bringing real proposals before Parliament. I admit that some areas of the Bill perhaps need more attention to detail, and that can be considered in Committee, but I am pleased that the Government are tackling the issues, sending out a clear message that dealing with litter and graffiti and making our neighbourhoods clean really matter.

We have heard a lot of references to the report of the Select Committee on Environmental Audit, which will be further debated on Thursday. The way in which the Committee has taken evidence and helped to maintain pressure for doing something about problems in neighbourhoods and communities all over the country shows that the issue is one that we really have to tackle.

When the issues from the debate are looked at in detail, I hope that DEFRA Ministers will be able to use the expertise of the officers of the Chartered Institute of Environmental Health to see what needs to be ironed out in Committee. I speak as a vice-president of the institute, which has huge expertise.

I am pleased that so many different organisations and associations that have been consulted have played a part in shaping the Bill. The fact is that many people support it, from the Local Government Association, ENCAMS and other environmental groups and organisations to working parties set up by, for example, the police. The fact that we have legislation that will remove responsibility for stray dogs from the police to local authorities shows that day-to-day, detailed work done by many people has been acknowledged. I am pleased that the chief constable of Staffordshire, John Giffard, took part in that working party and that there has been progress into legislation.

When I speak to my constituents, I learn that whether they feel good about the place where they live, ensure that it is kept clean and have a sense of pride and belonging to a neighbourhood and community is linked to how we deliver on our policies. The public realm should be spick and span and we must have a way of making sure that local authorities implement the new powers the Bill will give them. I hope that the Minister will respond on the points about the money needed for that. I take the point that money will come in from fixed penalty notices to help with the financing of the Bill's implementation, but it will be important to have some pilot projects through the Environment Agency to show how we can make even more progress and to roll out best practice. It will come as no surprise to the Minister to hear that, when he comes to consider possible areas with the Environment Agency, it will be possible that Stoke-on-Trent will be one of the beneficiaries. The Environment Agency has something like £5 million, and we must consider options for achieving a joined-up approach that goes across the areas of responsibility of the police and magistrates courts while also engaging local people and getting everyone signed up to implementing the new powers.

The Environmental Audit Committee has set up a sub-committee on education and sustainable development. In all my years in Parliament looking at legislation, I have learned that we can legislate until the cows come home, but if we do not carry people with us and help to educate people in the wider sense, we will fail to have the legislation implemented on the ground. I hope that the Department will come back to us on how we can embed environmental education and achieve some environmental literacy about what changes of attitude will mean if we get citizens signed up to a new agenda. How can that be done in the wider education agenda? I hope that the Government will consider that question in some detail.

Earlier, I flagged up the issue of gating. In many areas, there are problems with alleys and keeping refuse out of them. People put refuse out the day after the bin men have been, for example. I welcome what the Bill does in dealing with such antisocial behaviour. Clause 2 says that highways agencies and local authorities are responsible for those alleyways, but I am concerned that Stoke-on-Trent has something like 21 km of unadopted alleyways, which are back entries to terraced homes. It seems absurd in the 21st century to have alleyways that are effectively gutters for nine months out of 12, with mud and water running down them, no proper drainage and no proper lighting. If someone puts in a new carpet through the back door, it begins instantly to be destroyed because of that. I urge the Government to see whether, in the Bill or in a wider joined-up approach, they could find ways, through neighbourhood renewal or through funding from the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, to speed up the way in which we adopt alleyways. Whatever powers are introduced in relation to providing a clean and green environment and neighbourhood, if we cannot deal with unadopted back alleyways, we will not achieve the goal of clean and green neighbourhoods where people feel proud to live. I urge the Government to consider that issue, as well as the cost of drainage and lighting, and the ongoing revenue costs. Certainly, across Stoke-on-Trent, at least 10 km urgently need to be adopted. I hope that the housing renewal programme can also help with that.

At the start of this debate, we heard a lot about whether this is a Bill for urban or rural areas. My view is that waste and antisocial behaviour has no boundaries—it stretches across rural and urban areas. From the discussions that I have had with parish councils in Bagnall, Brown Edge, Endon and Stanley, I feel sure that they will welcome the powers that they will have, as a result of this legislation, to deal with such issues.

In an initiative earlier this year, the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency came to help us deal with abandoned cars, which was a huge success. Anything that the Government do through this Bill to deal with abandoned vehicles much more quickly, to stop problems such as youths leaving them abandoned on nature reserves and people being injured, is welcome, as they are a blight on our neighbourhoods.

I sincerely hope that the Bill will have a swift passage, with an opportunity to discuss some detail in Committee. I hope that a strong message will go out across the country that Labour Members really care about this Bill and envisage it making a real improvement to the lives of people the length and breadth of the country.

Siobhain McDonagh (Mitcham and Morden) (Lab): I am grateful to have the opportunity to speak in this debate, as I am one of the many Labour Members who have been working hard to get these issues to the top of the agenda. Many of my hon. Friends have spent the past few years using every parliamentary device available, whether private Members' Bills, ten-minute Bills or early-day motions, to promote these issues, because they are of concern to their constituents. I am grateful that the Government have been brave enough to take on these issues, for which many would ridicule us. This is an example of MPs devoting time and attention to reaching out to their constituents knowing long before the policy wonks and editorial writers that the issue was important to people. I am delighted that over the past few years we have been able to introduce more and better measures in the fight against graffiti, abandoned cars, fly-tipping and so on. The Bill is a further move in the right direction.

In a survey that I carried out not long ago of the views of hundreds of my constituents, I discovered that the principal worries of people in Mitcham, Morden and Colliers Wood were crime and environmental quality-of-life issues such as graffiti, abandoned cars and fly-tipping. Those were the top priorities of nearly two thirds of my constituents. On almost every question, respondents supported the toughest measures, including imposing fixed penalty notices for environmental crimes such as graffiti, vandalism and litter, even on children—not for them the squeamishness of the Tories that we have seen today. Support for new powers was above 90 per cent. on almost every measure. That is how strongly people feel about them.

Every time we attempt to crack down on chewing gum, however, as my hon. Friend the Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley) suggests, we are laughed at by some high-minded commentator. We heard some examples of that from the hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess). We know that they are wrong, however, because unlike some we suffer from the same problems that our constituents experience. Because of the work carried out by MPs in giving that information to Ministers, we have seen: action against graffiti and a ban on the sale of spray paints to children; councils getting powers to remove graffiti from street furniture owned by the utilities; continuous registration of vehicles, which has reduced the number of untaxed cars on our streets by two thirds; and powers for councils to check firms' waste removal contracts, so that unscrupulous businesses can no longer just dump their rubbish on our streets.

MPs who work hard in their constituencies know that people hate graffiti, litter, fly-tipping and abandoned cars. We know that they want meaningful punishment for people who are guilty of such antisocial behaviour. That is why Back-Bench Labour MPs want the fight to continue, and why we support this Bill. It remains frustrating, however, that many existing powers are not yet in wide use, and that authorities are still only learning about how they can make a difference. I want to concentrate on that issue in the time that I have left.

My constituents support what the Government are doing, but people's comments in the survey that I mentioned earlier also give a strong sense of frustration. They need reassurance that new laws will be firmly policed and that there will be a strong chance of the perpetrators being punished. As one couple told me:

"Unfortunately, the reported number of prosecutions for any of these offences is extremely low and, in some cases, non-existent. I believe it is pointless to introduce further legislation which will not be enforced."

Another constituent said:

"Although I believe that the measures will help, the most effective deterrent is the probability of being caught and punished".

People believe that the Government are sincere in our intentions, and support our proposals, but they are concerned about our ability to deliver. They hear stories about lenient punishments that do not begin to cover the cost of the damage caused. For instance, in Merton—of which Mitcham and Morden forms half—Shane Simms admitted damaging buildings including a mosque and graveyards and peppering his tag all over buses, lorries, telephone boxes and many private and business premises around the borough. He caused tens of thousands of pounds worth of damage. The police, Merton council and many others invested hundreds of hours in his case, yet he ended up getting community service.

I want the courts to be tougher on vandals, but I also want to ensure that bodies such as Merton council and the police do not spend time and money chasing people who commit vandalism, graffiti or even littering without being able to cover the cost. Unless local authorities can afford to use their powers, we can be fairly sure that these problems will remain.

Last year, the Government accepted my suggestion that statutory undertakers must keep their street furniture graffiti-free, and that if they do not, Merton council, and several others in the pilot scheme, can step in, clean the graffiti and bill the companies for cleaning costs. Unfortunately, Telewest is refusing to comply, and Merton has not yet taken action. I hope that it will do so, because this is a dreadful problem, and I do not want Telewest to get away with it. That highlights a difficulty, however, because if councils do not have the front-end resources or the willpower to deal with the issue, or to recover all the costs, such policies will not completely solve the problem. Although other organisations have improved their approach as a result of these powers, it takes only a few antisocial organisations, such as Telewest, for the problem to persist. Similarly, Merton council already has the power to fine people who drop litter £50, but it does not do so—not a single fine has been applied—because the process is complicated, and councils cannot recover the full cost.

The Bill will tackle many of these problems. It will enable councils and the Environment Agency to recover investigation and clear-up costs of fly-tipping. It will allow them to recover the costs of returning abandoned shopping trolleys to their owners—I am sure that that will be a source of amusement for tomorrow's papers. It will allow them to fine businesses that fail to produce waste transfer notes and to keep the receipts.

I know for a fact that Merton, and councils like it, would love to be able to take advantage of the powers in the Bill, but I want to ensure that they can do so without having to increase the amount of money that they need from council tax payers. The last thing that I want is for people to accuse us of creating new powers that are subsequently never used. That is why we must monitor what happens on the ground when these powers are introduced, to ensure that they are being used, and if they are not, we will consider what the disincentives are.

When my right hon. Friend the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality launched "Living Places", he said:

"Enforcement bodies need useable powers . . . with the option of reclaiming costs. The powers that exist are regarded as limited and weak."

He also said that

"we want to ensure that those who are responsible for ensuring that our public spaces are clean and safe have the powers that they need . . . We need everyone from businesses to community groups and individuals to share a common sense of pride and respect for our shared spaces".

I agree. My constituents have to pay more and more through their council tax to clear up fly-tipping, graffiti, abandoned cars, litter and so many other things.

Unless we can reduce antisocial behaviour and improve the environment, we will see a decline in participation and in voting, because although people may think that we are good at improving the big things—unemployment, the health service or the economy—we cannot allow them to feel that we are powerless to improve the condition of their streets. For the sake of thousands of people in my constituency and in others, who want to see cleaner neighbourhoods, where they feel safer and in more control, I support the Bill.

Mr. Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell) (Lab): This is a welcome Bill, which will provide relief to our constituents who daily face the myopic behaviour of a minority of people who defile and demean our local communities. It provides more powers for local councils and the police to tackle the low-level environmental despoliation of our streets and green spaces, and gives local people a greater voice in that seemingly never-ending struggle.

My experience on a recent Environmental Audit Committee inquiry into these issues taught me that there is no ready institutional answer to dealing with the antisocial mentality and dysfunctional behaviour that lead some people to make life a misery for their neighbours. When there exists a significant minority of people who simply do not care about the impact of their behaviour on others, it is not easy to bring them into line, but laws that give local communities the protection they need are clearly required. The Bill goes a long way towards addressing that deficiency.

I feel obliged to say, however, that the Government's assumption that extra resources will not, in general, be needed to make the legislation really effective needs to be carefully assessed. I say that even though we now have more police officers than at any other time in history. We now have police community support officers, and as a member of the Standing Committee on the Police Reform Act 2002, I seem to recall that there were people on both sides of the House who thought they were not a good idea—but how the sceptics have been proved wrong. We have also witnessed some of the largest increases in local government funding, well above the rate of inflation, and next year's settlement is no exception.

There are, however, still aspects that I hope, after this debate and other representations, the Government will consider carefully. In my district, covered by Leeds city council, with a population of 750,000 people, we had until recently an innovative and determined Labour-run authority that was bent on investing more in fighting antisocial behaviour. It introduced a noise nuisance hotline and antisocial behaviour crackdowns, helped to secure more PCSOs than anywhere else outside the Metropolitan police area and generally sought to be aware of people's concerns.

Yet antisocial behaviour does not cease, and it seems that money cannot always be saved in tackling it—perhaps it is simply that our expectations are raised. For example:

"In 1998/9 the Council allocated £10,000 to remove graffiti and illegal flyposting from the city centre, which was more than adequate. In the current financial year, more than twice that amount has already been spent and not all graffiti is being removed."

Those were the words of John Kearsley, the council's chief support officer, in evidence to the Environmental Audit Committee in February 2004. He went on to say that at that time there were just 13 dedicated environmental enforcement officers to cover the whole city. Clearly, with the extra powers conferred on the council, which will be well publicised, not least by those of us who will be voting for them tonight, public expectations will be raised. New powers do not always mean that extra resources are required, but in this case they will be required, and we shall need to be alert to new ways of finding the money to achieve the Bill's objectives.

Let us consider alley gating. The idea of gating off alleyways, or ginnels as we call them in Leeds, is excellent, provided proper consultations are carried out. I can think of several areas in my constituency where the potential for gating is evident, but in one case where a ginnel was gated, the overall design fell somewhat short of a complete solution, as not only the entrances needed gating but the boundaries of the ginnel, adjacent to people's gardens, needed extra protection. Miscreants will simply go through people's gardens if the fencing is not up to the job. All that costs money, and the sums are not insignificant. An effective gating system could cost tens of thousands of pounds. In Tingley, in my constituency, I talked to constituents about gating a network of ginnels that connected different streets, the main branch of which was the real problem, but it was fed by tributary paths. In such a case, gating would be an expensive solution and even then, because of its nature, not all residents would want interference with their rights of way.

To make the powers effective, we will need to find new resources. Certainly, some will come from more effective working at local level, but there are clearly resource issues in both capital and revenue terms, especially if we want more dedicated environmental enforcement officers. On the latter point, it is obvious that noise and light pollution problems are primarily night-time complaints. The staffing costs are consequently higher, and may not be easily accommodated simply by finding more effective ways of working—perhaps through shift patterns.

I want to comment on some other aspects of this excellent Bill. I welcome the extra powers that parish and town councils will acquire to enable fixed penalty notices to be given out for things such as littering. Thanks to the Labour Government, such councils can now make a much bigger contribution to combating such low-level environmental crimes; for example, by helping to fund PCSOs. Once again, Labour's crime fighting initiatives, despite meeting initial opposition, have been grasped locally by all parties, some of which even pay us the compliment of taking the credit for them.

The Bill proposes regulations on how the receipts from such fixed penalty income should be spent. I hope that in the early stages such money will be used solely to offset the costs of employing people, such as PCSOs, who have a role in enforcing the law. Such legislation will have a far greater impact if there is a clear causal effect all the way through, so that people can see how transparently and effectively it is working, and that it does not become just another funding stream for the general pot.

Some parish councils might like some of the money collected from fixed penalty notices to be spent on all sorts of other things, the impact of which would not be so evident. Where that happened, parish councils might be less likely to improve their overall effectiveness, and might instead try to extend their functions beyond what is appropriate to that level of local government, which after all is funded by the not so accountable means of a precept. I know from local experience that precepts can be greatly increased without a commensurate increase in service delivery. Money has sometimes been used to increase balances at the taxpayer's expense. I hope that the Secretary of State will ensure that the use of extra powers in lower-tier councils is carefully monitored.

I very much welcome the new controls to be placed on the free distribution of printed matter, much of which is distributed on behalf of businesses. Of course, they have to advertise, but far too much of that material ends up on the streets. In my constituency, in the circulation area of a free weekly newspaper, copies are as likely to end up in the garden or on the doorstep as through the letterbox, adding to the litter problem, and in some cases letting burglars know which houses are unoccupied. In the same category, sadly, fall a number of charities, which chuck plastic collection bags on our doorsteps or leave them hanging out of the letterbox. Presumably, the idea is that if people have nothing to put in the bags the collectors will pick them up on their next round, but that does not always happen.

Charities and some other groups are exempt from the provisions of clause 23, but they should not be exempt from the expectation that they should adhere to the standards imposed by statute on others. I would also appreciate it if the Minister would make it plain whether the exemption for religious organisations is to be defined in the Bill in the same way as the protection of religious freedoms is defined in the draft convention on human rights, to ensure that discrimination on grounds of one's religion, or none, does not take place in the context of clause 23.

Finally, noise nuisance is addressed in the Bill in terms both of alarms going off and of noise from premises generally. Although those are serious problems, I wonder whether they are on the same scale as what is, I believe, a more prevalent nuisance: noise from cars and other vehicles. Would it be possible to extend the provisions to vehicles? Car alarms seem far more prone to go off than burglar alarms, and the other type of car noise—from monster bass sound systems—is a real and deliberately manufactured nuisance. How many streets are blighted by those mobile noise terrorists, who clearly cannot hear anything outside their vehicles, and who often, because of their semi-blacked-out windows, can hardly see anything either, as they drive around? Such vehicles are almost as bad as the motor cycles that have had the silencers knocked out of their exhausts.

I do not understand why some people want to advertise their stupidity, but advertise it they do, causing considerable annoyance to residents who just want to enjoy a bit of peace and quiet in their own home. I hope that the Government will ensure that the use of fixed penalty notices for noise pollution can be made more widely available to tackle that problem.

Mr. Bob Blizzard (Waveney) (Lab): This is a very important Bill indeed. That is demonstrated not just by the number of Labour Members who are seeking to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but by the fact that the public think so too. One does not have to knock on too many doors or stand on too many doorsteps to know that. I rarely come across anyone who wants to discuss the five economic tests for the euro, the Freedom of Information Act 2000, or even the Human Rights Act 1998, but I regularly come across people who are concerned about litter, fly-tipping and abandoned vehicles. Those people will be amazed that there is no interest at all in that tonight among Opposition Members, and they will be shocked that the Conservative party will vote against the Bill.

My particular interest in the Bill relates to litter. I introduced two private Member's Bills on litter in 2001 and 2003, and I have always believed that litter is a very serious issue; it is not just unsightly, but a health risk, and it affects urban and rural communities, streets, open spaces, and in coastal constituencies such as mine, our beaches that mean so much to us.

It is an important matter in my constituency. My local newspaper, the Lowestoft Journal, has been running a campaign to clean up the streets for some time. People write in and report things to the paper; it focuses on the issue, and the aim is to put pressure on the local authority to do something about it. The campaign has had only limited success, because the truth is that we in this country are not very good at dealing with litter. The culture of litter management is wrong.

Despite having laws that prohibit the dropping of litter—fixed penalties were introduced as long ago as 1990—most of the time, if we are truthful about it, we tolerate that practice. We walk around in it for most of the day, and we concentrate our efforts on clearing it up.

at a huge cost—something like £450 million a year—but we then complain if the council or someone else does not clean it up properly or effectively. That approach is rather like that taken by Sisyphus: it offers no solution at all. There is evidence that the more effective and efficient we are at clearing away litter, the more of it is dumped, especially in terms of fly-tipping and abandoned cars. We have not tackled the problem at source, and we have not seriously enforced our litter laws.

The Government doubled the fixed penalty fine to £50, but, as I said in introducing one of my private Member's Bills, no more than about 3,000 fixed penalty notices were issued a year. I have further details, I apologise to my right hon. Friend the Minister for the figures that I gave earlier; they relate to the period before November 2003, when the Local Government Act 2003 came into force, but they make the point about how bad the then situation was. Only 76 out of 359 local authorities issued any fixed penalty notices at all, and of the 1,366 notices that were issued in that period, 624—nearly half—were issued by just five authorities. So if authorities take litter seriously, they can get down to dealing with it, but most authorities do nothing about it at all.

The problem has been that those local authorities have not had the resources to carry out the enforcement because they had to pay the money raised by the fines to central Government. In fact, very little money reached central Government because hardly any enforcement was taking place. So when I proposed those private Member's Bills, I introduced the simple idea of allowing local authorities to keep the revenue from the fixed penalties to provide an income stream for enforcement—in other words, as has been said, to make the polluter, not the taxpayer, pay for dealing with the problem of litter. I was delighted when the Government incorporated that idea in the Local Government Act 2003, but I expressed concern at the time to my right hon. Friend the Minister about whether local authorities would take up the new powers that were given and spend that revenue specifically on enforcement or in a broader way.

The pilot schemes that took place during the year before the 2003 Act came into force showed that authorities, such as Newcastle and Manchester—two of the five that had issued fixed penalty notices—could have success, but that even some of the pilot authorities that had signed up to public service agreements did nothing to use the powers that they were given. Since the 2003 Act, some progress has been made, but in the year 2003–04, still only 7,500 fixed penalties were issued for littering—not a lot nationally for the amount of litter that is dropped on our streets and open spaces.

We know from our own experience that many local authorities—probably most of them—such as my own, Waveney district council, have done absolutely nothing. They have not taken up the new powers. They have not changed their own culture of how they tackle litter. That was picked up in the Audit Commission's recent comprehensive performance assessment of Conservative-controlled Waveney district council that said:

> "Key areas of weakness include weak performance in maintaining a clean and tidy environment. Street cleaning is not effective in Waveney. The council does not make full use of the range of enforcement powers available although it has effectively used some powers including those to tackle litter on private land. The dog warden service has been discontinued and, although the street wardens tackle a wider range of issues, they do not have the power to issue on the spot fines for dog fouling or littering."

The problem is that the council has not shared those findings with the public, so they are still not aware of what their council should be doing.

I very much welcome the Bill. I particularly welcome the measures that deal with litter, specifically the idea that local authorities can decide, within guidelines yet to be given, what the fixed penalty should be, but the default amount will be £75, so we can look forward to some heftier fines, thus producing a bigger income stream for those local authorities that take up that option. Local authorities will no longer have an excuse for not using the powers available to them.

I welcome the fact that beaches will be defined as areas where the litter law takes effect. I am delighted that it is also proposed that it will be an offence to drop litter on private land as well as on public land. It is a good idea that well-organised parish and town councils will have some powers. It is a particularly good idea that litter authorities will be able to authorise individuals other than their own employees to issue fixed penalty notices, as there have been some problems when using contracting companies.

My final point is that there will be no excuse for councils not to take up the new powers, but the Government and, indeed, the House still have a role in ensuring that they take them up. We do not want postcode litter enforcement in this country. I ask my right hon. Friend the Minister whether his Department will carry out an annual survey of how many local authorities use the fixed penalty powers. Will he survey the number of enforcement officers employed by each local authority and the number of fines issued by each local authority? May we please have a league table, which is monitored? Perhaps we should consider penalties for not using fixed penalties, but we must change the culture, putting the onus on the polluter, not the taxpayer.

Our constituents care about litter, and they want greater action to be taken. They are proud of their neighbourhoods, and they want them to be clean. As taxpayers, they want such action to be taken. They want to make the litter louts pay. If we can focus our efforts on that, we would have cleaner neighbourhoods all around this country.

Jane Griffiths (Reading, East) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to take part in this important debate on this important Bill. I am pleased in particular to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard), whose constituency is totally different from mine. His is coastal and mine is inland, although this debate points up the fact that we share the same problems to do with the quality of our local environment.

Most of us remember the European elections in 1999, when the opportunity to take a swipe at the Government was taken by those who did not bother to vote or who did not vote Labour. Notionally, almost every Labour seat gained in 1997 would have been lost at a subsequent general election if that result in 1999 had been replicated. Why am I talking about the 1999 European elections in a debate on this Bill? One seat gained in 1997 that would not notionally have been lost in 1999 was that of Brent, North.

I had a discussion about that result with my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner), who is not present but is aware that I was planning to refer to him. That led me to import into Reading, East what became known as the Gardiner method. I have spent almost every weekend since knocking on doors in my constituency. I am not unusual in that; many hon. Members are regularly to be found on the doorsteps—otherwise we would not be standing here this evening referring to what our constituents tell us on such occasions. However, most MPs use the roving surgery method, whereby leaflets are delivered and people are asked to put one in their window if they want their MP to call on them. The MP and their team then call on those displaying the leaflet. The Gardiner method is different: everyone gets a leaflet saying that their Member of Parliament is coming to see them, and every door is knocked on. Every household is contacted and asked whether there is anything at all that they want to raise with their MP.

This is not the occasion to enter into a debate about the merits of different methods of contacting our constituents, but the Gardiner method produces an unprompted view from my constituents on what bothers them, and that brings me to today's debate. What have been raised most with me are the very matters with which the Bill is concerned: abandoned vehicles, fly-tipping, fly-posting, graffiti, dog mess. I believe that that experience is shared by my hon. Friends. I echo the regret that so few Opposition Members are present; I imagine that their constituents will have noticed and that when the election comes they will vote accordingly.

I have often made the point publicly to local journalists in my constituency about what matters to people, and those journalists have expressed surprise that constituents are not more concerned about the war in Iraq or national themes such as the freedom of information. Those are not the things that people raise on the doorstep. If one goes out and talks to people where they live about what matters to them, the issues raised are the subjects of this Bill.

That is a powerful argument against those who deride the Bill as not important. We have seen some of that derision reflected in the media. I read in one national newspaper over the weekend that the Bill was a rag-tag piece of legislation, lacking in vision and typical of what might have been expected from John Major's Government before 1997. I suggest that the journalist who wrote that talks to real people about what concerns them. That journalist will find that the Bill does concern people.

In March 2001 I initiated an Adjournment debate on abandoned vehicles—one of the first occasions on which that issue was raised in the House. Action did follow that debate, in Reading and Wokingham, and nationally. I very much welcome the even greater powers that the Bill gives councils to remove some abandoned vehicles from the street immediately. The sometimes lengthy delays in removing such vehicles, which become a hazard, concern people.

I also welcome the powers to deal with nuisance parking—offering for sale two or more vehicles or repairing a vehicle on the road as part of a business. Too many times it has been difficult to get action taken against such vehicles, but the practice has caused problems for small garages in my constituency, which pay for premises and other necessary overheads. People repairing vehicles on the street will also pour unwanted oil down drains, causing environmental problems. The new powers will therefore be welcomed not just by individuals but by small car repair businesses in my constituency.

I understand why the power to deal with offering vehicles for sale has been applied to two or more vehicles. After all, if someone wants to sell their own car, they might put a sign in the window offering it for sale and we do not want to penalise people for parking their car on the street or in their drive because they are offering it for sale. However, someone in my constituency serially offered vehicles for sale from the roadside at a secondary shopping centre. Each time only one vehicle was on the street, but as soon as it was sold, another appeared. The mobile phone number given to contact if interested in one of the cars was the same in all cases. Colleagues of mine rang the number on more than one occasion and the same person always answered. That person was using the public highway as a garage, causing a nuisance to my constituents and businesses, and the parking space taken up by the vehicle could not be used by those wanting to go to the shopping parade—yet nothing could be done by the police or the council.

I am concerned that the Bill would not offer an opportunity to deal properly with such a nuisance and I hope that my right hon. Friends will try to find a way to address that problem as the Bill progresses. Perhaps an amendment could be tabled to change the number of vehicles from two to one but include provision about intent to sell as a business. In that way, the nuisance that businesses and constituents have raised with me arising from a single, serial vehicle seller could be dealt with, but ordinary people trying to sell their own cars would not be caught by the provision.

To take issue with the journalist who disparaged the Bill over the weekend, let us consider the new requirement for local crime and disorder reduction partnerships to take antisocial behaviour affecting the local environment into account in developing crime and disorder strategies. That is most welcome, as it will put the views expressed to me by my constituents on the doorsteps of Reading and Woodley at the heart of action by our police and local councils to tackle that nuisance. The concerns expressed to me will be put at the centre of plans to tackle the nuisance that people experience in their everyday lives.

The greater use of fixed penalty notices as proposed in the Bill is most welcome too, particularly the opportunity for local authorities to keep the income from the fines to pay towards cleaning up our environment. I realise that people might use the same argument against that as they do about fines from speed cameras. My response is the same: "If you don't want to pay the fine, don't do the crime." I hope that the hypothecation of income from the fines will allow the expansion of services to catch people littering, fly-posting, fly-tipping, painting graffiti and allowing fouling by dogs.

In particular I welcome the opportunity for parish councils to issue fixed penalty fines in response to some of those problems, and I look forward to Woodley and Earley town councils in my area coming up with imaginative schemes to deal with that nuisance. It is what the people living in those areas want. I just hope that because Woodley is run by the Liberal Democrats it does not suffer the same fate as Woodley centre did when the Liberal Democrats ran Wokingham council and forgot to bid for money for closed-circuit television to tackle crime. I hope that this time the council will be responsive to its residents and that I will not have to run another campaign among local people so that the council does what it should.

There is one aspect that the Bill does not cover but which I would like to see in it: the power for local authorities to remove unnecessary street furniture. My constituency covers the entire town centre of Reading. In the main pedestrianised area of the town centre, there are a number of public payphone kiosks. The company that installed the kiosks has gone out of business and it is no longer possible to use them, but they remain in the street, getting in the way of people walking along it. They have been vandalised and so have become dangerous, yet the council is not currently in a position to remove them. Even if it did remove them, who would pay for doing so? The non-existent company cannot do so; perhaps the taxpayer would have to pay. I want a power in the Bill to remove third-party street furniture in the interests of safety and amenity. It would follow the philosophy of the rest of the Bill if the council were able to claim against the company responsible, or even against the administrators or receivers, for the cost of removing redundant third-party street furniture.

I welcome the provisions on fly-tipping. Far too many people think that they can avoid their responsibilities to the environment by dumping their rubbish. They cost all the rest of us, because we have to pay for the removal of such rubbish.

This is an important Bill for tackling the problems that affect people where they live. It is an example of this House and our Government doing best what they should do: introducing legislation to make the lives of ordinary, hard-working people in this country better.

8.9 pm

Barbara Follett (Stevenage) (Lab): Like my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East (Jane Griffiths), I welcome the Bill—and I know that the people of Stevenage do, too. I have been incredibly frustrated in the seven years that I have been an MP because I have been unable to do anything about the things that concern my constituents most. Labour Members have talked a great deal about that, but Conservative Members have been mainly absent or have derided the Bill. They must be out of touch with what is happening in the real world.

My constituency is both urban and rural. Some 59,000 of my voters are in the urban area. Another 9,000 are in a very rural area. The problems are the same, however. There is not a divide. I live in the rural area and littering is worse there than it is in the urban area.

I want to concentrate on the problems facing a new town and the opportunities that the architecture of the 1950s and 1960s gives the graffiti artist. The concrete walls are the perfect canvass for graffiti. The underpasses are crying out to have things painted over them. The chewing gum that attaches itself to the town centre costs £45,000 a year to remove. If Westminster is spending £90,000 on de-gumming Oxford street, just imagine what we are doing in Stevenage.

I am not a chewer. I do not know how many hon. Members would own up to that vile habit, but I know that some do it. I have even seen some Ministers do it on the Front Bench, and I hope that the gum is disposed of well. Britain has an untidy culture. We only have to cross over to Paris to see the difference in people's attitudes. We should look at how people maintain their homes. I confess to being a tidiness freak. My five children say that I am in politics so that I can tidy up the world. This is my attempt to do so. I am glad that the Government are giving me a chance to pursue that because we need to tidy up.

Stevenage needs gating because the structure of the pedestrianised alleyways built by the planners of the 1950s and 1960s provides the perfect place for youths to race their mopeds. Those mopeds do not have silencers—so not only is it dangerous, but it is noisy. Most of that activity takes place after dark. There is gang racing and people are using motor cycles as well. For me, the gating provision is not only necessary but urgent.

Like many other hon. Members, I have fought to deal with abandoned cars, especially during the 2001 general election when I noticed an enormous number of such cars in the rural section of my community. I also initiated an Adjournment debate on that and have worked with the Government on some of their changes to the law. I welcome the further changes. It is incredibly frustrating to see a car sitting in the same place for 15 days and for it to be vandalised or set on fire by youths. It costs this country £230 million to deal with burnt-out vehicles. I can think of many other uses for that money. It costs Stevenage borough council £100,000 to deal with abandoned cars. That relatively small borough council spends more than £2.5 million on clearing up items mentioned in the Bill. Although it can find the money, it will welcome the fixed penalty system because it will get some revenue at last.

I am also glad that the selling and repairing of cars on the roadside is to be halted. As my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, East said, that fouls the pavements. In a new town, which was built when not many people had cars, people tend to pursue that activity on grass verges. It also ties up for long periods the few parking places that we have.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Siobhain McDonagh) said how people cease to engage with politics when they find that we are powerless to change anything. That is one of the most important things that the Bill addresses. If we cannot change those daily irritants of the Englishman and Englishwoman in their castles—their homes—what are we in this building for? I am amazed that the Conservatives are voting against the Bill. The hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess) talked about his constituent who is affected by graffiti. What comfort does he offer that man? Nothing at all other than saying that people should take responsibility for it. Yes they should, but they do not and we probably have to make them do so. I regret the existence of the nanny state, but occasionally we need it.

The only thing I have in common with the hon. Gentleman is that I am the proud owner of a black Labrador. I also own a yellow Labrador. I am a doting dog owner. The hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Derek Conway) talked about the comfort that dogs bring. Mine are commuting dogs. They come in and out of London. I know that the fouling of pavements in Westminster is a problem. I carry those little blue bags and the pooper-scoopers. According to the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, there are 6.8 million dogs in Britain, rather more than the hon. Gentleman noted. They foul an amazing amount. The figure is incredible. Some 1,000 tonnes of dog fouling is produced a day, and my two contribute their bit. We have to get people to pick it up, but people do not. They say, "How can I control my dog?" It is not about controlling the dog, but about people controlling their own actions. The polluter must pay.

On graffiti, Stevenage has a good graffiti-busting team, but it costs the town's taxpayers £60,000 a year to clean up. I welcome identity cards simply because I will not get another shopkeeper saying to me, "I didn't know whether he was 16 or not, so I sold him the aerosol." That is one reason why we need ID cards and I cannot wait for them to be introduced.

Fly-posting costs Stevenage £13,000 a year to remove. It is not one of our greatest problems, although the concrete walls of the town centre offer the perfect place to stick posters. I should like my right hon. Friend to think about estate agents' signs as a form of fly-posting. Estate agents just leave those things to rot in alleyways and hedgerows once they have let or sold—or not sold—a property. They should have a duty to remove those signs in a timely fashion. I have just won a battle on that on behalf of a constituent.

It is a big welcome from Stevenage for the Bill, although I am sad that we need to legislate for clean neighbourhoods and environments in this day and age. However, how many of us are guilty of chucking papers on the Floor of the Chamber and of not caring what happens to them? Ministers have been honourable tonight and nothing is on the Floor, but there is often a great deal of waste. We have a master-servant mentality because I know that someone else will pick up after me, as someone said to me in Stevenage. The man who pulled up near me when I was walking my dogs on a country lane and who chucked out an entire McDonald's dinner also thought that someone else would pick up after him. But we should be doing that ourselves. Then, we would not have to spend all this money on enforcing something that, with a little bit of thought and care, would not be necessary.

Claire Ward (Watford) (Lab): I am very pleased to have the opportunity to support the Second Reading of this Bill. Many of the proposed measures, which have been mentioned by my colleagues, will be of great benefit to people in my constituency who continue the suffer the effects of antisocial behaviour and the damage that litter, graffiti, fly-posting, fly-tipping and abandoned cars inflict on our environment, to name just a few of the things that the Bill will tackle.

We all want to live in a pleasant environment. We want clean, safe streets. Yet when an area becomes untidy and unloved, it is easy for those who live there to lose the respect for it that they once had. Once graffiti and litter take control, it often becomes too difficult to take pride in a street. The majority of the population do not litter, abandon cars or scribble graffiti on walls and buildings. They deserve the support and protection of their local authority and the Government in cleaning up the place. The Bill is for the majority of decent, ordinary people who want to live in a clean, safe environment.

There is no doubt in my mind that we face a greater problem than we did many years ago, and there is no doubt about the need for the Bill. I certainly remember that, as a child, I would not have thrown litter on to the street. On the contrary, everything disposable—sweet papers, cans, packets of crisps—was put into our pockets or bags and placed in a bin at the first opportunity. Now, sadly, it is common to see people come out of a newsagent, rip open their packet of cigarettes and discard the wrapper on the street, without a single thought about the cost of clearing up the mess. Cigarette butts, too, are a filthy but common addition to street litter, and I am pleased to note that they are now being classed as litter. Despite existing laws, there are few cases of fines for littering, so it is clear that local authorities need more powers to tackle the problems that affect our towns and local environments.

That is one reason why I welcome the Bill, and I am both surprised and saddened that the Conservative Opposition have decided not to support it. I listened carefully to the opening remarks of the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo). Not only did I hear nothing about what the Conservatives might propose, but in many cases I heard the hon. Gentleman agreeing with the need for legislation. I remain baffled, as I think most members of our communities will be, about why the Conservatives have chosen not to support the Bill. Of course, Bills often require amendment, but the time to do that, as someone who has been on the Front Bench for many years should know, is in Committee, rather than opposing the whole Bill on Second Reading.

One reason that the Conservatives gave for opposing the Bill is their strange belief that it affects urban communities and ignores rural ones. I would not claim for a moment that Watford is a rural community; it is an urban environment, but it is surrounded by rural communities. Although I do not have many farmers in my constituency, the one or two who do live there have complained for many years about the problem of fly-tipping on their land, saying that they have to pick up the cost and no one is there to support them. I hope that the Bill will provide some comfort to them.

I also welcome the fact that as Watford is part of Hertfordshire, we have many town and rural parish councils and they will now be given an opportunity to contribute to controlling litter and graffiti through the use of fixed penalty notices. I hope that the parish councils in my constituency, particularly Abbots Langley, will take that opportunity.

[Claire Ward]

I want to concentrate on a clause that will make a huge difference to many areas in Watford. Antisocial behaviour has been a particular problem for the people living on the Sherwoods estate. The design of the estate is such that it is dissected by an exceptionally high number of pathways. The community has been working closely with the police over the past 18 months to combat antisocial behaviour, and they have welcomed the many powers put into the toolbox for police and local authority use over that time. Dispersal powers under section 30 of the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003, antisocial behaviour orders and acceptable behaviour contracts are among the measures used to try to curb the problems affecting local people.

The difficulty is that the nature and design of the estate means that youths being chased by the police can disperse very quickly through the pathways. In addition, as many of the paths run along the back or side of people's properties, they provide easy access to those who want to try unlawfully to gain entry to people's houses and gardens. That does not help when one is trying to tackle crime and antisocial behaviour. On top of that, Hertfordshire county council's difficulties with lighting contracts means that many of the areas and paths on the estate do not have sufficient lighting. All that means that, sadly, the estate has suffered from antisocial behaviour.

Earlier last year, the residents association, which formed to try to unite in dealing with those problems, asked the county council to make the relevant orders to close some of the pathways. The plan had been agreed by residents and the police, and although some routes would be gated, others would be left for people to use. The community had even been told that money was available to make sure that those gating orders could be made. However, under the current legislation the task is not so easy. The county council told residents that it had to put out a notice to inform various organisations of the plan, including the Ramblers Association, the Open Spaces Society and the British Horse Society.

Anybody who knows Watford, and in particular some of the estates, will know that it is not an area where one frequently sees ramblers. Even smaller is the chance of anybody using the paths in the middle of a housing estate for horse riding. I would not have believed it possible that the community's wishes could be thwarted by those organisations. Sadly, however, it was possible. Despite the attempts by Hertfordshire county council to reach a compromise and my attempts to contact the organisations' head offices, we were unable to reach an agreement on the paths that the residents wanted gated, even though there would have been a sufficient number of paths left for people to use.

The responses that I received from the organisations were varied. The British Horse Society merely acknowledged my letter and told me that it would be writing to me with more detail and in more depth in due course. That was in October, and I am still waiting. The Open Spaces Society sent what was, frankly, a rather arrogant letter that completely missed the point. In displaying such arrogance, the organisations seem to forget the people who have to endure the problems of antisocial behaviour and live, day in and day out, with the difficulties that result from the environment in which they live. They should make the decision, but others may decide that there is a greater principle at stake, keeping a pathway open rather than simply closing and gating it.

I hope that the Bill, in which I have great confidence, will provide people on the Sherwoods estate and elsewhere in Watford with an opportunity to have gating in areas where it is needed to tackle antisocial behaviour.

Dr. Alan Whitehead (Southampton, Test) (Lab): Like many hon. Members, I have puzzled about why the Conservatives decided to oppose this excellent Bill tonight, and I have come up with an explanation, which I shall advance later. However, I might excuse the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo), as I got the—perhaps entirely erroneous—impression that he was winking at us while making his introductory remarks and that, in fact, he did not believe a word that he was saying. I might be entirely wrong about that.

This weekend, I spoke to residents of the Saltmead estate in my constituency. Although it is a well-appointed estate, the residents expressed considerable concern about graffiti, fly-posting, litter and other problems. If I told them that there was a Bill before Parliament that could make a real difference but that the Conservatives in the House of Commons argued that there was too much emphasis on urban areas so they would oppose it, they would not believe me. Residents around Gover road want a cutway and bridge closed or gated under the new legislation. The council thinks it does not have the powers to do that, even though the cutway and bridge seem to serve the sole function of enabling people to cause damage and run off undetected. If I told the residents that there was a Bill that would allow legal gating of that cutway and bridge, but that the Conservatives opposed it because they were worried about producer responsibility for chewing gum manufacturers, they would again not believe me.

Some have characterised the Bill as a number of disconnected measures, but it is a deeply connected Bill. It is about liveability—the ability of communities to live well on the basis of shared respect for their environment and for the circumstances in which they live. All of us hear in our surgeries about how our constituents' lives are being made hell by noise, graffiti or antisocial behaviour, and how their community is, as they see it, being degraded by fly-tipping, litter, abandoned cars and so on. Each act is carried out, often with no thought, by individuals who take the rights that they gain from living in a community but who, for some reason, decide on the occasion of their act that the responsibility that goes with it is not for them. Or they think that one such act—one van load of waste tipped in a field, one car abandoned in a car park, one tag on a wall announcing, "KBK kicks butt"—will make no difference, but it does.

I liken that sort of behaviour to irresponsible driving. We all drive—or at least, most of us do—on the same side of the road not only for our own safety, but for the benefit and mutual convenience of others. We do not consider that the nanny state has forced us all to drive on the correct side of the road and—with some exceptions—we do not think that a brief episode of driving on the wrong side of the road will go unnoticed. It does not, and it causes disproportionate disruption to all the other considerate behaviour on the road, so it is not surprising that it is an offence. Environmental crime should be an offence for the same reason.

Whether one calls it social capital or, as some have, the neighbourly society, it is a method—in this Bill, a positive one—of maintaining and strengthening the cohesion of society and liveability for the whole neighbourhood. The signals given by abandoned vehicles, fly-tipping, graffiti and litter are that that cohesion is falling away—that it does not really matter, that people can get away with worse and that there are no real responsibilities to be contemplated. I was interested to read a little while ago a statement that seemed to sum up that view, which said:

"The neighbourly society . . . inducts the individual into the community and the community sustains the neighbourly society . . . What we see in too many neighbourhoods is a vicious cycle of disorder leading to insecurity then to community breakdown, then into the retreat of socializing influences and therefore to further disorder."

That quote is drawn from a speech made to the Centre for Policy Studies by the shadow Chancellor, the right hon. Member for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin). It is clear that senior Conservatives will the end, but not the means. Do they support the view set out by the shadow Chancellor that there is a connection, that there is a cycle and that communities must be able to support themselves and to expect that, when they are attacked, they can defend themselves? That is the essence of the Bill.

Significantly—at this point, I offer my promised explanation—it is local councils, parish councils and town councils that are the subject of the powers and measures set out in the Bill. The police will have powers to confiscate fly-tippers' vans—an imaginative measure—but waste authorities will have new powers to manage recycling, and district councils will have powers to remove abandoned vehicles quickly and effectively and to deal with fly-posting. Local government bodies will, among other things, be able to restore errant shopping trolleys to their rightful location—a measure that Southampton city council tried, but was unable, to implement under section 5 of the Local Government Act 2000.

The end, if we order the means of getting to the end, is an issue about the public role. It is about the community and public space—roads, public buildings, parks and common lands and the space in which the public move and enjoy interaction with others. If we will the end, it is that public space that is the area in which society works well or does not work well. We have to will the end through public measures and the efforts of public authorities through which the liveability of communities thrives or declines.

I am minded of the call for minimal government that we have heard yet again from the Opposition. On every occasion their recourse is to the market. Their definition of politics is essentially about the private individual in his or her private sphere. In an intervention, the hon. Member for Mole Valley (Sir Paul Beresford) bewailed the idea in the Bill that section 32 of the 1990 legislation should be turned off so that local authorities would not be forced to put out waste disposal contracts to third party companies.

The explanation is that public authorities acting together, acting imaginatively and bringing forward new ways of thinking about waste disposal, is an infinitely superior way of going forward as compared with the straitjacket that was imposed by the 1990 legislation. I would like other sections of the 1990 legislation, especially those relating to variable charges for local authorities in terms of collecting waste, also to be turned off. Perhaps that is another matter.

The issue of the private individual in his or her private sphere is perhaps at the heart of the opposition to the Bill. However, the Bill lies at the opposite of all that. It looks instead further to empower the community in the shape of its elected local organisations. That is not just to hold the line but to move forward the liveability of communities. That in reality is the common sense of community. People know that their lives can be greatly enriched by co-operation with their neighbours and by the shared sense of what their community is. They know also that that fragile enterprise is potentially prey to the actions of perhaps one or two who free ride on that community's efforts and actions. They want the measures that are set out in the Bill and they know that the market will not produce them for them.

I commend the Bill. I hope that those who vote against it will think long and hard when they talk about the community and its rights and responsibilities. They will have failed their own communities just as if they had gone out and dumped a car or plonked a pile of rubbish in a lay-by.

8.37 pm

Mr. David Borrow (South Ribble) (Lab): I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak in this debate. Having listened earlier to the statement from my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister about the Indian ocean disaster and the earlier questions and answers on Iraq, many of us could be forgiven for thinking that we are dealing with an unimportant area of public concern. However, Labour Members, especially those who have served as local councillors, know that many of the issues dealt with by the Bill are at the heart of people's concerns. I welcome the Bill especially because it has the support of the Local Government Association. Many of the Bill's provisions stem directly from the concerns of those who have the responsibility of running local authorities at district, council or parish level.

Many of the measures set out in the Bill build on legislation that is already in place. Part of the problem, which many of us recognise, is that existing powers are difficult to operate and implement. If, through the Bill, their implementation can be speeded and made easier, and in many instances significantly strengthened, we shall be doing a good job of work.

Why is the Bill important now? Why is it not, as the Conservatives say, a measure only for urban areas? The headlines in the press would have us think that graffiti, litter and abandoned vehicles are all about run-down urban areas. My constituency is semi-rural with an unemployment rate of 1 per cent. South Ribble borough council in my constituency recently conducted a survey and discovered that the vast majority of its residents thought that South Ribble was a good place to live. It has good schools, low unemployment, nice housing and good health services. However, 24 per cent. of local residents thought that clean streets and litter were a high priority—only 1 per cent. less than the 25 per cent. who thought that crime and disorder was the most important issue. Crime and disorder, litter, clean streets and the environment are important in a constituency such as mine because issues that were of concern years ago have been dealt with. Residents have good schools and jobs, and we have low unemployment, interest rates and inflation. South Ribble is a nice place to live. However, when I knock on people's doors or meet them at coffee mornings, they talk to me about things that matter in their immediate neighbourhood. For example, they are worried about the ginnel in Penwortham that local youths use when going to and from school. It is covered in graffiti and terribly unpleasant, and a lady has been to see me regularly over the past seven years to try to get it cleaned up. The existing powers, however, make it difficult to deal with the problem properly.

My constituents are worried about cars that are abandoned in rural areas and not cleared away quickly enough. They are worried about litter, not just in town centres but in otherwise pleasant neighbourhoods. Sometimes, people allow their property or land to become an unsightly mess covered in litter or graffiti. No one seems to have the power to do anything about that—the argument is that it is private land or property so, unless it is a health hazard, nothing can be done. However, under the Bill, local authorities will be able to tackle the problem. Residents in the area who care about their homes and gardens and look after them, and who do not repair their vehicles on the street leaving oil everywhere, do not want their neighbourhood to depreciate in value or look a mess because one or two people fail to look after their properties and act as good neighbours. If the Bill makes it easier to deal with some of those problems, we should support it.

These are not simply issues for urban areas—all of them are raised in the 11 villages in my constituency time after time. When I write my weekly column for the rural issue of the free paper in my area, I will take great delight explaining to residents that the Bill is opposed by the Conservative party. I am sure that my probable Conservative opponent in the general election will be questioned about whether she supports her Front-Bench spokesmen, who continue to oppose the Bill.

I welcome the proposal to introduce greater powers to gate alleys. Lancashire county council has lobbied me for the past two years to try to secure powers to gate alleys throughout the county. It is a major issue in many Lancashire towns and I am glad that the Bill tackles it. I listened with interest to my hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Claire Ward), who talked about the problems of footpaths on an estate. Before I came to the House, I was a councillor for 10 years in Preston and one of my biggest bugbears was an estate with lots of little footpaths. The residents agreed that some of them should be closed to make the area more secure and safe, but every time that we tried to do something about it the ramblers and other organisations lodged an objection, so we did not succeed. If the Bill allows us to tackle the problem, that will be an important step forward.

I welcome the measures in the Bill for greater involvement of parish and town councils because such councils are often underestimated. When I was first elected and came into contact with parish councils, having previously represented an urban non-parished area, I was struck by the great range of activity and inactivity among parish councils. The best ones seek to represent and shape the lives of their local communities. They are proactive. They do not simply do the minimum. They look at ways in which they can make a difference. Several of the parish councils in my area—Hesketh Bank, Becconsall, Tarleton and North Meols in particular—are putting together village design plans with a vision of how their communities will develop. They are just the sort of parish councils that will want to take up some of the powers in the Bill to develop and lead their communities. That is as it should be.

I welcome much in the Bill. It will be a major step forward. It may seem trivial to some, but the fact that the powers were suggested by local authorities that have to deal with the problems at grassroots level means that there is a strong possibility that the Bill will improve the situation. If I have one concern—I should like my right hon. Friend to consider this—it is whether there will be sufficient resources for the measures in the Bill to be fully implemented by local authorities, and whether the Department should monitor the extent to which local authorities make use of the powers when the Bill is enacted, to ensure that we have got it right. There is little use in us here in Parliament passing good legislation that gives powers to make things happen if those who have been given the powers fail to use them.

8.47 pm

Iain Wright (Hartlepool) (Lab): I begin by expressing my astonishment that on an issue that affects the quality of life of millions of ordinary people, so few Conservative and Liberal Democrat Members wished to speak or even to attend the debate. As the newest Member of the House, I find it unbelievable that there are only two Members of the Conservative Opposition on the Front Bench and only one Member on the Liberal Democrat Benches. That has been the case for 95 per cent. of the debate on a topic of such importance. I hope the Opposition do not make a habit of that.

I shall concentrate on the neighbourhood aspects of the Bill, although I recognise that the environmental aspects underpin all its key elements. The Bill could have been written with my constituency in mind. I hold weekly constituency surgeries each Friday and undertake street surgeries on Saturday morning in a different part of the town. People do not raise with me concerns or opinions about the state of the economy, about who is talking to whom in the Government or even about Iraq.

Almost without exception, constituents are concerned and want me to do something about antisocial behaviour and nuisance neighbours who play their music at 3 o'clock in the morning or let their dogs roam the streets. They want me, as the town's MP, to tackle graffiti, fly-tipping and abandoned cars that blight their streets. They want me to deal with ugly and neglected buildings and thoughtlessly planned alley gates and rat runs, which help breed and nurture crime, drug dealing and antisocial behaviour on their estates. During my street surgeries I see all too clearly how bad planning and environmental neglect and decline prove to be barriers to opportunity and fulfilling potential. An entrepreneur wants to invest and try to create wealth in areas where graffiti, rubbish and fly-tipping are cleared promptly and culprits are punished. Residents want to live on estates where decades of neglect and decline have been halted and reversed thanks to community involvement and investment in infrastructure, environment and people, and where one or two bad families' habits of causing litter and noise are not tolerated.

I welcome the Bill, not least because I know that it will work by and large. I know it because my constituency has already started to implement some of the measures. Hartlepool is a forward-looking town. It has made great leaps forward with regeneration initiatives such as the new deal for communities and neighbourhood renewal. With Labour the largest group in the local authority and, to be fair to him, an independent mayor—under Labour councillors' guidance—who has passionately embraced the Government's agenda of neighbourhood and environmental renewal, street-based policies are making an impact. In the past 12 months the local authority has responded to 362 complaints about graffiti, and has issued 89 fixed penalty notices for littering. More than 450 abandoned and untaxed cars have been removed from the streets of Hartlepool, which has led to a 65 per cent. reduction in overall vehicle-related crime in the town and a 55 per cent. reduction in vehicle arson. The Bill will help my local communities to build on that success, and to achieve even more.

As an MP who is passionate about minimising the incidences of antisocial behaviour on my patch, I welcome the amendment to the law to ensure that crime and disorder reduction partnerships consider such behaviour. Crime in Hartlepool has fallen dramatically in the past nine months, by between 35 and 40 per cent., thanks to enthusiastic embracing of the Government's policies by the police and other agencies, but this measure will make a specific, real difference.

As a result of the Bill, a hit list of all untaxed cars will be provided through a planned initiative between the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency and the local authority. That will provide a quick response, and instant removal when that is appropriate. A direct link to a range of agencies' files and databases will help the council to ensure that crimes such as fly-tipping, dog fouling, littering, noise nuisance and damage to street furniture are tackled quickly, thus preventing the rot from seeping in and leading to neglect and long-term decline. I hope that advances will also be made to ensure that fast-food outlets work alongside the local authority and others, so that we no longer see pizza boxes and kebab wrappers after the pubs shut for the night.

The Bill greatly increases the powers of local councils. It enables local community councillors to play a significant role in the improvement of their neighbourhoods. It also provides much stronger—and welcome—powers for parish councils to impose fines for litter and to ensure that they, like local authorities, play a role in making their areas safer and cleaner. I find it disappointing that other residents groups and agencies are not empowered to take the initiative in the same way.

As chair of the local strategic partnership, in which co-ordination of agencies' plans for the collective good of the town is undertaken, I find it unsatisfactory that LSPs and their role in this context are not mentioned in the Bill. As I said earlier, constituents expect me, as the local MP, to play a role in minimising antisocial behaviour and the dropping of litter. That could have been achieved more easily had the role of LSPs been made clear.

A couple of weeks ago, I planted bulbs in the Owton ward in Hartlepool with young people from the "Cool it" project, funded jointly by the Owton West residents' group and the Hartlepool primary care trust. Such initiatives could be encouraged by the Bill. However, I am sure that such moves to improve the neighbourhood and own a part of it would take place in Hartlepool anyway, thanks to the dynamic leadership provided in the residents group by John Reid and in the PCT by Gerald Wistow. Obviously there would need to be strict controls in relation to governance and accountability for residents associations—I agree with the Minister and the hon. Member for Guildford (Sue Doughty), who mentioned the need for legitimate elections to such associations—but it would be gratifying if powers could be extended to groups that have the potential to make such an impact on their own neighbourhoods.

In the overall scheme of things, however, those are relatively minor gripes. The Bill will help to build on the work already done in neighbourhood renewal, and will make people feel safer and have more confidence and pride in their communities. I fully support it.

8.54 pm

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): I welcome the Bill and congratulate the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality on bringing it before the House. Its full significance will probably not be appreciated for some time but it will be as important as the Janner legislation of 1945 to 1951 on town and country planning and the legislation introduced by Arthur Skeffington during the Wilson Government to improve our environment. It is an important Bill with many elements, but above all it will improve and enhance the quality of life in urban areas and the countryside.

One of the things that has been repeatedly referred to over the past hour or two is the absence of Conservative Members in the Chamber. Mr. Deputy Speaker, you will have had to explain to constituents, as many other hon. Members have, why on many occasions we are unable to catch the Speaker's eye. We explain that the Speaker and his deputies have enormous difficulty meeting the needs of all 659 Members, who want to speak on a range of issues. We even have the phrase, "There is mileage on the clock." If Members have spoken too often in the Session, they are less likely, rightly, to get preferment and to catch the Speaker's eye. We also explain that the Speaker and his deputies swing from Opposition to Labour to Opposition in calling Members to speak.

Those who follow the Official Report and watch the parliamentary channel may ask, "How is it that Labour Member after Labour Member spoke in the debate?" The fact is that there are no Conservatives here except the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh). She is not even like Horatius—she is not even flanked by two others. That reflects badly on the Opposition, who not only are not attending or contributing to the debate but will have the audacity to vote against the Bill later. I find it breathtaking in the extreme.

[Andrew Mackinlay]

I listened carefully to the shadow Minister, the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo), when he tried to explain why he was going to vote against Second Reading and to commend that course to his colleagues. He did not offer any alternatives to ameliorate the problems of vandalism, fly-tipping, graffiti and litter, which are a terrible blot on our environment and a source of great irritation to Labour and Conservative voters alike. He did not make any proposals. To be fair, he said that existing powers could remedy the problems, but he did not tell us how he would ensure that those powers were triggered and what mechanism there was to flag up with all the various agencies that they should exercise their powers. I think that he is wrong, but he did not tell us or, more important, Conservative voters how he intended to tackle the issues that we are trying to deal with tonight. He owes it to the electors to explain why the Conservative Opposition voted against a measure that I would have thought and hoped commanded support across the political spectrum.

I want to refer to the proposals in the Bill on crime reduction strategies, which bring together the police and all the various agencies, empowering them but indicating to all of them that there is a public expectation that they get together to tackle crimes such as fly-tipping, graffiti, litter and other forms of vandalism that diminish our quality of life and environment. It is an important measure and will be welcomed by many of our constituents.

I see this as a class issue. The fact is that some of the poorest, most disadvantaged people suffer from these problems. They are exploited, often by unregulated business interests and by people who come into an area to dump litter. Some of the poorest, most disadvantaged but best citizens have to suffer and endure those problems.

I am conscious of the fact that many people think my constituency is urban. In fact, two thirds of the borough of Thurrock has very attractive green belt land, but of course it does suffer from the main problems that have been referred to this afternoon, including the dumping of waste on both public and private land. I welcome the fact that the Bill will remove discrimination between private and public land, put the burden of payment on the polluter, and impose significant sanctions on those who pollute and who dump controlled waste in particular. Indeed, such sanctions even include the seizing of vehicles when this crime is committed.

I took great interest in the proposal of gating minor highways when listening to the Secretary of State outline the Bill, and I am disappointed at the fact that the Conservative spokesman could not see that that will be beneficial. The explanatory notes state:

"In built-up areas there are many minor highways giving rear and side access to properties and providing shortcuts between blocks of properties."

We can all identify with the problems that such access causes. Such highways

"range from narrow footpaths to highways capable of accommodating vehicular traffic. Some of these highways provide opportunities to access the rear of properties for illegal entry and concealment and cover for criminal acts and anti-social behaviour."

This Labour Government are tackling this problem in a very real way, yet the Conservative Opposition are opposing these measures.

We are all familiar with the problems associated with abandoned and illegally parked cars, and the sale and repair of cars on our highways. Often, it is some of the best people, but who live in some of the poorest areas, who have to endure such problems. Cars that are put up on bricks for weeks and months on end constitute a real danger for small children. I welcome the measures in the Bill, which will streamline the action to be taken, but I ask that the Minister give me some assurance on this issue. When the police want to conduct a forensic examination of a stolen or vandalised car, its owner is sometimes charged for its impounding. That is wholly unsatisfactory, and I hope that this problem can be dealt with in Committee or in conjunction with the Home Office. People who have already lost out by having their car stolen or vandalised should not be further disadvantaged by being charged.

The issue of dog excrement sometimes gives rise to much levity. I have never understood why, as it is one of the most hazardous substances in our environment. Allowing one's dog to defecate in the street is a mediaeval practice, and I am amazed that it remains somehow socially acceptable. Contamination from dog excrement poses a considerable danger, particularly to children and to people's eyesight. I welcome the fact that we are making great efforts to combat this problem, and to point out to the public that allowing such things to happen without any regard to others is shameful.

I welcome the Bill's streamlining measure on stray dogs, but in my constituency the problem is also stray horses. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality, who will wind up the debate, also has this problem in his constituency. We have a legislative opportunity to ensure that horses that are taken in by local authorities are redeemable by their owners only if and when they pay the full cost. A penalty should be imposed if they have not ensured that their horses are kept in and prevented from causing a hazard on the highways.

The nuisance caused by lighting is also a very important issue. People are far too often disadvantaged by so-called security lighting that is not proportionate to the problem that it is designed to solve.

Finally, the Bill's provisions should be extended to Northern Ireland. It is a great pity that much of the good legislation that passes through this House does not apply to Northern Ireland. Scotland has a devolved Administration but Northern Ireland does not, and it rather looks as though it will not have one for some time. The wonderful regions of Northern Ireland and its rich coastline should be enhanced by this legislation. I hope that the Minister will commend that idea to the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, because if the Bill's very helpful measures cannot be extended to Northern Ireland, a relevant order might be able to replicate them.

9.4 pm

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): I am pleased to contribute to the debate, even if I am the last Back Bencher to speak and many things have already been said. I am even more delighted to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay), the penultimate Back Bencher to speak, because there is so much sense in what he says. I have no intention of going over the same ground and I want to discuss just a few issues.

Even at this late stage, my hon. Friends remain somewhat bemused about a point I made in an intervention on my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping)—the extent of cross-party arrangements in local government, particularly in the Local Government Association, in the light of the fact that the official Opposition have decided to vote against the Bill on Second Reading. One of the advantages of finishing early is that the hon. Member for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh) will have every opportunity to urge her arguments. If she had a bag carrier besides the Opposition Whip, we might still be able to get the Opposition in place to persuade them of the merits of voting in favour of the Bill on Second Reading, even if, quite rightly, they call us to account in Committee.

Politicians are to some extent catching up with the general public. For a long time, they have viewed quality of life issues as crucial to how they live their lives, so we need to catch up with them. In my area, an active community campaign was initiated by Liz Hall. I know that my right hon. Friend was able to respond to a debate initiated by my hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Dhanda), in which we examined the relationship between urban centres and surrounding rural or semi-rural areas. It showed how much we were dependent on each other. This lady, Liz Hall, off her own back about nine months ago, called a community meeting in her village of Harescombe, to which people in some of the other villages—Haresfield, Edge, Painswick and so forth—were invited. The aim was to consider why they were having so many problems with fly-tipping in the beautiful woods of Cranham, Edge and Sheepscombe. The meetings continue to this day; in fact, there is one tomorrow. If I can get away from this place, I would like to attend it to advance some ideas on how further to bear down on an unacceptable form of antisocial behaviour.

We needed to persuade the Environment Agency that this was a good area in which to undertake a pilot project, and through the offices of myself and others, that persuasion did take place, which is very pleasing. I hope that the Minister will recognise that the Environment Agency is geared up for the legislative change and wants to make things happen, working in tandem with local communities and, dare I say it, parish and town councils.

I have already declared an interest as a town councillor. If I were not here tonight, I would be sitting in the town council's planning and transportation committee, and one of the matters that we would no doubt be considering would be fly-tipping. It is an ever-present problem in rural areas as it is in urban areas. I hope that we will reach a consensus as we go through the process and not sustain this false divide between rural and urban. It is quite simple: they face the same problems, albeit on a different scale.

I shall provide an example. This Sunday, after going to church rather early, I hope to work with others on clearing an old railway cutting, which unfortunately people have used for some time as a dump for all manner of waste. The problem is complicated by the fact that it is inhabited by the great crested newt. Anyone who knows anything about the great crested newt will know that it is a wonderful species that does not like being disturbed. You or I, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may not be partial to having the odd tyre, mattress or bedstead thrown over into our habitats, but the great crested newts are even less partial to that, so we will have to be very careful how we do it on Sunday. That is the nature of working together to try to solve these problems. The essence of the Bill is not the consensus that is beginning to evolve between the parties, but the consensus between communities, the Environment Agency, the police and local authorities.

Mention has been made of parish and town councils, but smaller district authorities such as mine in Stroud have taken on board the antisocial behaviour agenda. I pay tribute to its antisocial behaviour co-ordinator, Colin Peake, who has highlighted the need to deal with fly-posting. While I would not say that he has cleared our streets of awful posters advertising nightclubs, he has a way of taking down the details, going to clubs and saying that the posters are their responsibility. On a Sunday, he goes to car boot sales and collects all the placards, puts them in the boot of his car and reminds the people concerned that they might like to collect them. If they do it again the next week, action is taken. He has a clear rule: they can have the placards up for 48 hours, after which those concerned have to go and pick them up. Otherwise, they cannot put them up again. Colin Peake needs support; the Bill is about co-ordination and making sure that someone like him can be supported by the political class and by the community.

Clearly there is a resource issue—no one is pretending that these things are cost-free—but it will not be a great one if we can share the costs around. We must make it clear that the police being asked to take on additional responsibilities does not mean that another layer of authority is washing its hands of an issue and giving it to the police, and vice versa if we are talking about the care of stray dogs, for example. There is a need for genuine partnership, and that must be action, not just words.

Like all Bills, the proof will not be in the law or in the amendments that we table, but in how it is seen out there. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Iain Wright) said, it will take some considerable time until we begin to see the impact of the Bill. That does not mean that we should not be trying now.

Some of us would argue that we should have had the wherewithal to be doing this some time before, because quality of life issues are gaining salience, not as a result of a selfish motivation but because of people's pride in their community. We are a more materialistic society; therefore, there is more waste that we have to deal with, and we must deal with it at source. In these days of extreme weather changes, one sees, sadly, that some of the waste that is allegedly fly-tipped is down to the wind blowing people's refuse. We have to look at a better way of integrating waste collection and disposal with other services.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will look at the resource issue and at working with other Departments to ensure that the Bill does not merely have lip service paid to it. We must work with local government and the other levels of authority so that they get the message that the Government are turned on to this issue and want to make a change. We can envisage our different communities improving the way they look. Therefore, people will think that, for once, politicians are in touch with them and care about quality of life issues.

9.14 pm

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): First, I declare my interests in the Register that may be relevant to the debate, and add a further declaration: I chew chewing gum on occasion, but I can assure the House that I dispose of it in a socially responsible way. We have had an excellent debate. I hope that the Minister will have time to respond to all our concerns and those of his hon. Friends.

My party and I welcome the opportunity for full and proper scrutiny of the Bill, and we look forward enthusiastically to the Committee stage. As has been repeated numerous times, we believe that we should legislate less but better. I therefore fully support what my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo), the shadow Secretary of State, has stated. While we cautiously welcome certain aspects of the Bill, that is tempered by our regret that it appears to be a hotch-potch of ideas. The phrase "eye-catching initiatives" springs to mind.

There is no evidence in the Bill of a joined-up approach to government. It straddles at least three Departments—the Home Office, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, who has obviously been engaged in other matters for the past week, and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs. The Secretary of State waxed lyrical about the new powers being granted to local authorities and the Environment Agency. However, she went so far as to say that while she was imposing and creating new offences and responsibilities, they should not be taken as duties. I hope that the Minister will take the opportunity to set out for the House's information what new resources have been allocated and what financial assessment has been made, particularly in view of the fact that the hon. Member for Thurrock (Andrew Mackinlay), sharing the view of the Law Society, pointed out that it will, in many cases, be the poorer and more deprived members of society, who are least able to pay, who will be penalised. The Minister will, I am sure, hope to confirm what the Secretary of State said about there being no additional resources and no pump-priming. Seemingly, therefore, there will be no recognition of the new powers and the increased costs.

The Secretary of State said that in certain instances the Bill relieves the police of powers in relation to nuisance. That raises the question whether it will transfer resources from the police to local authorities to enable them to use those powers. A constant theme has been requests to local authorities to take on more powers, but what recognition have the Government given to the costs of empowering local councils. For example, there is the need for staff training and providing staff with the tools to do the work set out in the Bill.

The regulatory impact assessment was laid before the House in December. It says that receipts given to local authorities for various aspects of the Bill would amount to a little over £3 million if there were to be a forecast 50 per cent. payment rate. At a forecast of 75 per cent., the receipts would be £4 million. We shall use the Standing Committee's scrutiny procedures to focus on that. Will the Minister satisfy the House tonight, however, on the question of there being only a 10, 20 or 30 per cent. take-up of fixed penalty notices? If income was not forthcoming, how would the local authorities and the Environment Agency be expected to pay?

Mr. Michael Foster: Can the hon. Lady confirm the contents of the James review, which suggests, I think, that DEFRA's budget should be cut by £500 million? Is she aware of the comments of the chief executive of the Environment Agency about what would happen to the local environment if those cuts took place?

Miss McIntosh: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will have the opportunity to sit with us in Committee to explore those issues in greater detail.

To return to our reasoned amendment, which I commend to the House and urge all right hon. and hon. Members to support, a number of Members this evening have raised problems in relation to powers to seize and remove abandoned vehicles. Can the right hon. Gentleman confirm whether vehicles can be removed immediately, without knowledge of who the registered owner is? In relation to clause 41, will he consider extending the power of immediate seizure of such vehicles to all white goods, including fridge-freezers, fridges and microwaves, following on the obligations to which his Government have signed up under EU directives, not least the waste electrical and electronic equipment directive?

One of the unintended consequences of the Bill relates to the implications for breakdown services. The current wording of the Bill leaves the provision of breakdown services exposed to actions that are surely not the primary intention of the Bill, as it implies that there are circumstances in which repair at the roadside following a breakdown or accident is not necessary. That raises the risk that the legislation could be used by authorities to justify the towing away of a vehicle to an off-road location in the interests of congestion management, following the provisions of the Traffic Management Act 2004, which grants such powers to local authorities and Highways Agency traffic officers. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman will be aware of the concerns raised by the Royal Automobile Club and the AA and would wish to respond on that point.

As regards waste, what progress has been made on the sharing of police information relating to organised and illegal fly-tipping, particularly that including a criminal element? Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that powers of arrest under clause 41 will extend to all forms of illegal fly-tipping? What consultation with councils will take place on fixed penalty notices? Many councils and local authorities have expressed concerns about how the provisions will apply, and are concerned that there will not be a full and frank consultation. Will he confirm that he has not unintentionally and inadvertently discriminated in relation to the immediate removal of abandoned vehicles from urban areas, which the Bill explicitly empowers local authorities to do, whereas in rural areas, landowners are to remove them at their own cost? Surely the Government would intend powers to be applied uniformly in rural and urban areas.

In relation to clause 41, can the right hon. Gentleman confirm whether raising the maximum level of the fine and the maximum level of imprisonment, as I mentioned earlier, will relate to all forms of fly-tipping, not just hazardous or non-hazardous waste? Can he also confirm that offences under clause 41 are arrestable offences, so that perpetrators of the crime, not just vehicles, can be apprehended and seized—[Interruption.] His colleague, the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment, who is chuntering from a sedentary position, will be only too aware that the Environment Agency has said privately on a number of occasions that it or local authority enforcement officers are powerless if they cannot make a citizen's arrest, as the perpetrators of the offence can therefore escape the scene, and although the vehicle is seized, the perpetrators are free to acquire another vehicle and continue to commit the same offence. That is a glaring omission.

Clause 44 also relates to immediate seizure, and we would hope that an arrestable offence would be extended to those provisions. Clause 46 provides powers to stop and search a vehicle and its contents, but is again silent on whether the equal power of arrest in relation to suspected perpetrators will be granted.

I remind the House that the Government have been in power for almost 18 years—[HON. MEMBERS: "Eight years."] Eight years. I am glad that the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment is paying attention. It seems like 18 years. They have been in power for almost eight years, but in 2003, litter increased by 13 per cent., and since 2001, chewing gum disposal has increased by 94 per cent.

Clause 18 relates to dropping or leaving litter on private land. Who will enforce it and who will place the additional enforcement obligation on the local authority?

Clause 19 empowers local authorities to set the level of fixed penalties. Will the penalties be fixed by statute or will they be subject to a national framework that sets maximum and minimum levels? We strongly urge the Minister to confirm that there will be full consultation before the levels are set and that there will be an opportunity for the House, as well as local authorities and businesses, to be consulted. Local authorities have expressed their concerns to us; some have found that the levels are set far too low to be effective.

I remind the Minister that in his written answer to me on 17 November he admitted that the chewing gum segmentation study, commissioned by the Chewing Gum Action Group, cost £60,170, yet under the Environmental Protection Act 1990, passed by the last Conservative Administration, fixed penalty notices can be issued to those who drop chewing gum and the current level is £50, so why are those penalties not being imposed? I remind the Government that the local authorities, such as Westminster city council, which actually apply the existing rules, tend to be Conservative controlled.

It will bring joy to the heart of my constituency neighbour, the hon. Member for City of York (Hugh Bayley), that clause 27 specifically defines as litter chewing gum, including bubble gum, and smoking materials, including cigarette and cigar ends. However, redefining gum in that way will place a huge duty on local authorities to keep streets clear of gum and other such material at all times. Is the Minister aware that that will impose a massive increase in street-cleaning costs?

The hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Linda Gilroy) asked about the discussions we had held with chewing gum manufacturers. We are working extremely closely with the main chewing gum manufacturer, which is, I believe, in her constituency. The company wants to act responsibly—the words about producer responsibility are as much the company's as ours—and to reach consensus.

Linda Gilroy: Will the hon. Lady clarify what discussions she has held with the company on its view about fines? It is my understanding that the company would like clarification about that situation. The company is frustrated, because it takes responsibility for raising awareness and for education programmes, but it would like the fines regime to be improved.

Miss McIntosh: As the hon. Lady will be aware, I have already mentioned that the fines exist and I should be interested to hear from her—perhaps after the debate—whether her council imposes them where applicable. What is responsible in the case of that chewing gum manufacturer is that it seeks consensus with consumers and that it is trying to educate the primary users of chewing gum. I must confess that chewing gum has a certain dental function, and the company has an education policy and works through schools, scouts and guides. It is undertaking market-based research and is looking into more biodegradable forms of gum. It would be the first to accept the advice to consumers, which was followed religiously under the last Conservative Government but seems to be on the wane under the Labour Government: "Wrap it and bin it".

The least perfect option would be a purchase tax, but I wait with bated breath to hear what the Minister says about that. As I said, there is already a fixed penalty of £50 and it is regrettable that few councils impose it. I urge the Minister to answer this question: would not it be better to apply existing laws more effectively, rather than extending an all-round street cleansing policy? As was said earlier, no sooner has a street been cleared of chewing gum deposits than, a week later, the exercise has to be recommenced.

Hugh Bayley: Is the hon. Lady suggesting that because people start to throw chewing gum on the ground the following week, one should ignore it? Can she clarify for the House whether she is in favour of local authorities cleaning up chewing up from the streets or against that?

Miss McIntosh: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman can inform me whether the council shared by our constituencies, and those of several other colleagues, actually levies the fines that it is entitled to impose. Perhaps we should go on a publicity binge with the City of York council to ensure that it is aware of the fines that are available to it to impose.

Moving on to a more general policy for waste, further provision should be made to protect landowners from the unsolicited dumping of waste and litter on their land. Currently, the Bill is simply not clear. Local authorities should fine all those who illegally dispose of waste or litter on an equal footing, irrespective of whether it is disposed of on public or private land, or whether in urban or rural areas.

On the disposal of free printed matter, will the Minister explain whether that provision will extend to party political literature? If so, will there be unintended consequences on the freedom of speech? For the sake of repetition—I am unsure whether he heard that point—will he clarify the position on whether the provision relates to the disposal of free printed matter circulated by local parties?

In many regards, the Bill does not go far enough. Fly-tipping is a tremendous problem in urban and rural areas, and it continues to increase. The Environment Agency's officers should have the power of arrest. They should be permitted to have computer access to the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency database and to stop vehicles on public highways without the presence of the police. Without those powers, the Bill represents a hollow commitment in many respects.

I pay tribute to the most eloquent words of my hon. Friends the Members for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Derek Conway) and for Southend, West (Mr. Amess), who mentioned dogs. Their one omission was in not asking whether the Minister is aware that many of the dangerous injuries to stray dogs are caused by vehicles. The Bill is silent in that regard, and I wonder whether he has any proposal to firm up his provisions. By encouraging a programme of micro-chipping, the Government could have produced financial savings on the collection, kennelling, re-homing or possible destruction of unwanted animals. Does he have any intention to include a policy of micro-chipping?

On graffiti and general defacement, as my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk has mentioned, the Law Society and others have expressed concern about the fixed penalty notices. Will the Minister ensure that only fully trained and fully qualified officers will be authorised to issue such notices? Again, local authorities will be given the power to fine those who fly-post. Currently, the fines authorised are up to £75. Why do the Government not choose either to increase that fine or to penalise those councils that do not impose them? We suggest that the definition of what is unlawful under clauses 33 and 34 must be improved and that there should be a right of appeal. I hope that the Minister will make a commitment to holding full and proper consultation with all relevant bodies, including the Outdoor Advertising Association. Perhaps he will take time to explain to the House the Bill's implications in respect of moving advertising boards.

Mr. Patrick Hall: I have listened carefully to the hon. Lady list those points—she is perfectly entitled to make them and to ask the Government to improve the Bill, and so on—but I have heard nothing in what she or the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo), who leads for the Conservatives on this matter, have said about any fundamental point of principle that justifies opposing the Bill on Second Reading. All the matters that they have listed can be dealt with in Committee. Where is the principled objection to the Bill?

Miss McIntosh: That leads neatly into my final point. We have a principled position that we urge the House to decline to give the Bill a Second Reading, for the reasons set out in our reasoned amendment. The fines are set too low. The powers are not real powers—they do not impose duties, as the Secretary of State told the House earlier. The procedures used are too cumbersome. The Bill fails to put rural and urban areas on an equal footing. It is unclear how fine revenue raised will be allocated. Will there be full consultation, not just with local authorities but with waste disposal companies? Will the Minister consider favourably our proposal that some of the moneys raised from fixed penalty notices should go to raising awareness of responsible waste disposal companies, so recycling the money rather than simply putting it into general local authority finances?

For all the reasons set out in my concluding remarks and our reasoned amendment, I urge hon. Members to decline to give the Bill a Second Reading and I commend our reasoned amendment to the House.

9.35 pm

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): This excellent debate has illustrated why crime, disorder and local environmental issues are central and linked themes for this Government, for the Labour party nationally and locally, and for Labour MPs. The issues are inextricably linked and matter enormously to people in every part of the country, as has been illustrated by all the contributions from Labour Members to today's debate.

I am extremely disappointed that both the hon. Members for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) and for Vale of York (Miss McIntosh)—the hon. Lady is marginally more enthusiastic about the proposals than her hon. Friend—have missed an opportunity to rise above petty point scoring on an issue that is important to their constituents as well as to ours. The most absurd thing came at the end of the hon. Lady's speech when she tried to justify a so-called reasoned amendment, which looks as if it was written at a fairly exciting point during the office party, by saying that we should have more consultation. I had honestly expected some criticism from the Opposition over the fact that we have spent the past two years exhaustively consulting not just local authorities but everyone about the need to tackle the local environment and how to do that best. I was going to reply that it was that exhaustive consultation that had led us to such strong and vigorous proposals. The hon. Lady has missed an own goal. I feel compelled to answer the criticism that she could not even manage to make.

The Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill shows the strategic, cross-Government approach that we are taking on local environmental issues that affect the quality of people's lives. The Bill tackles the important link between the state of the local environment, antisocial behaviour and fear of crime. Neglecting the local environment creates unease and a sense that "nobody cares around here", which can lead to escalating problems of antisocial behaviour. People want to live in communities that are not blighted by litter, graffiti, fly-posters and burnt-out cars. Most people mention the state of their own neighbourhood when asked what is most important to them about the environment. People do care.

A few months ago, I joined Councillor Paul Murphy, the cabinet member of Manchester city council responsible for the environment, on day 99 of Manchester's 100 days' clean-up. I have undertaken environmental work with young people, and a couple of days seem quite long. Ten days sounds very long; 100 days seems courageous in the extreme. What did I find when I visited Manchester on day 99? Did I find exhausted staff and people who were demoralised by having bitten off more than they could chew? No, I found councillors and officers exhilarated by the exponential growth in community involvement—the engagement of local communities, the increasing activity as people realised that they had time to get involved and that the issue was being taken seriously by a strong local authority.

That visit also helped to form our view on the graffiti and fly-posting measures in the Bill. I commend Manchester and a number of other major cities, including Nottingham and Cardiff, which have taken a grip on the issue. We have tried to put together legislation that will help them go further in their aspirations to govern clean cities.

My comments are of course informed by events in my constituency in Cardiff, just as the contributions of my hon. Friends have been informed by those in their constituencies. I pay tribute to Linda Thorne, for instance, who was the deputy leader of the council until last year. She took enormous care in driving forward environmental improvement in the partnership approach. Councillor Clarissa Holland, in the ward of Splott, has worked with the citizens of Bayside. They have been affected by the ingress of youngsters from outside the area who have done an enormous amount of damage to the local community. The people of Splott made use of antisocial behaviour orders and exclusion orders, working with the police and the local authority. When I spoke to them a few weeks ago, they paid tribute to the difference that our measures had made by enabling the police and the local authority to improve their quality of life.

Like Manchester's 100 days, the Bill is about empowering local communities to take ownership of their environment and therefore their future. That is why the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) was so telling when he illustrated, with the specific requests of his constituents, why it is so important that the Bill receive a ringing endorsement on Second Reading. Would it could be the case across all parties. It is sad that the Conservatives cannot see the importance of the measure.

My hon. Friend made the link to crime and antisocial behaviour. He rightly said that the Bill is a cornerstone for building better sustainable communities. He also rightly said that no one organisation or one Department can build cleaner, safer and greener communities. For that reason, I am happy to pay tribute to ministerial colleagues and officials at the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Home Office and to others who have helped to create the joined-up approach and the contents of the Bill.

I thank my hon. Friend for his comments on my role in the creation of crime reduction partnerships. I regularly hear from senior police officers about the importance of that measure. Linking environmental degradation to crime and disorder will be equally important and help us to tackle all those issues.

My hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Foster) gave specific examples of how badly designed footpath and lane access allows local people to become the victims of abuse. I can happily explain how we expect the measure to work. We expect local authorities to start by trying prevention. A variety of measures could be taken, such as local and community action to clean up a footpath, to improve lighting or to use sightlines. It could be a case of examining why there is a problem in the first place. There are other approaches as well, including the use of exclusion orders or antisocial behaviour orders.

Abusive play was a challenge in the Bayside example. Good people were affected by environmental damage linked to crime, and the exclusion order worked. All those approaches, including the engagement of a local neighbourhood watch, may make a difference and make closing off an alley unnecessary. There is no universal answer—no panacea or magic wand—to the problem, but we are giving a range of practical powers. When measures have been insufficient in local circumstances, and several hon. Friends gave examples of that, the local authority and the police, with the local community, will be able to use what is the right option locally. We are removing the constraints on solving the problems.

All contributions by Labour Members were based on experience back home in the constituency, as is my approach. That was in stark contrast to the speech by the hon. Member for South Suffolk.

Miss McIntosh: Will the Minister give way?

Alun Michael: Let me deal with the hon. Member for South Suffolk first.

The hon. Gentleman will vote against common sense and for an unreasoned amendment: It is extraordinary. He demonstrated that he has little understanding of the issues tackled by the Bill and clearly does not understand the importance of them in rural communities. I was sorry to hear him refer to individual and corporate behaviour because it is not another contributor to environmental problems, but at its heart. What we do as individuals and collectively is what creates either a healthy or a damaged environment.

The hon. Gentleman referred to ENCAMS, saying that there had been a 12 per cent. increase in litter. I am delighted he quoted that—I have been quoting it all year. I also quoted the other side of the story. Where partnerships have got together, an improvement of something like 20 per cent. has been achieved. The ENCAMS message is that we can make a difference provided we wake people up to the need individually and collectively to care for their neighbourhoods. ENCAMS also said that the main issue is about how resources are used. That came out of its research and findings last year. Campaigning and challenging people to think about their local environment can make a difference, too.

The hon. Gentleman referred to light nuisance, saying that he was concerned about exceptions. But when he was challenged repeatedly to name one, he could only mention lighting of industrial activities in our ports. There are safety issues relating to our ports and other transport areas. It was a pathetic response, just as it is a pathetic, unreasoned amendment.

Mr. Yeo: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Alun Michael: Oh, I should be delighted.

Mr. Yeo: Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that he regards the concerns and objections of the many thousands of people whose neighbourhoods are increasingly blighted by light pollution from ports as accurately described by the Government as pathetic?

Alun Michael: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that ports should work only in daylight hours? Is he saying that he would sweep away the exemptions that exist for safety reasons? He needs to do a little more homework.

The hon. Gentleman needs to do a little more homework on chewing gum, too, because he talks about producer responsibility. What is he going to do? Fine the producers? He was challenged on that, and his answer was, "I haven't a clue." He is afraid of fixed penalties because they might lead to fund raising. I make the point to him that, with fixed penalties, people contribute only if they have offended. If people do not offend, they do not have to pay. Secondly, I make the point that partnership works. Partnership has been demonstrated to reduce many of these problems.

The hon. Member for Vale of York raises detailed issues in a rather confused way, and she, too, has clearly not understood the wide-ranging nature of our consultation and the support for the Bill from local government. We will deal with many of the issues that she raised in Committee.

I have met Wrigley's on several occasions, and we included it in the working group, along with local government and others. The company is a good deal more positive now than it was earlier. I say that frankly; initially, it was reluctant to recognise just how important the issue is to many people in their local environment. We have sought a partnership approach with Wrigley's and others. We brought the company and ENCAMS, which proposes campaigns on these issues, together in what we hope will be a partnership approach towards an issue that is important to the industry and to local communities and needs to be tackled positively.

In a slip of the tongue, the hon. Lady referred to 18 years. She is, I am sure, aware that that is the period for which the Conservatives were in power, and at the end of it they were still blaming Jim Callaghan and Harold Wilson for everything that the Conservatives failed to do throughout those 18 years. We have a while to go before we stop reminding everybody of the failures of a Conservative Administration who cared little for the environment and abandoned it locally, nationally and internationally.

Miss McIntosh: In the spirit of co-operation that, I am sure, will pertain during the hours that we look forward to spending in Committee, may I bring the right hon. Gentleman back to my question? If funding for the measures is not raised through fines, how are local authorities to implement them? Will the right hon. Gentleman clarify the Secretary of State's assertion that these are powers, not duties? Are they entirely discretionary? Will the Government seek to enforce them?

Alun Michael: The hon. Lady has missed the point. I accept the courteous way in which she asked her question and I look forward to our debates in Committee. The point is that, at the moment, where there are no fixed penalties, local authorities have to go through the procedure of taking people to court, and where there are fixed penalties they come back to central Government. So, an area may have a problem that is leading to lots of fines being levied, but none of the money comes back to the local authority. If local authorities have a problem, they will now have the money in their coffers to continue to enforce penalties. It is a simple concept, and one that works.

Andrew Mackinlay: I do not know whether my right hon. Friend was, like me, bewildered when listening to the Conservative spokespersons saying that there are existing powers that should be enforced. They have not volunteered how, when and by whom those powers would be enforced even if they did provide a remedy, which they do not.

Alun Michael: I look forward to amendments and new clauses being tabled in Committee that will demonstrate more creativity on the part of Conservative Front Benchers than we have seen today. However, I should not be too hard on the Front Benchers as their efforts to find speakers could only force two fairly innocuous contributions—and by 7 o'clock, there was nobody on the Conservative Back Benches. In fact, to be completely accurate, there were no Back Benchers in the Opposition half of the Chamber by 7 o'clock.

It is a simple fact that the Conservatives do not understand the local environment. They are not interested in it, which makes it all the more absurd that they will vote against the Bill. The reasoned amendment is itself absurd: either its so-called reasons would negate the Bill, or they are reasons to support it. The arguments advanced by hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Amess)—one of those who was dragooned in by the Whips—seemed to have been culled from lobbying organisations. He painted himself into the libertarian end of the Conservative spectrum: he does not want to punish those who wreck the environment and ruin the lives of others in the community. The rhetoric he deployed made it clear that he had not read the Bill.

Mr. Amess: I assure the Minister that I was not dragooned into the Chamber—no Whip would try to do that. I wanted to speak in the debate simply because I think that the Bill is absolutely hopeless.

Alun Michael: I hope that the hon. Gentleman can do better in Committee, because he has not done well today. I was surprised by his support for the Law Society's opposition to fixed penalties. I hope that the Law Society will reconsider and agree that fixed penalties offer an efficient means of tackling problems without wasting the time of the courts, local authorities and the police. I have just finished a period as the first Minister to serve on a jury, so I bring added experience to bear on the subject.

In contrast to Conservative Members, my hon. Friend the Member for Stevenage (Barbara Follett) reminded us of local people's passion and appetite for the measures and the vigour with which Labour MPs have explored the issues. The Bill is based on the experience of Labour Back Benchers, local councillors, the police, voluntary organisations and local people. My hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Iain Wright) correctly linked cleaning up the environment to economic and social regeneration. Social and economic regeneration go hand in hand with an improved environment—it is called sustainable development.

The hon. Member for Guildford (Sue Doughty) made a positive contribution in which she stressed the shared responsibility that we all have for our environment. She made clear the Liberal Democrats' general support for the Bill, although she said that she would challenge and probe some issues in Committee, as she is right to do. However, she was not right to say that the Bill "jumps around". It is comprehensive, then specific: the unifying theme and central principle is that of joined-up action at local level and specific proposals are made on the various aspects. The Bill provides a real opportunity for local authorities, the police and the communities that are served by both to work together, and I hope that Liberal Democrats in local government will seize that opportunity.

The hon. Lady acknowledged the cumulative effect of individual decisions on littering and such things as gum stains. She also acknowledged the difference between responsible farmers and landowners and those who are part of the problem. I share her surprise at the Conservatives' opposition to the Bill—although I am also delighted by it, because it makes it clear that they do not understand what they are doing. She made an important specific comment about car alarms. In fact, car alarms can be silenced under the Noise and Statutory Nuisance Act 1993, which amends the Environmental Protection Act 1990 to include "noise that is prejudicial to health or a nuisance and is emitted from or caused by a vehicle, machinery or equipment in a street".

The provision allows local authorities to enter or open a vehicle, if necessary by force, to silence a car alarm and to remove the vehicle from the street to a secure place. I hope that greater use of that provision will be encouraged by the Bill's comprehensive approach to alarms on premises.

The hon. Lady rightly referred to Travellers and their impact on some communities—something that I have experienced in my constituency. She also made the case for greater flexibility in deciding whether to contract out waste functions. Greater clarity in waste disposal targets and improvements brought about by the Government, particularly the comprehensive performance assessment, which has been mentioned several times, make the narrow requirement that the Bill will remove unnecessary. I look forward to discussing in Committee some of the other concerns that she highlighted.

My hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard) called on local authorities to use the powers that are given in the Bill. I assure him that I believe that there is a strong will among local authorities to do just that. I sit on the Central Local Partnership, which is chaired by my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister. With my ODPM colleague, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning, we have co-chaired a working group with a variety of interests, including local government, on sustainable communities. The Local Government Association has been deeply involved with this work. I believe that it will strongly support not only the passage of the Bill, but its implementation to good effect throughout the country.

I believe that there is a will to use the powers that are set out in the Bill. Issues such as the comprehensive performance assessment will encourage that, as will the fact that a short while ago we published the third ENCAMS report. We never previously had a proper comparison year on year to tell us whether things were changing for the better or the worse. We now have that information. We also have best value performance indicator 199, which measures performance by local authorities. Finally, we have the annual survey of the use of fixed penalty notices. At present, there is a 70 per cent. response, but one that we want, with local government, to be improved.

The hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) suggested in an intervention that the Government had not responded to the recommendation for access to Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency data. He is incorrect, as the Committee was in the first instance. The DVLA makes available to local authorities a website for such inquiries. It started rolling out free online access to its vehicle records for inquiries about abandoned vehicles in September 2002. About 220 local authorities are now connected to the service. I would encourage local authorities that are not already making use of this facility to do so.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mitcham and Morden (Siobhain McDonagh) said that she was delighted that the Government had been brave enough to take on these issues. I was impressed by the findings of her constituency surveys that showed that two thirds of responses identified problems with litter, graffiti, gum and abandoned cars as priorities. Her constituents want the new laws that we are now providing.

My hon. Friend the Member for Morley and Rothwell (Mr. Challen) rightly referred to the determination of Labour councillors in Leeds to tackle local environmental issues. I have spoken to several of them about these matters. The powers do not require extra resources in general. We have made it simpler for local authorities effectively to undertake their work without placing greater weight on their responsibilities.

My hon. Friend referred to the accountability of parish councils, as did the hon. Member for Guildford. My confidence that we are adopting the right approach reflects the experience of the past three years. The National Association of Local Councils and the Society of Local Council Clerks, nationally and at regional level, have shown great leadership. That is reflected at local level by many parish councils.

I know that Conservative Members are not interested in parish councils, but we on the Government Benches are, and we are seeing their reflected performance as a result of local community leadership. There are about 7,000 parishes, and 10,000 if we take into account community councils in Wales. There are plenty of poor examples, but elected accountability is a requirement for a quality parish council. Peer support is helping to create a cadre of hugely effective parish and town councils.

My hon. Friend the Member for Watford (Claire Ward) said that antisocial behaviour in a community that wants to help itself requires the use of exclusion orders and antisocial behaviour orders. She is right. Having created antisocial behaviour orders at the Home Office, I am always happy to hear of their success. I have seen the orders make a real difference in local communities. My hon. Friend is right to say that no one measure will change everything and that proportionality and logic have to be brought to bear. I am saddened to hear of an obstruction put in the way of a local solution in closing off an access that is a problem in my hon. Friend's area.

Like everything, these powers will strengthen the ability of local authorities comprehensively to tackle crime, disorder and damage to the environment. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Mr. Douglas Shave

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Jim Murphy.]

10.43 pm

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole) (Con): The debate today is on Porton Down and the case of my constituent, Douglas Shave. I am pleased to have this opportunity to put on record a little about his experiences. He is not unique—the House has heard many similar stories in the past about how national servicemen were treated in the late 1940s and 1950s at Porton Down, and I am sure that Members will want to bring up this subject again on many other occasions. I have been struck since I managed to obtain the debate by the number of Members who have stopped me in the various Corridors of this House and recounted individual cases of people who went through tests and believe that that has had a detrimental impact on their health and on their lives.

I was hoping for the attendance of my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson), but he is stuck in traffic somewhere between here and an airport and sends his apologies. When I was carrying out research for this debate, I found that he had initiated a similar debate on behalf of his constituent, Michael Paynter, in 1996. However, I note the attendance of several Members in the Chamber. It is not unusual for only one or two Members to attend Adjournment debates held at this late hour, but there are half a dozen Members here and I know that they have all taken an interest in the topic and spoken on it in this place in the past.

The hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Hall) is in his place and the Under-Secretary of State for Defence and I are happy that he should make a brief contribution after I have finished and before the Minister replies. No doubt he will sweep up some points that I may miss.

My constituent was born in 1931. He was called up for national service on 2 November 1949 and joined the Royal Air Force. He did his basic training followed by trade training and his final posting was as a leading aircraftsman at the education department at RAF Bicester. He was transferred to Porton Down on 8 August 1950, following a station notice requesting volunteers for common cold research—a story that we have all heard before. I know that those who have looked into the matter have said that it was one for local bases and that no notices have survived the passage of time, but my constituent was certainly under the impression that he was doing common cold research.

The advantage for Douglas was not necessarily additional pay or leave, but the fact that his family come from the west country—from Dorset—and Porton Down was a little closer to home. That is why he took the opportunity to volunteer at Porton Down.

Mr. Shave was at Porton Down between 8 and 14 August 1950. On 9 August 1950, he and three other national service volunteers were put into a chamber wearing gas masks. Following the introduction of the gas, the nerve agent GE—ethyl sarin—they were told to remove their gas masks. Further tests were carried out during the following days. Those facts were confirmed, in a letter of 16 March 1998, by Dr. Hall, who was then the technical director of the chemical and biological department of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency at Porton Down.

My constituent states that soon afterwards he experienced skin problems that the RAF tried to treat. Unfortunately, there are no records of that. He was discharged in 1951 with an exemplary service record, which is on file. Since then, he has suffered severe eczema. Many national servicemen who went through those tests suffered neurological and a range of other problems, but severe eczema for 50 years is extremely painful.

My constituent has major scarring to his back. He told me that when he joined the RAF he had a face like a baby's bottom, but on occasions his facial eczema has been so bad that he has had to use make-up to cover it. It has been extremely difficult to deal with that problem over the last 50 years. He found it difficult to hold down employment with other employers. His first job, in the 1950s, was in management for Odeon-Gaumont theatres, but due to the severity of his facial skin condition he had to resign on 18 November 1954.

My constituent has suffered from recurrent ill health. As a result, he started up his own business in which he was successful. He has had a successful family life; he has a wife and grandchildren. It was only in 1998, when Dr. Hall, the technical director of DERA, told Mr. Shave that he had experienced sarin nerve gas, that he heard what the tests were about. It was quite a shock.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): My hon. Friend's description reflects the experience of my constituent, Mr. Peter Carpenter of Haddenham, who went to Porton Down in 1951 for a similar purpose. To underline the point that my hon. Friend made, my constituent was given no protective clothing or gas mask—unlike the Army personnel who were similarly engaged but properly protected. He was taken to a field. He held a white rabbit in a cage and witnessed a controlled explosion. The rabbit had a seizure and died.

Subsequently, my constituent felt ill but was told by Army personnel and professors, who undertook no tests or examinations on him, that he would shortly be better and could return to his regiment. He suffered lost teeth, aches, pains and deteriorating joints and discovered only in the 1990s that he had been exposed not to the common cold virus, but to sarin. Is not that a disgrace?

Mr. Syms: My hon. Friend did very well to put on record the difficulties that his constituent has faced. There are many cases of people finding out very much later in life what happened to them, thus filling in part of the jigsaw of their treatment.

Mr. Shave has been a constituent of a number of MPs, including my hon. Friends the Members for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) and for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson), who have written to Ministers over recent years. Unfortunately, my constituent's application for a war pension has been dismissed. He is a member of the Porton Down Veterans Support Group, which has been very active. He is, frankly, amazed that there has not been a public inquiry or even an apology for how they were treated during their time at Porton Down. Standards were different in those days, but I do not understand why we should not look at what went on to try to find out more about what happened 50 years ago.

Some progress has been made. There has been openness in the release of DERA records from Porton Down. That is one of the reasons why my constituent has found out what happened to him, and the same applies in the case mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow). A medical assessment programme has been set up. The Medical Research Council has offered to fund studies into the conditions suffered by Porton Down veterans. The Wiltshire constabulary has carried out an investigation.

Indeed, an inquest has been held into the death of Ronald Maddison, with a corner's verdict of unlawful killing. Following 64 days of testimony and 4,000 pages of documents, that was the jury's finding. That may be subject to judicial review, so the Minister may not wish to say much about it, but many of the veterans of that time certainly feel aggrieved that the Government are seeking a judicial review on a decision that they feel is a sign of hope for most of the rest of them. Indeed, I have received a number of e-mails. One of them was forwarded to me from my hon. Friend the Member for Woking (Mr. Malins), from Barry J. Barnes of Pirbright, Surrey, who was one of those who gave evidence to the Maddison inquest, and he wanted me to raise that issue.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): Is it not a fact that the Maddison case is crucial for all those who were affected—including the hon. Gentleman's constituent and that of the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) and, indeed, others—because it shows that none of them gave informed consent? They gave consent, but it was not informed. In those circumstances, their consent must surely be null and void. That must be the critical legal issue, and it is why the Maddison case is so important for other victims.

Mr. Syms: The hon. Gentleman makes a very good point, and some of his constituents have suffered in this way, as have those of many Members. It may be for a longer debate in future when Members may have an opportunity to put all those individual cases, but people did not know what they were signing up to, and that may have had an impact on their lives.

I hope that the Minister will abandon the MOD line, set up a public inquiry and look into what happened to those young men. I certainly hope that he has had the opportunity to look into the case of my constituent, Douglas Shave, who did his duty by his country. I do not think that he had the full information, which may well have been the reason why he has suffered for 50 years from very severe eczema, which has been very painful and has certainly impacted on his quality of life. I am sure that the hon. Member for Bedford, who will make a brief contribution and whom I admire for his campaigning on this issue, will pick up any point that I have not picked up.

10.53 pm

Mr. Patrick Hall (Bedford) (Lab): I thank the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms), as well as the Minister, through his private office, for allowing me a few minutes. Like the hon. Gentleman, I come to this issue through a constituent of mine—Mr. Peter Parker, who joined the RAF under national service and served as an aircraftman between 1951 and August 1953. Towards the end of his service, he recalls seeing an official notice seeking volunteers to attend CDEE Porton. His recollection is that both the notice and the advice that he obtained that related to it was very clear that the process he faced posed no risk to his health and, indeed, that he would be serving his country by participating in a programme of research into curing the common cold.

Mr. Parker was assisted in his decision to volunteer by being offered a 48-hour pass, plus 10 shillings. He attended a gas chamber on 4 May 1953, and while there, 20 mg of the nerve agent sarin was applied to a piece of cloth on this forearm. That gave him a terrible headache for many hours. Thankfully he recovered and got on with the rest of his life.

Mr. Parker did not know that a potentially lethal nerve agent had been applied to him; nor could he have known that two days later on 6 May 1953, at the same place, aircraftsman Ronald Maddison would die from the same process. He did not know any of that until approximately three years ago when he received a telephone call from Wiltshire police under Operation Antler.

Mr. Parker is one of hundreds of Porton Down veterans, many of whom believe that what they experienced has had a damaging impact on their health. I accept, though, that we must await the outcome of the epidemiological study, which I am very pleased to note the Government are funding, but that is not the only issue. There is another important matter at stake: my constituent believes that he was deceived—that he was not in a position to give informed consent.

I believe that my constituent is right to want that issue to be addressed. I believe that he deserves an apology, and possibly compensation. Above all, what Mr. Parker, Mr. Shave and hundreds of other volunteers who passed through Porton Down over three or four decades deserve most is the truth. Given the circumstances, that has to mean an independent judicial and public inquiry. I have written to my hon. Friend the Minister about that. I hope that he recognises the force of the argument. In all decency, after 50 years, it is surely time for the truth to out.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Ivor Caplin): I congratulate the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Syms) on securing this debate to discuss the case of his constituent, Mr. Douglas Shave, who participated in the service volunteer programme at Porton Down during the summer of 1950. I join him in welcoming other Members to this debate. There is a huge attendance for a late-night Adjournment debate.

The House is aware of the concerns of some of the former Porton Down veterans that have recently been widely aired in the media following the conclusion of the inquest into the death of Ronald Maddison. However, we should note that this debate is to raise the personal concerns of Mr. Shave. I intend to deal with the specifics of that case in my response. I hope, however, that the House will also reflect on the written ministerial statement that I made on 21 December. That set out the Government's position in relation to Porton Down and the legal process that is being undertaken.

Throughout Porton Down's history, some 20,000 volunteers have participated in the service volunteer programme, with many participating more than once. I mention that because it sets in context some of the numbers that have recently been reported. The past 30 years have seen more than 5,000 volunteers helping in the service volunteer programme, and currently between 100 and 150 volunteers a year are participating. The programme is aimed at ensuring that protective measures issued to our troops to counter the threat posed by chemical and biological weapons are safe and operationally acceptable prior to their introduction into service.

As part of the volunteer programme, some volunteers, particularly during the 1950s, were involved in studies to evaluate the effects of very low concentrations of chemical weapons agents such as nerve gases and mustard gas on the ability of unprotected personnel to operate normally. It is important to emphasise that the general purpose of the programme was not hidden. Other volunteers were involved in trials to develop effective clothing and medical counter-measures to protect service personnel, or to assess the ability of personnel to function with new equipment.

Not only was the programme essential; I know that the House will agree that it was also crucial that it was carried out in the safety of a controlled environment, with full medical and scientific back-up. I am in no doubt that the knowledge and the technology of the very complex field of chemical and biological defence could not have advanced without the contribution of volunteers participating in the service volunteer programme. I once again reiterate the gratitude that I and my predecessors have expressed towards all those who took part.

I am pleased to say that the vast majority of the service volunteers who participated in the programme are quite unconcerned about their attendance. Indeed, there is no evidence of any pattern of specific long-term ill health in former volunteers. A peer-reviewed paper has been published assessing the health of participants in the programme, as part of the independently run medical assessment programme based at St. Thomas's hospital. I note that Mr. Shave has been an attendee. The study concluded that there were no unusual patterns of disease or any unusual diseases occurring as a result of exposure to agents at Porton Down. Although I appreciate that that does not ease the suffering of Mr. Shave and others who suffer poor health, experience has shown that there is considerable value in providing reassurance where possible.

In addition to the medical assessment programme, we are also funding an epidemiological study being conducted under the auspices of the Medical Research Council. The study, which will track mortality and cancer incidences over many years, will conclude in 2006, and I can confirm that the results will then be published.

Given the ongoing level of publicity and media coverage regarding Porton Down volunteers, including the publication of Porton Down's free helpline number, which was initiated in 1998, I might have expected to receive a large number of inquiries for information. The reality is that that has not happened. Only just over 1,000 individuals have approached Porton Down for more information. I believe that Mr. Shave was one of the first to use the system.

Of those, like Mr. Shave, who have inquired about their involvement in the programme, some have done so out of curiosity or as a result of publicity, and others because they have health concerns. Whatever the motivation, once an inquiry is received, staff at Porton Down begin the painstaking search of numerous experimental record books for details of the particular inquirer's participation in the programme. Those details are sometimes complicated and often difficult to interpret, but every effort is made to provide the clearest explanation to the inquirer. A formal written response is sent to the inquirer, together with an invitation to visit Porton Down to view the original record books and discuss any concerns with current members of staff.

Although I do not believe that Mr. Shave has accepted this invitation, I know that quite a few former volunteers have done so, and indeed some have made several visits. I believe that these visits have been successful, not least because we have been able to give details at the same time of the services offered by the medical assessment programme and potential eligibility for war pensions.

One of the accusations, made by the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler), relates to how the trials were conducted. Volunteers for the service volunteer programme were drawn principally from the three services and were recruited through notices posted widely at military establishments. In the 1950s and 1960s, intakes were requested from individual arms of the services at specific times of year. The precise mechanisms for recruiting volunteers were arranged by the services themselves, not by Porton Down.

I note that Mr. Shave previously said that he volunteered to participate in studies on the common cold and not nerve agents. However, the chemical and biological defence establishment at Porton Down has never carried out work on the common cold. That research was undertaken at a Medical Research Council unit on the other side of Salisbury. Extensive independent searches by the Wiltshire police during the five years of its Operation Antler investigation have been unable to locate any evidence to indicate that Porton Down scientists involved in the service volunteer programme recruited individuals on the pretext of common cold research.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): I was around as a national serviceman at the time and had indirect knowledge—although no direct knowledge—that the servicemen believed they were involved in research on the common cold.

Mr. Caplin: I welcome my hon. Friend's intervention, and indeed welcome him back to the House after his period away. However, the information that I have seen does not support his suggestion. I accept that there are different points of view. As the hon. Member for Poole said, we may well debate this subject again.

There have again been calls for a public inquiry. Although I appreciate the concerns of veterans, I am not convinced that a public inquiry is appropriate. It cannot address the central question of whether volunteers have suffered unusual mortality or illness. Only the study to which I have already referred can accomplish that. For this reason, we should await the conclusion of the study.

Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Caplin: No, I am about to conclude.

Mr. Shave is recorded in the experimental record books as attending Porton Down for one week in August 1950 when he participated in a single study. That study involved Mr. Shave being exposed to a low concentration of the nerve agent GE, or ethyl sarin. The records detail the acute short-term effects experienced by Mr. Shave from five minutes to five days following exposure. After five days, the records state that he was fit to return to his unit. I understand that he was provided with a comprehensive letter from Porton Down in March 1998 detailing the entries in the experimental books. Subsequent to that I believe that he requested, and was provided with, copies of the entries in the experimental books and a further letter clarifying the dose of GE that he was exposed to. He then attended the medical assessment programme in April 2001 where he received a thorough and comprehensive medical examination.

I accept that Mr. Shave's application for a war pension was rejected. That was on the grounds that there was no connection between his skin condition and the trials that he took part in at Porton Down. Mr. Shave appealed against this decision, but I understand that he has not replied to letters from the pensions appeal tribunal. He was therefore informed in writing on 13 October that his appeal was struck out. However, the Veterans Agency will consider reinstating his appeal if he contacts it directly.

The Ministry of Defence does not appear to have had any further communication from Mr. Shave raising any specific concerns that he may have. I suggest that if he does wish to discuss any pressing issues he should accept the invitation to visit Porton Down and take the opportunity of an open discussion with Porton Down personnel. Perhaps I can rather cheekily suggest that he may wish to be accompanied by his Member of Parliament.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at six minutes past Eleven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

The Secretary of State was asked—

Welfare to Work Forum

Ann McKechin (Glasgow, Maryhill) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the operation of the welfare to work forum in Glasgow. [207428]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): The Government's measures, such as the new deal, have been very successful in moving people from welfare into work. However, more needs to be done and we will continue to work with the Glasgow welfare to work forum, as well as with others.

Ann McKechin: My right hon. Friend will be aware of the ambitious plans of the welfare to work forum to create 30,000 jobs in the city by the end of 2010. Given the current favourable economic conditions and, as reported in this month's Insider magazine, the massive growth in profits of the top 500 companies in Scotland, I believe those plans are achievable, but it will require the closest co-operation between all public agencies—here at Westminster, the local authorities and the Scottish Executive. Can my right hon. Friend assure me that his Department will be actively involved in working with the forum to achieve success for Glasgow?

Mr. Darling: Yes, I can. My hon. Friend is right: what is striking about the forum in Glasgow is the common interest between not only public bodies and others with a long history of trying to help people get into work, but also private sector companies, because they realise that it is in their interest that we expand the work force so that we have more people available for work. It is worth bearing in mind what has happened over the past few years with the new deal: in Glasgow, nearly 5,500 lone parents, 1,400 adults, more than 25,000 people with disability and 1,600 people aged over 50 have moved from welfare into work thanks to the new deal. Many other measures can be taken, but there is a big difference between 10 or 15 years ago, when the then Government either ignored unemployment or thought it an inevitable fact of life, and the situation today where there is universal determination to get as many people into work as possible.

Sir Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire) (LD): The Secretary of State is right to acknowledge the valuable work that has been done both through the active labour market policies promoted by the Government and through the forum, as was rightly raised by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Ann McKechin), but does he not think it slightly strange that training providers are not part of the forum? He is right to say that the commercial sector has a part to play, but there are no training providers on the forum itself. Furthermore, there is no flexibility about some of the funding streams. Up to £90 million may be available to the forum but there is little flexibility in how it can use much of that money. Would not access to training providers and more flexibility in the use of funding make the Glasgow welfare to work forum even more effective than it is now?

Mr. Darling: I am sure that is something the forum would like to consider. I know that the hon. Gentleman, through his experience of chairing the Select Committee on Work and Pensions, will be well aware of the fact that the Department has shown itself open to looking at new ideas in relation to funding. Let me give him an example: the pathways to work programme, which has been very successful in pilot form in getting people into work, is being extended across the whole country and it will include Glasgow.

I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions will continue to keep flexibility under review. The main thing, however, is to concentrate on getting as many people as possible into work, and, especially in Glasgow, the comparatively high number of people on incapacity benefit who really do need to be helped into work as quickly as possible.

Mr. David Marshall (Glasgow, Shettleston) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the foundation for the welfare to work forum is the tried and tested new deal? Is not it the case that the Liberals opposed the funding of the new deal and that the Tories will abolish it? In contrast to those shameful policies, will the Secretary of State ensure that the necessary resources continue to be made available to tackle the scourge of long-term unemployment and to provide education and training to the youngsters who so desperately need it?

Mr. Darling: I agree with my hon. Friend. The new deal will remain the foundation of everything we do to help people into work. It is worth bearing in mind that employment in Scotland has risen by 174,000 people since 1997. Many of us in Scotland remember what happened in the 1980s and the early 1990s when hundreds and thousands of people were condemned to unemployment, we had a second generation of people growing up who had no experience of work and there was precious little help from the then Government. As for the Liberals, my hon. Friend is right—they are in favour of the new deal, but they were actually against the means of funding it, which is a typical Liberal attitude towards such matters.

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): Getting people off incapacity benefit and back to work is an important part of welfare to work. Is the Secretary of State aware of the Citizens Advice Scotland report entitled "Riding the Benefits Roller-coaster", which raised serious concerns about the rigidity of the existing system for incapacity benefit and concluded that claimants fall between gaps in the system when their conditions change? What are the Government doing to help people on incapacity benefit get back to work rather than penalising them?

Mr. Darling: As I said just a few moments ago, the Department for Work and Pensions has piloted a programme known as pathways to work, which is specifically designed to help people who are on incapacity benefit to get into work. The pilot scheme has shown that it is much more successful than conventional programmes, precisely because it offers help that is tailored to individuals. I visited a scheme in Renfrewshire a few months ago, with the First Minister, and we met a number of people who had taken part in the pilot scheme and had been got back into work. They had been given help and assistance that they would not receive under conventional schemes. That all shows that, when a Government are determined to work with others to help people into work who, historically, have simply been dumped by the system, we can make a very real difference. The fact that there are now record numbers of people in work, including people coming off incapacity benefit, shows why it is so important to stick with the new deal and not to do away with it, as the Tories would do, so returning us to the days of very high unemployment, when a whole generation of people were simply written off by the then Government.

Identity Cards

2. Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): If he will make a statement on the introduction of identity cards in Scotland. [207429]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): So far as reserved issues are concerned, the introduction of identity cards across the United Kingdom is, of course, a matter for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. Decisions on the use of identity cards to access devolved services in Scotland are the responsibility of the Scottish Executive.

Mr. Reid: This most appalling Bill will give the Secretary of State dictatorial powers to order people to attend at a specified place and time to have their fingerprints and other biometric information recorded. Given the cost and time of travelling to the passport office in Glasgow from many parts of Scotland, will the Secretary of State assure the House that facilities will be available locally to allow people to attend to have fingerprints and biometric information taken—for example, at local post offices?

Mr. Darling: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me notice of the question that he intended to ask, which I saw on page 6 of The Press & Journal today.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine) (LD): Have you got an answer?

Mr. Darling: It just about gave me sufficient time to find out the answer. I am glad to say that, as the House may be aware, the Home Office is piloting what will be necessary to implement the ID card scheme in Glasgow. One of the things that it is considering is a mobile facility to enable people to record their details without having to travel, in this case to Glasgow. In any event, when biometric passports are introduced, which, I think, will be in about 2008, it will be necessary for people to attend to have those details recorded. As far as I am aware, the Liberals are not actually against biometric passports, but—who knows?—we could be wrong about that as well.

I remind the House that the Bill provides for a database to be established to make it possible to have identity cards in the future. For my part, I cannot see anything wrong in principle with people being asked to identify themselves for various transactions. After all, most of us are asked to identify ourselves in respect of various transactions several times a week. It would be a tragedy if, at this stage, we were not to take those steps because they might be absolutely necessary in 10 or 12 years' time. If the Liberals had their way, the country would be ill-prepared to guard against security problems, fraud and so on. So what is proposed is entirely reasonable.

Rosemary McKenna (Cumbernauld and Kilsyth) (Lab): May I wholeheartedly agree with my right hon. Friend? [HON. MEMBERS: "Yes!"] None of us can have access to this building unless we are wearing an ID card, and I do not see that there is any problem with that. Most hon. Members take them off when they enter the Chamber, but I do not have a problem with wearing it whenever. Does my right hon. Friend agree that Scotland deserves to live in security, with protection from fraud and petty crime, just as much as the citizens of the rest of the UK, and that ID cards must therefore be introduced UK-wide?

Mr. Darling: Of course, the provision of identity cards is reserved to the United Kingdom Parliament—that is why the Bill applies across the whole country—but my hon. Friend is right: increasingly it will not be unreasonable to ask people to identify themselves if they wish to use public services. After all, as I said just a few moments ago, every one of us probably has to identify ourselves when we go to the bank and when we buy things in the shops, and that is not a great imposition.

In relation to security, increasingly, whether we like it or not, not just in this place but elsewhere as well, it will be necessary for people to be satisfied about the identity of individuals, and I do not think that there is anything wrong with that in principle. The problem that the Liberal Democrats have is that they are in favour of security in principle, but rather like their policy on the new deal, they are against the practical means of achieving it.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): May I wholeheartedly disagree with the Secretary of State? Does he accept that if identity cards are compulsory for Westminster-provided services, they are then compulsory in Scotland, regardless of what Mr. McConnell and the Scottish Executive say? Can he confirm that the cost of introducing identity cards over the next 10 years in Scotland is more than £500 million, enough to pay for 2,000 extra police officers in the communities of Scotland? What would make people in Scotland feel safer: a plastic identity card or extra thousands of police officers?

Mr. Darling: Of course, thanks to the money that we have made available to Scotland, because of the economic prosperity that has been built up over the past seven years there are more policemen in Scotland. There are also more teachers, nurses and doctors. So as far as public services are concerned, we can provide that.

In relation to identity cards, the fact that the hon. Gentleman disagrees with me comes as no surprise. It is hardly news that it may be necessary to have an ID card to access benefits, for example, in Scotland in future. Does he say that there is anything wrong with asking someone on benefits to identify themselves? The Scottish Executive have made it clear, however, that they do not propose to require the use of ID cards for accessing the NHS in Scotland. That is an entirely proper decision for them to take. However, I repeat the point: what is wrong in principle with people identifying themselves so that others are satisfied they are entitled to use services? I defy him to answer that. I see nothing wrong with that in principle and cannot for the life of me understand why he takes such a ridiculous attitude.

EU Fisheries Council

3. Angus Robertson (Moray) (SNP): What discussions he has held with ministerial colleagues on the outcome of the EU Fisheries Council in December. [207430]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mrs. Anne McGuire): Colleagues in the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, the Scottish Executive and the Northern Ireland Office worked very closely in the run-up to and during the Fisheries Council in December. The deal they secured is a good one for Scottish fishermen. The Departments are working together and with the industry to implement the agreement. I am delighted that the Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, my hon. Friend the Member for Exeter (Mr. Bradshaw), has joined us on the Front Bench.

Angus Robertson: I thank the Minister for her answer. She will be aware that past and current EU restrictions have led to the decommissioning and scrapping of seaworthy boats. Do the UK Government agree that it makes little sense to scrap boats when they have been offered to tsunami-hit fishing communities in south-east Asia? Commissioner Borg has said that emergency legislation could be brought before the Council of Ministers in the near future to fund the transfer of vessels and gear. Will the UK Government support that?

Mrs. McGuire: I congratulate the white fish producers' initiative on offering aid to the disaster area in south-east Asia. I give the hon. Gentleman every assurance that we will do all that we can to support that initiative.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): What assessment has my hon. Friend made of the enhanced cod recovery programme? What difference will that make to ensuring the sustainability of the Scottish fishing fleet?

Mrs. McGuire: We must all recognise—I hope all hon. Members agree with this, although I have a niggling suspicion that the official Opposition may not—that the recovery programmes and the recent negotiations offer a sustainable future for our fishing communities. The House does not need to listen to me on this. Those in the industry have made a series of comments, including:

> "Fishermen now believe in the future . . . it has to be a future based on legality and long-term recovery plans".

I am only too delighted to identify who made that comment. It was Mike Park, vice-president of the Scottish Fishermen's Federation.

Mr. Calum MacDonald (Western Isles) (Lab): On behalf of west coast fishermen, may I express my appreciation to the Fisheries Minister for achieving for, I believe, the first time an increase in the west coast prawn quota, which is the bedrock of the west coast industry? I hope that that will be the first step towards further enhancements of that quota at future Brussels meetings.

Will my hon. Friend congratulate the west coast fishermen's association on the way in which it worked with marine laboratory scientists to develop new techniques to research the state of the west coast prawn stocks? That should be seen as a model of co-operation between scientists and fishermen in the future.

Mrs. McGuire: I am only too delighted to offer my congratulations. As some Members know, I take a great interest in the west coast prawn stocks. They did very well over Christmas, and made a lovely accompaniment to turkey and cranberry sauce at a Christmas dinner not very far from where my hon. Friend stays.

Mr. Peter Duncan (Galloway and Upper Nithsdale) (Con): Given the Minister's family interest in the issue, has she asked her colleagues for their views on why the fishing fleets of Norway, Iceland and the Faroe Islands are successful and are expanding while the Scots fleet has been decimated?

Mrs. McGuire: I suppose that the hon. Gentleman is still on a learning curve on fishing. There are different circumstances in different countries, but I also want to draw to the attention of the House the fact that, despite all the evidence to the contrary, the Conservative party in Scotland announced yesterday that it intends to withdraw from the common fisheries policy. The hon. Gentleman said that that is "not some silly proposal", but it is. If the Conservatives withdrew from the CFP, they would have to negotiate with a range of countries. Fish in the sea do not swim around with little flags saying "I'm a British fish" or "I'm a Norwegian fish". The Conservative party must get real about fisheries policy.

Mr. Duncan: The Minister must accept that the problem is that we do not have any fish swimming around, as the CFP has emptied our seas of fish. The problems faced by Scotland's fishermen are almost exclusively the result of the CFP itself. The Scotland Office has a poor track record in standing up for Scotland's interest. Will it now do so, and recommend either to the Prime Minister or to the Chancellor, whoever is in charge this week, that he return fisheries policy to local and national control?

Mrs. McGuire: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman does not accept that fish stocks have stabilised, although some stock levels are still critical. The conservation measures adopted in the various packages are beginning to work. Not only did the hon. Gentleman say that withdrawing from the CFP is not a silly proposal but he accused it of emptying the seas. If ever something was foolish, it is the way in which the Conservative party allows its Euroscepticism to undermine the good negotiations on fisheries policy and their outcomes, which have been accepted and applauded by the industry.

Mr. Duncan: I am glad that the Minister has become excited again during our annual exchange on fisheries. She is right—we will return our fisheries to local and national control, we will withdraw from the CFP, and Scotland's fishermen will be the better for it. Does she agree that the people best placed to manage Scotland's fisheries are fishermen themselves, not politicians in Edinburgh, London or Brussels?

Mrs. McGuire: The way to manage our fisheries stocks across Europe is to make sure that we have a balance between conservation and fishing. We must work together to ensure that the North sea continues to provide fishing communities across Scotland and the rest of the United Kingdom with a living, but the reality is that the hon. Gentleman's policy would do neither.

Energy Policy

4. Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (Lab/Co-op): If he will meet the First Minister to discuss the requirements for a balanced energy policy for Scotland. [207431]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): I have regular meetings with the First Minister to discuss a wide range of issues.

Mr. Foulkes: But has the Secretary of State noticed that the people who are now objecting to renewable energy sources such as wind farms are exactly the same people who object to nuclear power and opencast mining, and are supported by Scottish National party MPs and MSPs? Is it not true that if they had their way, there would no sources for electricity generation and the lights would go out all over Scotland?

Mr. Darling: I agree with my right hon. Friend that the logic of the nationalists' position is that the lights would go out in Scotland, as they are against nuclear power, wind farms and opencast coal mining. It is difficult to see where the electricity would come from. Dare I say that perhaps they would import it from the hated England? Nationalist policy is nonsense and, as I have said in the House before, it is important that we have a balanced energy policy and that we can draw electricity from a number of sources. Renewable energy from wind farms is an important strand of that policy, but we must also pay regard to the important role played by nuclear power, as my right hon. Friend knows, given that he represents a seat in Ayrshire.

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): The Secretary of State will be aware that the balanced energy mix will require significant growth in renewable generation. Allied to that, it is important that we get the regime right for transmission charging. The third proposal by the National Grid Company for renewable projects in the mainland highlands has caused serious concern about the viability of generation there, and we still do not have any proposals at all for projects in the western or northern isles. Will the Secretary of State pursue that with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the chairman of Ofgem as a matter of urgency so that we in the isles are not excluded from the benefits of renewable generation?

Mr. Darling: I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern. The new scheme has the advantage of removing interconnector charges between Scotland and the rest of the United Kingdom. That will bring large benefits, which will also go to Scottish consumers.

The hon. Gentleman is right that we should not disadvantage generators. In particular, we should not disadvantage proposals for wind farms or wave power generation on the islands. Ofgem will reach a decision in February. I hope that it takes on board the legitimate concerns of generators and others in Scotland. We must ensure that electricity generation in Scotland can compete on fair terms with electricity generation in other parts of the United Kingdom.

Pensioner Poverty

5. John Robertson (Glasgow, Anniesland) (Lab): What recent discussions he has had with the Chancellor of the Exchequer on pensioner poverty in Scotland. [207432]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mrs. Anne McGuire): My right hon. Friend discusses a wide range of issues with the Chancellor of the Exchequer. My hon. Friend knows that tackling pensioner poverty is one of this Government's key policies.

John Robertson: In Anniesland, more than 13,500 pensioner households are receiving the winter fuel allowance and more than 5,100 pensioner households receive an average pension credit of £45. Will my hon. Friend ensure that the Chancellor not only continues that support for the poorest pensioners in our society, but does more for them?

Mrs. McGuire: I agree with my hon. Friend, whose constituency has one of the highest proportions of pensioner households in Scotland. He works assiduously to make sure that pensioners in his constituency get all their rightful benefits.

ADVOCATE-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

The Advocate-General was asked—

Devolution

16. Annabelle Ewing (Perth) (SNP): What devolution issues have been raised with her since 30 November 2004. [207422]

17. Mr. Alan Reid (Argyll and Bute) (LD): What devolution issues she has considered since 30 November 2004. [207423]

18. Ann McKechin (Glasgow, Maryhill) (Lab): What devolution issues she has considered since 30 November 2004. [207424]

19. Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland) (LD): What devolution issues she has considered since 30 November 2004. [207425]

The Advocate-General for Scotland (Dr. Lynda Clark): Since 30 November, 67 devolution issues have been intimated to me: 36 devolution issues related to criminal matters, including pre-trial delay, self incrimination under section 172 of the Road Traffic Acts and satellite monitoring of fishing vessels; the remaining 31 devolution issues related to civil matters, almost all of which concerned prison conditions.

Annabelle Ewing: Is the Advocate-General aware of any discrepancy in the Scotland Act 1998 that means that it is essential for the Prime Minister to declare his stay with a pop star, but that it is not essential for the First Minister to declare his stay with a political pundit?

The Advocate-General: No.

Mr. Reid: The Advocate-General has said that 67 cases were notified to her. Will she tell hon. Members the number of cases in which she acted and the length of time that she spent doing so?

The Advocate-General: Many of those cases—for example, the pre-trial delay cases—were copycat cases in which I had examined the legal issues in detail in relation to other cases. In one or two of those cases I intervened and appeared in Privy Council to deal with the legal issues. Such matters depend on the type of issue and whether the issue has been raised before. I did not intervene on any of the particular issues intimated to me in the past month, but some of those issues have been raised in other cases, one or two of which I have intervened in.

Ann McKechin: My hon. and learned Friend will be aware that the Gambling Bill is currently passing through the House and that it has important implications for Scotland. What discussions has she had with the Scottish Executive about the regulatory regime in Scotland? In particular, the Government indicated on Second Reading that use class orders in England and Wales will be changed to separate bingo clubs and casino premises. Has she received any indications from the Scottish Executive on whether they intend to pass similar legislation to amend planning in Scotland?

The Advocate-General: The important matters that my hon. Friend raises relate to policy, not legal issues. Policy discussions would not normally be carried out by me but by the relevant policy Ministers, including my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

It may be of some assistance if I give an overview of legal regulatory matters as I see them at the moment. My hon. Friend will be aware that although gambling is a reserved matter, Scottish Ministers exercise some powers as a consequence of Executive devolution. The Bill proposes that the Gambling Commission will regulate commercial gambling and issue operating and personal licences. There will be a right of appeal against that to the Gambling Appeals Tribunal. In addition, it is important to understand that licensing boards, which are devolved, will regulate the gambling premises and that the devolved planning structure will apply.

Mr. Carmichael: May I invite the Advocate-General to give some advice to her right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland on his power in the Crown Estate Act 1961 to issue directions to the Crown estate commissioners? I suggest that had he done so, the shellfish farmers in my constituency and elsewhere in Scotland would not have found themselves in the position that they did shortly before Christmas, when they were faced with massive increases in the rents that they have to pay to the Crown estate commissioners, who are the only possible landlord to whom they can turn.

The Advocate-General: I am always happy to give any advice that is asked for by colleagues.

CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary was asked—

Essex Magistrates Court

22. Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): If he will review the procedures relating to the private finance initiative for Essex magistrates court. [207407]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): My Department continually reviews and monitors private finance initiative procedures for new court building projects, including plans for Essex magistrates courts, to secure the most effective and efficient contracts on behalf of the taxpayer.

Bob Russell: May I urge the Minister to take a personal grip on this particular issue, as the position to date has been absolutely lamentable? The time that has elapsed since the day that the decision on the private finance initiative for the new Colchester courthouse was taken is longer than the duration of the second world war. If Churchill can win a war in six years, why cannot this Minister build a new courthouse?

Mr. Leslie: It is certainly a challenge that I am tempted to take up. I have to say, however, that we are at an early stage in contracting for this private finance initiative. I understand the hon. Gentleman's keenness to see such older court facilities improved and to get on with the more exciting proposals that are on the table, but we have a duty to ensure, on behalf of the taxpayer, that the contractual arrangements that we enter into are fit and proper and efficient, and we are working on that.

Claims Handlers

23. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): What steps he is taking to regulate the activities of claims handlers. [207408]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. David Lammy): The claims management sector must be properly regulated. We have given claims handlers one last chance to put their house in order. If they do not, we will consider how formal regulation could be introduced in the context of our consideration of Sir David Clementi's report.

Paddy Tipping: Does the Minister accept that in coalfield areas such as mine, claims handlers are causing real difficulties by making unnecessary charges for coal health claims and raising unrealistic expectations about industrial injury claims, and that some of them seem to have intimate connections with firms of solicitors? Many of us do not want our constituents to continue to be ripped off in this way, so is this the last-chance saloon?

Mr. Lammy: Yes, it most definitely is. My hon. Friend will know that last year the Law Society did much work on this with solicitors' firms. The cold-calling, sharp practices and unfair preying on vulnerable people must stop. We have asked the Claims Standards Council to consider the situation and to work with the industry on getting its house in order. If it does not, we will regulate to deal with the gaps.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Am I right that one of the drivers of the proliferation of claims handlers is the no win, no fee rule, which has also led to a big increase in so-called ambulance chasers? What is the Under-Secretary going to do about contingency fees?

Mr. Lammy: The hon. Gentleman will know that a previous Administration largely introduced the contingency fee regime. We have tried to simplify the regulations. The Better Regulation Task Force considered the matter, we accepted many of its recommendations and we are moving forward.

Mr. Kevan Jones (North Durham) (Lab): Companies such as Industrial Disease Compensation Ltd., which is an unscrupulous claims handling firm in the north-east, cannot operate without close relationships with law firms, as my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping) said. Will my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary consider meeting coalfield Members of Parliament to discuss the issue? What representations will he make to the Law Society, which has a key role to play in ensuring that the act is cleaned up?

Mr. Lammy: I absolutely agree to meet Members who represent coalfield areas. I have regular discussions with the Law Society and have raised such issues with it in the past. I also have upcoming meetings. We take the matter seriously. As I said, the Government are actively considering regulation—but let us meet, continue the dialogue and ensure that we can bring the practice to an end.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): The National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux issued a report last month on the claims farmers—unqualified intermediaries who are engaged in high pressure sales tactics and often mislead the public into ill-conceived litigation. If we consider that report with the comments that have been made, is it not odd that the Under-Secretary's policy is to allow those people to go further and take over or set up high street solicitors' practices? How will he tackle the abuses?

Mr. Lammy: The hon. Gentleman is confused. The Government's policy has been to ask Sir David Clementi to consider the issues and to act once we have examined his report. We have said clearly that we need the right provisions to ensure that there are no sharp practices on the high street. We are working with the Law Society. David Clementi has specifically considered those matters and we are dealing with the issue; the Conservative Government did not.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon) (Lab): I first raised the problems of claims assessors when I was elected in 1997, but the position has got worse. Claims assessors feed the myth of the compensation culture rather than present the facts. Would it not be more appropriate to regulate now, ask Clementi to reconsider the matter with specific reference to the proposed legal services board and suggest that claims assessors should be brought under its auspices in the same way as other people in practice? Is not the best advice to people who are injured simply to go to a reputable specialist personal injury lawyer, from whom they will get a much better deal than from the crooks?

Mr. Lammy: I know that my hon. Friend has campaigned on those issues for many years. I also know what the Association of Personal Injury Lawyers has said in the past few weeks about the matter. He knows that Sir David Clementi has just reported. We must examine the detail of the report, but we must also let the Claims Standards Council at least to have the opportunity to rectify the position.

Written Constitution

24. David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): What recent representations he has received on the establishment of a written constitution for the United Kingdom. [207409]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): I have received occasional representations on the establishment of a written constitution from some hon. Members in the course of parliamentary questions and debate. However, my officials have no record of any correspondence from the public on the matter since September.

David Taylor: The current British constitution is an amalgam of documents such as Magna Carta, Acts of Parliament, case law and convention. It provides little protection for the rights of citizens, and none for the legacy of Governments. Does my hon. Friend agree that in the face of the Conservative commitment to repeal the Human Rights Act 1998 on that far-off day when a Conservative Government are returned to office, all such future reforms must be entrenched in the British constitution so that changes can occur only through special measures such as super-majorities in this place or referendums in the country?

Mr. Leslie: It is not the case that most of our constitution is unwritten. Large parts of it are enshrined in statute law, including the human rights legislation to which my hon. Friend referred and the distribution of powers relating to the devolved Administrations. This is not just a question of the codification of a constitution; it is more about any reforms to it that are proposed. We have a series of reforms for improving the separation of powers between the legislature, the Executive and the judiciary, and they will be put before the House shortly.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): If a written constitution were put in place, would the Minister's boss, the Lord Chancellor, who advocates constitutional change in the other place, still be required to qualify for his job by being either a friend or a former flatmate of the Prime Minister?

Mr. Leslie: I wonder whether that was a slightly facetious question. I suspect that it was, and I shall therefore not dignify it with a substantive answer.

Tony Wright (Cannock Chase) (Lab): The Queen once said that she found the British constitution a bit of a puzzle. Would it not help to clear up that puzzle if we began to write a lot of it down? As my hon. Friend the Minister said, this Government have done a lot more writing down of provisions on matters such as human rights and freedom of information. Although it might not have made much sense a long time ago to try to codify the constitution, surely we have now reached a point at which some kind of codification would be sensible. Could not the Government produce a draft, so that we could see what it might propose?

Mr. Leslie: With respect to my hon. Friend, we could spend a great deal of time and effort on such a codification, but I am not convinced that it would achieve a great deal, particularly when there are so many other pressing priorities for legislative time. We need to have an eye to what our constituents want us to spend time talking about in Parliament.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst) (Con): Has the Minister acquainted himself with the work of the founding fathers in the United States, whose genius provided the Americans with a constitution that has protected them for more than two centuries from the kind of capricious changes that this Government have made to our governmental arrangements? Does the Minister agree that it would serve the British people well if we had a genius similar to that of the founding fathers to protect us from his Government?

Mr. Leslie: This Administration are doing a pretty good job of reforming and improving our constitution; in that respect, I think that we are trying our best. Just because a constitution is written and codified does not mean that it will not be amended or reformed, even in the United States. I do not therefore believe that this question rests on codification. The focus of attention should be more on how a constitution evolves and improves.

Clementi Review

25. Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): If he will make a statement on Sir David Clementi's review of the regulation of the legal profession. [207411]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. David Lammy): I refer my hon. and learned Friend to my earlier statement, made on Wednesday 15 December 2004.

Vera Baird: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply and I appreciate that some aspects of Clementi have already been discussed today. One recommendation that he makes, which has already been made by the Office of Fair Trading, is that the traditional rules on the way in which the legal profession is organised—with barristers being unable to go into partnerships, and clients having to go to a solicitor before seeing a barrister, for example—impede the public's access to cheap, high quality legal services. Does the Minister agree that access to legal services is very important and that non-access to them represents an element of social exclusion that we cannot tolerate? Does he also agree that some of Clementi's suggestions are capable—subject to safeguards about the independence of the profession—of expanding the availability of legal services to our client group, especially to poorer people?

Mr. Lammy: My hon. and learned Friend knows that we have broadly accepted the recommendations of Sir David Clementi, but we have to look at the de[illegible] She will also have heard the discussions that we [illegible] on the matter this morning. It is right that w[illegible] ways of getting outside investment into [illegible] and ways in which lawyers and non-law[illegible] together, but we have to have the right [illegible] place. We must therefore consider [illegible] introduction of legal disciplinary practice [illegible] to all the stakeholders involved, particula[illegible]er groups and members of the legal professio[illegible]

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): There might be some frustration among the general public at the time scale involved in introducing the regulatory and complaints proposals through a White Paper and the statutory process. In regard to the issue raised by the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) on legal disciplinary practices, has the Minister formed a view as to whether the "fit to own" suggestion by Sir David Clementi should be implemented by statute—and if so, at what sort of threshold—and whether a maximum stake should be set by law for outside interests in lawyers' practices?

Mr. Lammy: The hon. Gentleman's question cuts to the heart of the issues. We have not formed a view, but we are consulting and talking to ensure that we get any such outcome right. He is right that the safeguards regarding the "fit to profit" test are at the centre of the discussion, and if we are to have outside ownership we must get the balance right. We are consulting and talking and I have a round of meetings over the next few months so that we can get into the detail.

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): The Law Society yet again reiterated yesterday that it does not have the power to force solicitors to repay money to their clients if that has been erroneously deducted to a third party such as a claims handler. In what time scale can we expect action to stop that scandal?

Mr. Lammy: If there are particular problems, let me hear about them so that we can deal with them. My hon. Friend knows that the whole point of asking Sir David Clementi to examine the entire issue was so that we could get the statutory footing right. If the Law Society does not have powers, the Government can deal with that.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): The final report of Sir David Clementi on the regulatory framework for English and Welsh legal services has been well received by most interested parties and certainly by the official Opposition. On the report's suggestion for designing a suitable regulatory system, are the Government in favour of model A, model B or model B-plus?

Mr. Lammy: I have now said several times that we got the report in December and that it is right for us to consider and consult on it. We have indicated that we want to move towards a White Paper, but let us get on with detailed discussions with the legal profession, of which the hon. Gentleman is part.

Mental Capacity Bill

26. Mr. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South) (Lab): If he will make a statement on the Lord Chancellor's recent discussions with the Archbishop of Cardiff on the Mental Capacity Bill. [207412]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. David Lammy): We have had an ongoing dialogue with the Archbishop of Cardiff and other stakeholders. The dialogue has been a success and has improved and reinforced the Bill. I undertook on Report to reinforce the Bill further, which is why we will amend it in another place so that when the best-interest determination relates to life-sustaining treatment, a decision maker must not be motivated by a desire to bring about a person's death, regardless of what would be in his best interests.

Mr. Chapman: Those of us who have been concerned about some aspects of what is overall a good Bill will draw some reassurance from what my hon. Friend says. Will he add to that reassurance by making it clear that the word "decision", as used in the Bill, covers omissions as well as acts?

Mr. Lammy: The reason we have continued the dialogue that we have held, especially with the Catholic Church, is to make the Bill better. We should not forget the many millions of people who will benefit from the Bill. It was because of the dialogue that we had clause 58 and were able to rule out euthanasia. It was because of the dialogue that we were able to strengthen aspects of the Bill relating to advance decisions and that we were able to establish that anyone with the motivation of bringing about death—that is at the heart of the discussion about omission—should not be able to do so.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Why does not the Minister get rid of all this jargon? Why does he not talk about conversations rather than dialogue, and why does he not ask his officials to write answers that he can read to the House that are written in the Queen's English and comprehensible to all those who listen?

Mr. Lammy: I hope that the hon. Gentleman understands that the decisions are important and that serious cases regarding life-sustaining treatment go through our courts each year. Whether he likes it or not, Law Lords and judges in the Court of Appeal spend a long time discussing such issues. I am sorry that he does not understand the legal position on life-sustaining treatment, but I give absolutely no apology for making that clear to the House.

Jim Dobbin (Heywood and Middleton) (Lab/Co-op): Is the Minister aware of the concerns of disability rights groups such as the "I Decide" coalition about the Bill, and will the Government take those concerns into consideration? Their concerns are similar to those to which Baroness Chapman alluded in her excellent speech, if he has had time to read it, in the debate in the House of Lords yesterday.

Mr. Lammy: Yes, I am aware of those concerns. This is a question of getting the balance right between those in the "I Decide" coalition who want to ensure that those who lack capacity and who are disabled have rights, and those who have taken up issues in relation to life-sustaining treatment. Dialogue has taken place because of that balance, and I am sure that we will achieve a compromise with which everyone is satisfied.

Magistrates

27. Richard Ottaway (Croydon, South) (Con): What plans he has to remunerate magistrates. [207413]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): Although lay magistrates in England and Wales are not remunerated, they receive reimbursement for their travel costs and loss of earnings resulting from the discharge of their official duties. Further resources are not available to change that arrangement at this time.

Richard Ottaway: That relates only to certain magistrates, and it was a fairly mealy-mouthed answer to those who deal with 97 per cent. of the crime in this country. The Government impose a huge number of demands on magistrates who do fantastic work both inside the courts and outside, such as extra training in relation to antisocial behaviour orders. The reserve forces get bounties, and councillors get paid and only have to show their face in the council chamber once every six months. Why cannot the Minister remunerate people who do something useful in the community?

Mr. Leslie: Of course, I agree that magistrates do a fantastic job and we owe them a great debt for their role in the local administration of justice across the country. However, the hon. Gentleman's plan for remunerating and paying thousands of magistrates is not on our agenda right now. If the Conservative party proposes to add that to its list of spending commitments, that shows how hollow its commitment to the shadow Chancellor's supposed tax-cutting agenda is. It could not afford the plan and, in fact, it proposes to scrap pretty much all of this particular Department.

LEADER OF THE HOUSE

The Leader of the House was asked—

New Voters' Guide

36. Shona McIsaac (Cleethorpes) (Lab): What plans he has to send a new voters' guide to every 18-year-old. [207399]

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Peter Hain): The Modernisation Committee, which I chair, recommended that the House devise a new voters' guide to be sent to all young people around the time of their 18th birthday. The House of Commons Commission has authorised further exploration of this proposal and has stated that it would not authorise the production and distribution of such a guide without the prior approval of the House, which I hope to seek soon.

Shona McIsaac: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. I wonder, however, whether he has read some of the research that reveals that turnout among first-time voters is low because many of those young people simply do not know what to do when they get into the polling station. Such a measure would therefore complement the work of many Members of Parliament, schools and colleges. Were the House to support such a measure, when would he anticipate a guide being sent to new voters?

Mr. Hain: I very much agree with my hon. Friend's point. Indeed, I recall an incident in the Islwyn by-election when I knocked on a door and an 18-year-old came to the door who asked me, "If I make a mistake in the polling booth, will they have a go at me?" She did not ask me what would happen if she voted one way or the other. There was therefore a degree of concern, worry and intimidation in her question. The sending out of a new voters' guide, possibly in your name, Mr. Speaker, would explain to every young person their democratic rights and opportunities and how to vote. Closing the gap between young people and Westminster would be a big boost for democracy.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Would the Leader of the House consider sending, along with the guide, contact and surgery details relating to new voters' MPs?

Mr. Hain: I think that that is the responsibility of the House of Commons, but there is a good chance of that happening.

Regional Grand Committees

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley) (Lab): If he will make provision for Grand Committees for each region in the UK. [207400]

The Deputy Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Phil Woolas): As my hon. Friend knows, there is already a Scottish Grand Committee, a Welsh Grand Committee and a Northern Ireland Grand Committee, and the Standing Committee on Regional Affairs fulfils much the same function for England. It is open to the Standing Committee to meet to discuss a topic of concern to a particular region, and any Member for an English constituency may attend. My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House is open to suggestion for potential topics for debate.

Mr. Hoyle: That was an interesting answer. What we ought to be saying is that we should enfranchise Members in, for instance, the north-west following the rejection of regional government. There ought to be a way of making quangos accountable, and to provide the same benefits that Scotland and Wales have enjoyed in the House of Commons. It is only right for us to have a regional Question Time allowing us to make Ministers accountable to the Members who are affected by their decisions. Will my hon. Friend consider a trial programme for a region such as the north-west, which has a larger population and gross domestic product than Scotland? We could then judge whether there were benefits in the extension of such Question Times to other regions

Mr. Woolas: I certainly think that the north-west should be first to be involved in any such trial. That much is obvious to my right hon. Friend and me. My right hon. Friend agrees that those of us who represent English regions should have opportunities to debate regional issues. He would be willing to consider the option of English regional Grand Committees if there were widespread support for it, but it is not clear that such Committees would offer significantly more advantages than the current Standing Committee on Regional Affairs. That Committee can and does debate issues of regional interest: for example, it last met to debate regional economic performance and the Northern Way.

When my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local and Regional Government canvassed on the idea of separate Standing Committees—first raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice)—it found little favour.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Can the Minister tell us how many times the Standing Committee on Regional Affairs has met during the seven years for which it has been meeting?

Mr. Woolas: I recall that when I was the Committee's Whip it was difficult to persuade many Members to attend, but it has held useful meetings on a number of matters—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] I am about to answer. It has held meetings on a number of matters, including the important Northern Way economic strategy and planning policy—the regional policy raised by the hon. Gentleman's own party.

I repeat that this is a matter for Members in the English regions. If there is support for the idea of debating issues in the Standing Committee, that is open to the Committee.

Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend accept that we are faced with a growing accountability deficit? In the north-east, the regional development agency is engaged in discussions aimed at identifying a site for a mega-casino—one site somewhere in the north-east. No public accountability applies to those discussions and processes, which is unacceptable. Will the Government now address that?

Mr. Woolas: My hon. Friend has raised an important point relating to the accountability of regional bodies for regional decisions. That is why my right hon. Friend is encouraging participation in the Standing Committee.

Sitting Hours

Ms Meg Munn (Sheffield, Heeley) (Lab/Co-op): What recommendations he has made to the Select Committee on the Modernisation of the House for the future sitting hours of the House. [207401]

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Peter Hain): The Modernisation Committee published its report on sitting hours this morning. A copy has been sent to every Member. It recommends that the current hours be made permanent, with sittings beginning an hour earlier on Thursdays to accommodate more substantial business and rebalance the sitting week. I intend to give the House an opportunity to reach a decision on our future sitting hours in the next few weeks.

Ms Munn: I thank my right hon. Friend for his answer and congratulate the Committee on its report.

Does my right hon. Friend agree that at a time when the Government are requiring public services such as the health service to modernise, it would be very negative of the House to vote to return to its former ways of working, rather than seeking to balance the unique role of Parliament with more modern ways of working that better reflect the experience of the constituents whom we represent?

Mr. Hain: I could not agree more with my hon. Friend. It would be wrong for this House to revert to the working hours of the Victorian era. We should reflect modern working practices and that is what the Committee recommends.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): It should not be for the Modernisation Committee to lecture the House—[Interruption.] The responses of Members of Parliament to the Procedure Committee's questionnaire showed that only—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is too much conversation among the Whips, who have been talking for the best part of half an hour. It is going to stop, or the hon. Member in question will be removed from the Chamber.

Mr. Heald: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Only 31 per cent. of Members wanted to keep the current Tuesday hours, while 65 per cent. wanted the House to sit on Tuesday evenings. Of course, there are some good things in the report that I support, but the plea that the Committee is making in respect of Tuesdays is a rather desperate one. Surely we are entitled to take our own decisions on these matters, and if the House takes the view that it is more convenient to sit on Tuesday evenings, it should be able to do so. Can the Leader of the House assure us that there will be an early vote on restoring Tuesday evening sittings?

Mr. Hain: I certainly can assure the hon. Gentleman that there will be an opportunity for an early vote. As he points out, there are deep feelings about the issue of Tuesdays, on which the House is divided. I had hoped to achieve a consensus through the Committee's work and through my prior consultations with many Members from all parts of the House—I thank those who took part—but it was not possible. In the end, the House will make the decision, but the view that the Modernisation Committee formed on this matter was a majority one. Its report is excellent and I commend it to every Member.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): Is it not a fact that the Modernisation Committee has considered all the evidence very carefully? The shadow Leader of the House said that Members want to sit on Tuesday evenings, and it is true that quite a large number want to take private Members' Bills then and to cancel all Friday sittings. The report recognises that this issue will have to be considered at a later stage, but is it not a fact that in focusing on the entire sitting week and the particular problems associated with Thursdays, the report has tried to give the House a balanced view, based on all the evidence submitted to it during the inquiry?

Mr. Hain: I agree with my hon. Friend. There was a strong argument in favour of shifting private Members' Bills perhaps to Tuesday evenings—indeed, probably a majority of Committee members were in favour of that idea—thereby making all Fridays constituency days.

But we did not want to do that in isolation from the wider issues associated with private Members' Bills, which is why the report reached the conclusion that it did. The point that my hon. Friend makes is important, in that it is wrong always to have, in effect, a lot of one-line business on a Thursday and to risk the danger of becoming a House of Commons that sits for only part of the week. That is why we recommend sitting for an additional hour on Thursdays, and I hope that the House will support that recommendation. Doing so will enable Second Readings and Opposition days to be taken and a rebalancing of the week, so that we work a full week and go back to our constituencies on Fridays.

Hunting Act 2004

Sir Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton) (Lab) (Urgent Question): To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the Government's policy towards applications in the courts for injunctions to delay or to prevent the commencement of the Hunting Act 2004.

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): I am very grateful to my right hon. Friend for his question, because it enables me to provide the House with some clarity in respect of issues that have been rather muddled in the press and other media comment. It might assist the House if I explain the legal and policy background to this issue before coming to the specifics of what we expect to happen in court on 25 January. I shall deal in particular with the challenge mounted by the Countryside Alliance to the validity of the Hunting Act 2004, which is based specifically on its argument that the Parliament Act 1949 is invalid. We disagree. We do not believe that its challenge will succeed, and we will vigorously contest that challenge.

In view of some confused press comment, I must make it clear that what I am about to say has nothing whatever to do with any possible challenge under the European convention on human rights. Those who suggest that there could be a long delay in commencement from 25 January because of a human rights challenge are incorrect and misinformed, as incorporation challenges on human rights grounds are dealt with in our own courts under the Human Rights Act 1998. We do not have such a challenge as yet, but a challenge to the Scottish legislation failed, and we would not expect a different outcome here. In any event, human rights challenges are usually dealt with following commencement of legislation, and there are plenty of precedents. There are two possible avenues of challenge, and they are unrelated, as is our response to them. I want to be absolutely clear about that.

Let me now come to the Parliament Act challenge. The point of that challenge, to be heard on 25 January, is to allow the Countryside Alliance to promote its claim that the Hunting Act 2004 is not valid law. We expect that challenge to fail. It is only after the court has decided against that Countryside Alliance claim that any issue of delay becomes relevant. As the chairman of the Countryside Alliance himself made clear, lawyers have already discussed the next steps, as is quite normal in advance of a court hearing. Having failed, the alliance will seek leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal. If that is granted—it is a matter for the court—it says that it will seek an injunction to delay commencement of the Act from 18 February. As hon. Members are aware, that date is three months after Royal Assent, as provided for in the Hunting Act itself, and the Countryside Alliance intends to seek a delay until after its appeal has been heard.

I do not know what view the court will take, but we neither oppose nor support such an application if we reach that stage—and for two reasons. First, we want certainty, and supporters of hunting have claimed that there is uncertainty. The right place for their challenge is in the courts. We confidently expect to have our view that the Act is valid upheld. We expect the case and any subsequent appeal to be dealt with quite quickly, and no one will then have reason for any doubt whatever or for believing that they might be justified in undertaking activity that is, in fact, illegal. Secondly, we are relaxed because the date of commencement of 18 February was neither the Government's proposal nor what the House voted for. MPs voted for 31 July 2006. It is the Countryside Alliance and its representatives in the Lords, through what the media described as the kamikaze option, who rejected that date and insisted on retaining early commencement.

What is in the Act is a matter of fact, and it is for the courts to interpret what is in the Act. I suggest that any colleague who says, in effect, that those who made their bed must now lie on it, should also be relaxed and leave it to the courts. We are confident that the Hunting Act is valid and rightly fulfils the will of the elected Chamber of Parliament. We are confident that the result of the court hearing will uphold that view and do so soon, providing certainty for everyone on all sides of the debate.

Sir Gerald Kaufman: Will my right hon. Friend give the House an assurance that there have been no discussions between the Government and the Countryside Alliance on this issue behind the back of the House of Commons, which has expressed its will repeatedly by large majorities? Will he further confirm that, whatever the courts may be able to do, they are not able to change the text of an Act of Parliament, and the Hunting Act lays down commencement three calendar months after enactment on 18 November? Will he take it from me and many other Members that we are sick and tired of hearing two voices coming from the Front Bench on this dispute? The House of Commons has expressed its will that it does not want any fiddling or messing about: it wants this Act of Parliament to come into force and to do so without the Government conniving with the Countryside Alliance to prevent it.

Alun Michael: I urge my right hon. Friend not to give in to any temptation to believe that there are two voices coming from the Government, nor to indulge in conspiracy theories. I am happy to give him all the assurances that he requests on these matters. First, he asked what discussions had taken place. I have confirmed precisely what the chairman of the Countryside Alliance said: that there have been discussions between lawyers about what will happen when a case comes before the court. It is as simple as that. No other discussions are of any relevance whatever.

Secondly, my right hon. Friend asked about what the Hunting Act states. As I have made clear, it states that commencement will be three months after Royal Assent. It is not for me to say what the court will make of that. I simply do not know. Neither am I a lawyer nor do I seek to look into the court's mind. The court must do its work, just as this House did when it decided on the legislation.

Finally, I assure my right hon. Friend that the Government do not have two voices on this matter. There is only one voice. I have articulated the Government's position, which has been consistent throughout. I am very pleased that many hon. Members who worked passionately to bring the Hunting Act into law believe that my approach, which I articulated in December, is right. We want the law to be clear. It is the Countryside Alliance, not the Government, that is attempting to cause confusion, and we want that confusion to be set aside authoritatively by the court. After that, let everyone obey the law of the land.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire) (Con): There can be no precedent for the way in which the Government used the Parliament Act to ram through a Bill and then immediately briefed the press to the effect that they would not object to a judicial delay to its implementation. The Minister is right to say that that delay is a matter not for the Government or the Attorney-General but for the court. The Government's view is irrelevant and does not matter at all. In that case, surely the briefing given by No. 10 in advance of the Boxing day meets can be seen as nothing other than a grubby political ploy to avoid too great a political outcry in the run-up to the general election?

Alun Michael: That was a pretty pathetic attempt. The hon. Gentleman has introduced nonsense to the debate, and it is clear that he did not listen to the answer that I gave to my right hon. Friend. The Government did not ram through the Hunting Act. The House voted 10 times in 10 years for the essential content of what is a good piece of legislation. That should be respected, as we now have an Act of Parliament. The Countryside Alliance has every right to challenge it in the courts and to set out its beliefs in a proper and constitutional way. That is what is happening, and we should await the outcome.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about a briefing. I am not sure what briefing the Countryside Alliance gave. I first heard its chairman say that the issues had been discussed by lawyers from both sides on the "Today" programme, shortly before I had to respond to his comments. However, the hon. Gentleman, like the Countryside Alliance, likes to spread confusion. He should not be allowed to succeed.

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): I am sure that the Minister's contribution has clarified matters for everyone in the House, as his previous statements on the legislation have done. Does he agree that in a sense whatever the court or Parliament may say is irrelevant, as the Act as currently constituted is unworkable and will not bring an end to hunting?

Alun Michael: No, my hon. Friend is absolutely wrong. I am grateful to have the opportunity to contradict her in terms. The Act is workable and enforceable, and makes very clear what is banned and what people should not do because it is now illegal. Hunters are always described as normally law-abiding people. I hope that they will abide by the law.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): It is important that the democratic will of the House is properly and rigorously defended by the Government. The Minister knows that a case was made at various stages of the Bill's progress for compensation for those whose livelihoods would be affected by the Act. As the Act is supposed to be implemented on 18 February, does he agree that if the Government had accepted compensatory measures—after all, it is an Act of Parliament, not an act of God, and livelihoods will be affected—the case for delay and the case being made by the Countryside Alliance would be considerably weakened?

Alun Michael: We do not accept that there is a case for compensation. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman and I have discussed that on a number of occasions. I have made my position clear. We do not believe that with commencement on 18 February, there is any justification for compensation. Our view is consistent with the view that was taken by the Joint Committee on Human Rights. Incidentally, people often say that the Joint Committee on Human Rights found that there were flaws in the Act. It did not, and that has been made clear in the House. Nevertheless, people attempt to spread confusion about that, so I am glad to make it absolutely clear. We recognised that some people's employment would be affected, so the later date for commencement—we proposed July 2006, and the House agreed with that proposition—would have given everyone time to change their activities, take up drag hunting and consider other ways of ensuring that employment could continue through other equine activities, and so on, but the case against compensation remains strong, even with the date of 18 February. That is not the issue today. The question of a challenge is nothing to do with human rights or compensation. It is to do with whether the Parliament Act 1949 is valid. We believe that it is. We believe that the Hunting Act 2004 is valid and sound, and we will say that clearly in the courts, as we have said in the House. We are being entirely consistent, as always.

Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): Is not the sensible way forward for hunts to use whatever time is available to wind up their activities or make alternative provision in a thoughtful and sensible way?

Alun Michael: Yes, my hon. Friend is right. My advice to hunts—[Interruption.] I would advise hunts not to consider that the challenge might succeed, but to undertake such actions as are necessary for them to comply with the Hunting Act 2004, as passed by the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to be the practice that whenever the Minister gets up to speak, certain hon. Members try to talk him down and shout across the Chamber. I will not tolerate that.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): The Minister said a moment ago that the Countryside Alliance and its supporters in the Lords voted for an immediate ban. Which way did the Lord Chancellor vote?

Alun Michael: I am not sure what the relevance of the question is. It was the president of the Countryside Alliance who sought to frustrate the possibility of the House of Lords endorsing the date of July 2006 which was proposed by this House. The House has taken a clear and reasonable view. The Government have always sought to bring reason into a debate where reason is often in short supply. We continue to do so.

Tony Wright (Cannock Chase) (Lab): On a previous occasion, I suggested to the Minister that whether the Act was good or bad for foxes, it would be certainly be good for lawyers. He rejected the suggestion at that time. Does not his statement today confirm it?

Alun Michael: No, it does not. It confirms what I said before. We have always known that the Countryside Alliance would make two challenges—one on the Parliament Act and the other on human rights issues, although it has not commenced any such action. The Countryside Alliance has made it clear for several years that that was its intention, so it should come as no surprise to anyone. We believe that the outcome will be clear and simple in both cases and that neither of the challenges will succeed, so I still say my hon. Friend is wrong.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): The right hon. Gentleman will doubtless remember the amendment on the Order Paper of 15 September in my name, which provided that if the legality of the Act should be challenged before the courts at its implementation date, the Act should not come into force until those proceedings had been disposed of. Would it not have been a great deal more transparent and, some might say, honest of the Government to have accepted that amendment, or at least its sense, rather than to embark on a wholly unprecedented device in order save their electoral bacon?

Alun Michael: No, that is a crazy approach. The right hon. and learned Gentleman suggests that we should anticipate challenges to legislation that has properly been put in place by the House. He may want to undermine the good law-making processes of the House, but I think it is for the House to pass legislation in a proper way and for the courts to do their job. Let us keep the two separate.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): Am I the only Labour Member to be fed up with the constant sniping by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Sir Gerald Kaufman) at the Front Bench? I take the view that the Hunting Act that was passed is good law and we should leave it to the courts to decide how it should be implemented.

Alun Michael: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his support. I would not criticise my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Sir Gerald Kaufman), because by raising the question he has enabled the House to clarify things and to give less excuse to those on the Opposition Benches and in the Countryside Alliance who want confusion to prevail—but I agree with my hon. Friend.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): The Minister hopes for clarity on the law, and I agree. Can he confirm that after the date of commencement, whenever it turns out to be, exempt hunting, drag hunting, exercising hounds, chasing away, searching and unintentional hunting will continue to be legal?

Alun Michael: I can confirm that the Act bans only those things that it bans. What people ought to do is to look at the Act, the provisions of which are clear. We are doing all that we can to ensure that people have clear understanding of the legislation, which is quite a challenge given the amount of misinformation that has been put out by those who do not like the Act. I suggest to the hon. Gentleman that the Act is much clearer than he seeks to imply.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): What is the Minister's current forecast of the implementation date for the legislation, in the light of what he said in his statement about likely court proceedings and their timing? Will he assure his hon. Friends that he is desperately striving to get the Act implemented before the election?

Alun Michael: My current prediction on the date of implementation is 18 February. It will be a court decision, which I shall certainly not anticipate, as to whether there should be any delay to that commencement. We have already heard people say that there could be no delay because the legislation is clear and specific about the date of commencement—three months after Royal Assent—but that is a matter to be discussed if, as we anticipate, the case fails following the hearing of first instance and an application is made for an injunction. It will be for the court to decide, and I am happy to leave it to the court.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) is right in one thing: there have been two voices from the Government. First, there was a Bill that would have allowed hunting to continue under licence, and then there was a Government Bill to ban all hunting. That is what has exasperated my constituents. Given that they will lose their livelihood through this wretched measure, surely they should be permitted, without interference from the Government, to pursue all their entitlements through the courts in the proper way.

Alun Michael: The hon. Gentleman ought to explain to his constituents how reasonable the Government have been in trying to find a less divisive way through this most divisive of issues. That is why I brought proposals to the House, with the support of the Prime Minister, as has been made clear on many occasions. The House voted for a different piece of legislation. It amended the Bill that I introduced and voted in the same way as it has on 10 occasions over 10 years. I respect that; so should the hon. Gentleman, and so should his constituents.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): Does not the delay in implementation, at which I think the Minister has hinted today, give all those who are genuinely concerned about animal welfare—that includes the middle way group, which I think includes the Minister, although sadly not the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman)—a genuine chance to look again at any new evidence that has emerged since the measure became an Act of Parliament? In that context, will the Minister give a commitment to meet the middle way group to discuss its report on the welfare aspects of shooting foxes, which has passed the peer group review process and is established scientific fact?

Alun Michael: May I clarify the point absolutely? I have given no hint of delay; I have simply acknowledged our understanding that an application for a delay in commencement may be made by the Countryside Alliance when it loses its case at the hearing of first instance. I have made it clear several times that we are content to leave the court to look at the issues and at what the Act says and to take a decision on such an application.

The hon. Gentleman raised animal welfare issues. We are concerned about those issues, but it is important for those who support hunting to recognise that legislation is now in place and, even as they continue their challenge in the court—the right place to do so—to engage with animal welfare issues. It is for that reason that I shall seek to promote discussions, including animal welfare organisations and those involved in hunting activities, on issues relating to the welfare of horses and dogs that might arise from the implementation of the legislation, whether that is on 18 February, which is the working assumption with which we must stay, or whether there is a decision by the court that makes a difference to that expectation.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): I agree with the Minister this far: about the only clear part of the Hunting Act is the clause on its implementation date. Does not he think it regrettable that the Attorney-General and No. 10 allowed themselves to be quoted in the media discussing the implementation question? Would not it have been better to leave that to private discussions between the respective lawyers and the courts?

Did the Minister authorise the writing of the article in The Sunday Telegraph by his Parliamentary Private Secretary, the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley), which seemed to counter, shall we say, some of the arguments that the Minister urged—in good faith, I am sure—when he was piloting the Bill through the House?

Alun Michael: First, the hon. and learned Gentleman, as a lawyer, should know that the whole Bill is clear. It makes very clear what is illegal following the date of commencement, and I hope that he and Opposition Members who have, in other circumstances, enjoined people to obey the law will encourage their constituents to obey the Hunting Act. The law is absolutely clear and the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray) ought to read the Act and counsel his constituents to obey the law. I should be interested to know whether he still holds to his words about letting loose the dogs of war or whether he supports his other statements about people obeying the law. The Conservative party needs to be a little bit clearer than it has been up to now as to whether it is a law-abiding party.

The second point raised by the hon. and learned Gentleman was on discussions between lawyers on the two sides. I heard the chairman of the Countryside Alliance refer to those discussions and the alliance appears to have made it clear that it would apply for an injunction in the event of its failing in the hearing of first instance.

Finally, the hon. and learned Gentleman referred to an article in The Sunday Telegraph. Through the encouragement of some Opposition Members, I have received various pieces of correspondence from people who, like him, have clearly not read the interesting article written by my Parliamentary Private Secretary. I should be interested to receive comments and contributions from people who have actually read the article. I suggest that the hon. and learned Gentleman does so—he clearly has not done so as yet.

Guantanamo Bay

12.58 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Jack Straw): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement concerning the return to the United Kingdom of the four British citizens detained at Guantanamo Bay.

Let me first recall the context. The attacks of 11 September 2001 were the worst terrorist atrocity that the United States, the United Kingdom and the whole world have ever suffered. In response to those attacks, a coalition of countries came together to launch a military campaign against al-Qaeda and its Taliban supporters, to remove them from their strongholds in Afghanistan and elsewhere.

In those operations, thousands of individuals believed to be al-Qaeda or Taliban fighters or their supporters were detained by coalition forces. The vast majority of those individuals were released, but those who were deemed to pose a substantial risk of returning to the conflict were sent by the United States to detention facilities at its naval base at Guantanamo Bay, there to be detained and questioned about their knowledge of al-Qaeda's activities. As a result, valuable information has been gained, which has helped to protect the international community from further al-Qaeda and related terrorist attacks.

Approximately 200 individuals have been released from Guantanamo Bay since their original detention. However, the United States Government believe that a number of detainees so released have returned to terrorism, demonstrating the dilemma faced by the United States in considering such releases.

Nine British citizens were among those originally detained at Guantanamo Bay. I and the Government as a whole have taken our consular responsibilities to those detained very seriously. British officials have visited them regularly, delivered messages and mail from their families and secured improvements in the physical conditions of their detention. I have made a written ministerial statement to the House following each of those visits.

I have also set out to the House on many occasions the British Government's consistent position in relation to these detainees and their detention. As the House will recall, discussions took place in 2003, led by my noble and learned Friend the Attorney-General on the UK side. The Government then requested the return of all of the British detainees held at Guantanamo Bay.

Five of the nine detainees were returned to the United Kingdom last March. In announcing their return to the House on 24 February last year, I said that the Government would continue to work to resolve the position of the remaining four British detainees: Feroz Abbasi, Moazzam Begg, Jamaal Belmar and Martin Mubanga. Since last March, the Government have been in regular discussion with the United States authorities about this. Foreign Office Ministers and I have also held a number of meetings with the families and lawyers of the four men and with their Members of Parliament, and officials have been in regular contact with them.

Following contact between the United Kingdom and the United States—involving, in particular, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and his office—and between United States Secretary of State Colin Powell and myself, the United States Government have now agreed to the return of all four men to the United Kingdom. That decision follows intensive and complex discussions to address United States security concerns. All the families have been informed of that decision this morning, as have their Members of Parliament.

The four men will be returned in the next few weeks. Once they are back in the United Kingdom, the police will consider whether to arrest them under the Terrorism Act 2000 for questioning in connection with possible terrorist activity. Any subsequent action will be a matter for the police and the Crown Prosecution Service. The House will understand that it would therefore not be right for me to comment further on that aspect of the matter.

I should like to assure the House that every practical step will be taken by the relevant United Kingdom authorities to maintain national security and to protect public safety. Throughout the period of detention of British nationals in Guantanamo Bay, the Government have sought to balance the need to safeguard the interests of Britons detained overseas with our duty to meet the threat from international terrorism.

Terrorism is opposed to the values of every faith and religion, and seeks to deny the most basic of human rights—the right to life, to security and to go about our daily business free from harm. Working with our allies, we will continue resolutely to defend those rights through a robust and determined approach to combating terrorism and its networks of support wherever these are found.

Mr. Michael Ancram (Devizes) (Con): I thank the Foreign Secretary for advance sight of this statement.

I welcome the announcement of the return of those four British citizens. The Opposition have unremittingly supported the fight against terrorism, but equally, we have always believed that such a fight must be conducted within the rule of law. We have for some time expressed reservations about detention without due process or trial at Guantanamo Bay—reservations recently given even stronger expression by the United States Supreme Court.

Although those are the last of the British citizens being held at Guantanamo Bay, our reservations in principle remain, as they involve a strong ally with whom we are rightly continuing to work closely in Iraq and Afghanistan. In that regard, while fully accepting the United States dilemma to which the Foreign Secretary referred, what further representations will he make to our American allies about the process of detention at Guantanamo Bay?

My general welcome of this announcement still leaves serious questions to be answered. Given our concern that justice by due process is done in relation to those four, what assurances can the Foreign Secretary give that they will be subjected to normal due process in this country on their return?

The British public must be protected from terrorists. Is the Foreign Secretary satisfied in general on the information available to him that, on their return, those four will not pose a threat to the security of this country or its citizens? What assurances can he give that the protection of British citizens from the threat of terrorism will not in any way be undermined by the release, as opposed to the return, of those four men?

Those men were taken into custody by United States forces in the chaotic circumstances of post-Taliban Afghanistan and near the notoriously unpoliceable Afghanistan-Pakistan border. Has the Foreign Secretary established to his satisfaction the circumstances in which those four were originally apprehended?

The detention facility at Guantanamo Bay did not just raise serious concerns at the process by which people were detained there. Serious questions have also been raised about the treatment of detainees. For instance, one of them, Moazzam Begg, alleges that he was the victim of torture. Obviously, that is a most serious allegation. Can the Foreign Secretary confirm whether the detainees will be asked not only about any allegation against them, but about the conditions that they underwent at Guantanamo Bay?

Does the return of those four bring with it any assurance that no British citizen will in future be held in Guantanamo Bay or in similar circumstances elsewhere without due process? Indeed, will the Foreign Secretary assure us that there are currently no further British citizens being held anywhere else in similar circumstances?

Winning the fight against terrorism requires us to win too, the fight for hearts and minds, both in Britain and in the Muslim world. In the struggle against terrorists, the balance between security and liberty is notoriously difficult to strike. The first duty of the Government is to defend their people, but was not the late United States President Eisenhower right to warn:

"We must not destroy what we are attempting to defend"?

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for the welcome that he has given to the release of those four gentlemen. Let me try to deal with his points in turn. We have an immediate locus in so far as our consular duties are concerned in respect of British citizens. With their return to the United Kingdom, representations about the specific conditions at Guantanamo Bay in respect of the British citizens will obviously come to an end. However, as members of the international community and signatories to various international conventions, we remain concerned about the conditions in which individuals have been, and continue to be, held there, and within that context, we will continue to make representations about them.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman asks whether normal due process will apply to those individuals when they return. Yes, of course, and I made that clear. He asks whether I can guarantee that those individuals do not pose a threat to the security of the United Kingdom. We have in place strengthened anti-terrorist legislation, including the Terrorism Act 2000 and the 2001 legislation. Those laws exist to ensure that those who pose a threat to the security of the United Kingdom are dealt with effectively. I will certainly not prejudge the guilt of any individual in advance of investigation by the police, the Crown Prosecution Service and the other appropriate authorities.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman asks about the allegations of mistreatment made by Moazzam Begg in particular. I am aware of those allegations, and I have already received oral representations about them by his family and his lawyers. We are pursuing those allegations with the United States authorities, and we will continue to do so. British consular officials visited the detainees on nine separate occasions in very difficult circumstances. It is fair to say that our officials, on my behalf, gave the British detainees a higher level of consular representation than did the foreign Governments of any other nationals who were held at Guantanamo Bay.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman finally asks whether I can be satisfied that no British citizen is held in any similar circumstance. The answer is that it is almost impossible to prove a negative, but I know of no other British citizen held at Guantanamo Bay in those circumstances; neither do I expect that any will be dispatched there.

Sir Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife) (LD): It appears that these men are about to be rescued from what has effectively been a legal no-man's land, and it would be churlish not to welcome that, but a number of questions remain. Why has it taken so long? What undertakings, if any, have been given to the United States Government about the way in which the men are to be treated once they return to the United Kingdom? What do the Government understand to be the state of health, both mental and physical, of these men?

Whatever the context, the truth is that the detention of these men violated all legal principle. Their civil rights were systematically and deliberately abused, and they were denied due process, a cornerstone of American legal jurisprudence. Has not this been a damaging episode which should never again be repeated?

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for his welcome for the announcement. I understand the concerns that he expressed so eloquently. It is important to understand the grave anxieties that arose in the United States following the 11 September atrocities, which was the first time that an attack by foreigners had taken place on its mainland in at least living memory. It produced the largest single set of casualties on the mainland since the American civil war. It has to be understood what a trauma the United States faced. There is no point dismissing that. It is a fact. The decisions that it made have to be seen in that context.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman asked why it has taken so long. It has taken this long to hold intensive discussions on the need for the United States to release the men and to recognise that they would be subject to our law, agreed by this Parliament, and no other law. That is what has happened. No side undertakings, which I think was in his mind, have been given to the US Government about how they will or will not be treated. They will be treated in accordance with the law. As happened with the five who were released last March, and as I said in my statement, it will be a matter for the police acting under the powers of the Terrorism Act 2000 to consider whether to interview them and detain them when they arrive in the UK, and a matter for the Crown Prosecution Service to take any action following on from that.

On the men's state of health, consular officials who visited them gave their own, but necessarily superficial and unqualified, assessment of the state of their physical health. It appeared to be reasonable, but that does not amount to a qualified assessment of the state of their physical, mental or psychological health. That will be a matter for them and their medical advisers.

Donald Anderson (Swansea, East) (Lab): The House will understand the dilemma posed by my right hon. Friend, but he must surely agree that the Guantanamo Bay saga has been very damaging to the image of the west and reduces our moral authority in the world. Will any allegations made by those who are to be released, together with those in the dossier published last August in respect of the other five, be strenuously pursued by my right hon. Friend? Will he also confirm that our concern extends beyond our nationals to the principle of detention in Guantanamo Bay in general? How do the Government view the proposals of the US Government either to set up a special prison, Camp Six, within Guantanamo Bay, where people can be held without trial indefinitely, or to hold those people in prisons within their countries of origin?

Mr. Straw: Any allegations that the gentlemen make will be pursued vigorously. Indeed, we are already pursuing some allegations in advance of their release. I think I answered the question about whether our concern extends beyond our nationals held in Guantanamo Bay. The answer is yes, but obviously the context in which we can make representations is different. We can only do that in respect of individuals if they are British citizens.

On the process that the US Government have established, it was as a direct result of representations by us on two of the four detainees that they abandoned their efforts to take those individuals before the military tribunals, which we regarded as flawed in process. On the establishment of the special prisons, I have only seen the newspaper reports on that. It is a matter for the US Government. They will have to make the decisions and be answerable for them.

Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): The Foreign Secretary said that he was not aware of other British citizens held in similar circumstances in Guantanamo Bay. My right hon. and learned Friend the shadow Foreign Secretary asked whether he was aware of British citizens held elsewhere in similar circumstances. Will he answer the question?

Mr. Straw: I am aware of some British citizens detained elsewhere. I am not aware of British citizens detained in similar circumstances. That is the answer to the question.

Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): Although I, like others, welcome the release of the men from Guantanamo Bay, the episode is nevertheless a dark stain on the reputation of the United States and has damaged our country's reputation throughout the world, particularly among Muslim nations.

My constituent, Jamal al-Harith, who was released last March, tells me that he has not been interviewed by the police since he arrived in Britain. He has certainly not been interviewed by Foreign Office officials or other domestic officers about the treatment he received in Guantanamo Bay; nor has there been an assessment of his mental or physical state of health. That is wrong. I would be grateful if my right hon. Friend could dwell on that. If we are to establish the facts that took place with respect to the four, it is important that proper interviewing takes place, including retrospective interviewing of my constituent.

Mr. Straw: My understanding is that each of the five who returned last March was interviewed by the police on arrival. I am as certain as I can be that that was the case. Police liaison officers were appointed for each of them.

As to whether we should proactively interview them about wider issues, it is normal for individuals who have complaints about treatment abroad to make those known to us, not directly, but through their Members of Parliament or solicitors. At that stage, we investigate them. It is my long experience that individuals are never slow in coming forward to make representations and we are always speedy and efficient in investigating them. It goes without saying that if my hon. Friend, the individual or his solicitor have concerns about his treatment which the individual thinks have not been made known to the British Government, we are happy to receive those representations. By definition, the concerns have to be initiated by the individual. We cannot second-guess his experiences.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): Does the Secretary of State accept that the very long time it has taken to get the United States to accept what surely ought to have been a natural reaction to representations by what has been her closest ally—even though many of us are unhappy about what we have done—casts doubt on the nature of the alliance? It is therefore important that he accepts the task of encouraging, pressing and pushing the United States to change its attitude to the kind of detention that has taken place in Guantanamo Bay. Its attitude damages the fight against terrorism because we have adopted there, as I believe we are adopting here, the very attitudes to human rights that we are trying to stop others removing.

Mr. Straw: Our position was different from that of the United States Government all the way through, and I set it out in the House on 24 February 2005, when I said that our overall position remained that the detainees should either be tried in accordance with international standards or returned to the United Kingdom. I do not think that the fact of Guantanamo Bay, difficult as it has been, casts doubt on the nature of the alliance. Indeed, had it not been for the nature of our alliance with the United States, we would not have got those nine detainees back. The issue of liberty and order and the way in which we deal with it is raised in its most acute form at times of war and terrorism. It is easy to defend ordinary human rights when the most important one—the right to life—is not under attack. When it is under attack, that defence becomes much more difficult.

I fully subscribe to the right hon. Gentleman's implication that we should never stoop to the level of the terrorists. However, it is accepted in the language of the European convention on human rights, many other international conventions and our own practice in the United Kingdom that when that most basic right, the right to life, is under attack, democratic liberal Governments are entitled to take action which, in normal circumstances, they would not be entitled to take, to defend it, as without it all other human rights become completely nugatory.

Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North) (Lab): May I welcome the decision to release my constituent, Richard Belmar, who has been detained for three years without charge? I welcome the continued work behind the scenes by the Attorney-General and the Foreign Office while deploring the time that it has taken for the United States Government to respond. Many of my constituents, especially, but by no means exclusively, my Muslim constituents, have expressed the gravest concern about the suspension of due legal process. Without doubt, the existence of Guantanamo Bay has created perceptions in the Muslim community that due process does not apply equally to Muslims and non-Muslims. Can my right hon. Friend assure me that he will pursue a three-track strategy of providing proper support to the family of my constituent; ensuring that due process is followed in the event of any charges or investigation; and doing everything possible to assure my constituents that public safety remains paramount?

Mr. Straw: I thank my hon. Friend for her remarks. As with other hon. Members, she has been assiduous and tenacious in her representations on behalf of her constituent who was detained. On the issue of proper support for the family, most of that will be provided locally rather than nationally, but if there are issues of concern, I am happy to meet her to discuss them. The answer to both her second and third points is yes.

Sarah Teather (Brent, East) (LD): The news of Martin Mubanga's release is obviously hugely welcome for his family in my constituency, and I thank the Foreign Secretary for giving me advance notice of his statement. This morning, I spoke to Martin's family, who are relieved but also cautious. They are hardened, having steeled themselves for two or three years for bad news. They are unsure about how Martin will be on his return, given his allegations about torture and mistreatment while in Guantanamo Bay. However, there is not any news of my other constituent, Jamil el-Banna, a Jordanian refugee who is a long-time British resident. What efforts are being made to secure his release, and will the Foreign Secretary confirm that the Government will not seek to revoke his refugee status, as previously suggested by Ministers in the other place?

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for her remarks. I understand the caution of Martin Mubanga's family, who are bound to be worried until each of those individuals is on British soil and back with their families. I hope, however, that that will be in the very near future. I am happy to receive any representations that the hon. Lady and the family wish to make.

As for Mr. el-Banna, the House will be aware that in international law we only have the standing to take up consular matters in respect of British citizens. That is a fact of international law, and it applies to citizens and nationals of all third countries. It means that we cannot make representations on behalf of people, however long they have been resident in the UK, who are not our nationals. More to the point, the US Government, consistent with their obligations under international law, would not accept such representations. I know that that is frustrating, and I have seen the families of a number of people in that position, but that is the situation. On the issue of that gentleman's refugee status, I am afraid that I know nothing whatever about it and, in any event, it is not a matter for me but for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central) (Lab): I warmly welcome the statement by right hon. Friend on behalf of the family of Feroz Abbasi, who feared that he might be incarcerated in perpetuity without charge in Guantanamo Bay. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, as the standard bearers of peace, democracy and justice, we will continue to fight for the rights of individuals to fair trial and fair treatment, whether in Guantanamo Bay or anywhere else in the world? Given the mental stress that the detainees have suffered for three years, will he ensure that there is a full evaluation of their mental health, and ensure that appropriate medical and financial support is provided for their rehabilitation? Can he reassure the British public that every effort will be made in future to protect both their security and their right to a fair trial, whether in Britain or abroad?

Mr. Straw: I thank my hon. Friend for his remarks. He, too, has been assiduous and tenacious in his representations on behalf of his detained constituent, Mr. Abbasi. On the issue of support, most of it, such as medical services, will be the responsibility of local medical authorities and local authorities. Our aim, not only in law but in respect of services to which those individuals are entitled, is that they should receive the same services as any other British citizen. Given the special circumstances of their detention of up to three years, I am happy to receive representations from my hon. Friend and to follow them up. On his final point, it has been difficult seeking to balance the security of the international community and this country with the rights of those individuals, but I have always believed that the approach of the British Government is the right one.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): The right hon. Gentleman knows that I have pressed him many times in the House about the illegality of what the United States has done. Assuming that none of the nine is charged before a British court, would it not be right for the British Government to press the United States to compensate them for clearly illegal action? Would he also ask the prosecution authorities in this country to reflect before they prosecute any of the nine? If any of them were convicted and sent to prison, they would not get any credit for the time that they have been held unlawfully in Guantanamo Bay.

Mr. Straw: On the issue of compensation, if we receive representations, we will consider them, just as we do for other British citizens, and follow them up. If those people were subject to trial in this country and conviction led to their detention in prison, the question of whether they could be given credit for their previous detention would not be a matter for me but for the learned judge in the case. The right hon. and learned Gentleman knows better than I the way in which that system operates.

Mr. Adrian Bailey (West Bromwich, West) (Lab/Co-op): May I welcome the Minister's statement, and acknowledge the role that the Foreign Office played in securing the release of the three detainees from Tipton last year? Subsequently, however, those three and others have made allegations of torture and ill-treatment in Guantanamo Bay. Their perception is that the Foreign Office is not listening to them, so will the Minister give an undertaking that if they wish to present their allegations to him, he will meet them and, if necessary, make representations to the US Government?

Mr. Straw: First, the Foreign Office does listen to representations. A significant part of its job is making representations on behalf of British citizens who face consular difficulties, small and large. Secondly, I am happy to see my hon. Friend and the families concerned if there is time—if not, I will ask another Minister to do so—and if appropriate.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): My constituent, Bisher Al-Rawi, was arrested on a legitimate business trip to the Gambia and has been illegally incarcerated for more than two years. In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, East (Sarah Teather), the Foreign Secretary said that he cannot make representations on behalf of people such as Bisher, who is not a British national but who has permanent residency rights in the UK. In the past, however, he and his officials have implied that the FCO is prepared to ask questions. That being the case, does he know whether the Americans plan to release people such as Bisher? If so, will he undertake to seek Bisher's release to the UK to face charges, if there is any evidence against Bisher?

Mr. Straw: I saw the hon. Gentleman and the family concerned. In that case, although the gentleman lived in the UK for many years and would be entitled to British citizenship, he voluntarily chose not to seek British citizenship and to maintain his Iraqi citizenship, although other members of his family chose to become British citizens. That situation creates a dilemma, and people must make a choice. We can represent British citizens, including those who are well qualified for British citizenship and who acquire British citizenship after birth. We cannot represent those who choose not to seek British citizenship and who make their own choices, presumably because they want to maintain the citizenship of their birth. That is the law of the land, and it is the law of the international community.

I went to the trouble of seeing the hon. Gentleman and the family and gave them a lot of time. Other Ministers and I continue to be available to meet hon. Members and families, whether the matter concerns British citizens or others, but the degree to which we can make representations in respect of individual cases is limited. We will continue to test the envelope on behalf of the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members and their constituents. However, I do not want to raise hopes in cases in which the circumstances are very difficult.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend, the Prime Minister and the Attorney-General on their work—they have given us excellent news in advance of Eid celebrations, which will take place next week. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that if the detainees were subsequently to decide to pursue an action against the United States of America, Sir David Manning and his officials in Washington would give them and their legal representatives every possible support?

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks. If actions were taken against the US Government in the US, we would consider any representations, but we cannot make such decisions in advance.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan) (SNP): Given that a Law Lord has described Guantanamo Bay as a position of utter lawlessness, will the welcome return of the four individuals under the rule of law bring about in a change in the Government's attitude to those detained without trial or charge in Belmarsh prison?

Mr. Straw: The position of those in Belmarsh is and always has been completely different from that of those detained in Guantanamo Bay, and it is ludicrous to compare either the conditions or the nature of the detention. The position of those held in Belmarsh is controversial, and it was at the heart of their lordships' decision. However, it is a fact that the individuals held in Belmarsh can leave the United Kingdom, if they can find another country to take them. That facility was never available to anyone in Guantanamo Bay, which all nine individuals would have left if the same arrangements had been in place. It is ludicrous to make any comparison whatsoever.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is actively considering the future of detentions under part 4 of the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001, and he will make a statement as soon as he can.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): A few moments ago, my right hon. Friend said that he would consider applications for compensation. Will the Government consider making ex gratia payments, provided that those individuals are not charged by the police in this country for offences under the terrorism Acts? It seems to me that those individuals will live under a cloud and will be virtually unemployable.

Mr. Straw: We consider representations in respect of applications before the US courts. In this country, however, ex gratia payments are made by the British taxpayer in respect of unlawful detention by Her Majesty's Government. Those detentions were neither made nor approved by Her Majesty's Government, so the question of ex gratia payments does not arise.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham) (Con): How can it be that there is enough evidence to detain five people for many months, but not enough evidence to bring any case against them under the terrorism Acts or other criminal legislation? Were the detentions mistaken, or does our terrorism legislation miss some important points and need to be strengthened?

Mr. Straw: There is a world of difference between the criteria adopted by the US Government to detain those individuals, most of whom were captured either near or at the face of terrorist action or training, and the evidence that British courts properly require to ensure detention following conviction, or even detention under part 4 of the 2001 Act.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): In 43 years of listening to ministerial statements, I have scarcely heard a senior Minister having to defend what is frankly indefensible. What does that say about the cavalier attitude of recent Republican Administrations in the United States to both human rights and international law? What are the Government going do about this situation: discussions about assassination squads, possibly operating across international borders, are really going on in Washington, and the presence of assassination squads has been made more likely by the appointment of Mr. Negroponte in Baghdad? Does the Foreign Secretary remember what we all said in the 1980s about Negroponte's behaviour in central America?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. With his long experience, the hon. Gentleman knows that he is trespassing outside the scope of the statement. He sought to table an urgent question, which was refused, and it is therefore unfair to attempt to raise the issue in a question to the Foreign Secretary now.

Mr. Straw: I am delighted to see my hon. Friend back in his place after his absence. He must make his own judgment about the circumstances in which I am making this statement. In the 26 years in which I have been in this House, however, I have heard some statements that compare with the one that I have just made. [Laughter.] The US Government must defend their own decisions. However, we are allies of the United States, so I shall offer an explanation of why they have come to those decisions and put the matter in context.

Yesterday, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister dealt with the issue of assassination squads in a slightly less well-publicised meeting than this—the cameras were not there and the journalists were outside. He said that we have seen no evidence whatsoever that the United States has employed assassination squads in Iraq, which we would not approve of. I happen to know—here I am defending as well as explaining—Ambassador John Negroponte, whom I regard as an international diplomat of the highest standing and integrity, and I am happy to defend that position against all comers.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood) (Con): The Foreign Secretary knows that many thousands of Commonwealth nationals are ordinarily resident in this country, where, to all intents and purposes, they enjoy the rights of British citizens, in as much as they can vote and join the armed forces, police and civil service. Is he aware of any such individuals who are still in detention in Guantanamo Bay, and if so, how many? Finally, he drew a distinction between two of the four detainees to be returned. Were some of the detainees engaged in activities that would have led to their being taken prisoner of war in a declared state of war?

Mr. Straw: On the last point, the answer is for some, yes, and for some, no. The international conventions on the treatment of prisoners of war—the Geneva conventions—were designed before we faced the threat of international terrorism and failing states, so the instruments have not quite caught up with the new reality.

On the number of people detained, let me say, as there is obviously some suspicion that British citizens might be detained elsewhere, that I am absolutely certain that none is detained in Guantanamo Bay, and I know of no citizens detained in similar circumstances elsewhere. However, I am happy to follow that up for the benefit of the House to ensure that if there is any difference between what I recollect and the truth, a written ministerial statement will quickly be made to the House.

There will be some Commonwealth citizens detained in Guantanamo Bay—including citizens of Pakistan, for example—as well as some people who have a right to indefinite residence in this country. I cannot, from this Dispatch Box, give an estimate of the numbers, but I can tell the House that one detainee who is a citizen of Australia was today released to the Australians by the United States Government.

Ross Cranston (Dudley, North) (Lab): I congratulate my right hon. Friend, who is right to put the issue in context. He mentioned the work of the Attorney-General, and I am sure that many of us at this end of the building would like to commend the work of our right hon. and learned Friend in securing this result.

Will the Government continue to insist that unless the United States applies international legal standards, in terms of detention and trial, whenever it detains Britons, the Government will continue to insist that they must ultimately be returned to this country to be dealt with?

Mr. Straw: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend. His commendation of the indefatigable work of our right hon. and learned Friend Lord Goldsmith, the Attorney-General, is entirely well placed, as he has pursued this matter tirelessly.

Our position is always clear, and it is based on the principle that where people are detained they should either be tried in accordance with internationally accepted standards of justice or released to the United Kingdom. That is a clear principle that applies to every British citizen wherever he is potentially detained.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I want to call everyone who is seeking to catch my eye, but there is other important business to come. I appeal to hon. Members to make their questions brief and to the Foreign Secretary to keep his answers brief.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): Following the Foreign Secretary's last answer, is it his case that the nine people detained in Guantanamo Bay were detained lawfully or unlawfully?

Mr. Straw: That is a matter finally to be sorted out before the United States Supreme Court.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax) (Lab): By any measure, this has been a hideous abuse of human rights and international law. In the context of the special relationship, if it has taken us three years to get our citizens, what hope does the Foreign Secretary have for those of other countries; and will he condemn what has happened in Guantanamo Bay?

Mr. Straw: My reaction is a little different—I am pleased that at long last we have managed to secure the release of the nine British detainees. We do not approve of the circumstances of their detention, but it is important that we understand why the United States Government felt it necessary to make the detentions.

Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): Given that the Foreign Office rightly promotes democracy and human rights abroad all the time, what will the Foreign Secretary now do to ensure that in future nobody in Britain or among any of our democratic allies is held without charge or without conviction?

Mr. Straw: Our record on human rights is a very good one, and we will continue to pursue, with our close allies and everyone else in the international community, the need to ensure that all signatories to the human rights conventions apply them in practice as well as in theory.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): Is it not necessary to emphasise the fact that the real hero of the hour is the Attorney-General? He faced considerable personal public criticism last year when, after the US Government had made the offer that, once tried by some sort of tribunal, the men could serve their sentences here, he had the moral courage in the face of that criticism to say that those tribunals would not give men a fair trial, and that even on those terms he would not agree to their being tried unfairly. Is not he to be congratulated on that stand? Clearly, these men must now be investigated here.

May I just say, very quickly, that this surely shows two things—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Straw: I endorse my hon. and learned Friend's commendation.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Abuse of power by Governments to the detriment of individuals must surely carry a greater consequence than simple loss of face or damage to reputation. Pursuant to the points very wisely raised by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) and the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz), would not it send an invaluable signal if the Foreign Secretary, instead of simply saying, "If people come to us about compensation we will follow it up", he said, "There is no reason in principle why they should not receive compensation and every reason why they should"?

Mr. Straw: The answer is that compensation has to be a matter that is considered within United States and international law, not our own domestic law, so there is no point in my holding out hope that could then be dashed.

On representations, most of these individuals are already in touch with us through their lawyers and Members of Parliament, and I am sure that they all will be—by the end of the day, probably.

David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): Would not it be useful for the British Government to say to the American authorities that those of us who are totally opposed to terrorism in all its forms and have the utmost sympathy and solidarity over 9/11 feel only contempt for the way in which detainees—not only the British ones—have been held in Guantanamo Bay, which is a perversion of justice in every form and plays right into the hands of the terrorist networks? Would not it be useful to be frank and forthright over this?

Mr. Straw: I think that the United States Government are very well aware of the strength of feeling across the United Kingdom and across this House. I believe that that is one of the factors that have led to the release of these men.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Bearing it in mind that there will be times in the future, as in the past, when it will be necessary for the greater safety of the greater number to detain people, should not we concentrate on the conditions of detention; and is not that the thing that we most deplore?

Mr. Straw: We have to concentrate both on the circumstances and legality of detention, but certainly on the conditions of detention where it is lawful.

Mr. Roger Godsiff (Birmingham, Sparkbrook and Small Heath) (Lab): I welcome the fact that my constituent, Moazzam Begg, is now being returned to his family after three years of incarceration and that the Foreign Secretary says that due process of law will now prevail. However, mindful of the fact that the five detainees who previously came back have not been charged, if no charges are laid against the four people who are returning, including Mr. Begg, how will he find out what the basis of his detainment was; and how will he be able to clear his name, or will he for ever be viewed as a potential international terrorist?

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend's question prompts in turn several questions that I cannot answer at the moment. Our process is, by definition, different from that of the United States: that is one of the reasons why we objected to the circumstances of the detentions. All I can say, as I have said repeatedly to the House and to my hon. Friend—I am grateful to him for his thanks—is that we will actively consider any representations that are made to us.

Northern Ireland

1.48 pm

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Paul Murphy): With permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to make a statement on Northern Ireland.

As the House will be aware, a major robbery took place at the Northern bank in Belfast just before Christmas. At the end of last week, the Chief Constable of Northern Ireland indicated that in his professional opinion responsibility for the robbery should be attributed to the Provisional IRA. He also made the point that quite apart from the massive scale of the robbery—more than £26 million—it was in no sense a victimless crime. Two families were kidnapped and threatened with death if they did not co-operate with the criminals. In the case of one of the families, the gang, masquerading as police officers, tricked their way into the house by claiming that a family member had been killed in a car accident. Once inside, they donned masks, produced guns and threatened the family. One of the hostages was later taken to an isolated forest where her car was burned and she was abandoned in the snow. She was forced to struggle in severe weather and in darkness across country to seek assistance in a highly distressed state and suffering from hypothermia. I want to reiterate my utter condemnation of those who planned and carried out that appalling crime.

The Chief Constable's public remarks were necessarily constrained by the ongoing investigation. He has briefed me fully on the background which led him to make the statement that he made. I have no doubt that the Chief Constable's opinion is well founded. He did not rush to judgment. The Police Service of Northern Ireland thought initially that five groups could have been responsible for the robbery. Only when a great deal of evidence had been sifted did the Chief Constable make his statement. He is a man of the highest calibre and integrity, leading a professional team of officers acting entirely independently and objectively in pursuit of the criminals concerned. The Irish Government have also made their views on that aspect of the matter entirely clear. There will of course be a further dispassionate assessment of the position when the Independent Monitoring Commission makes its next report. I shall discuss with the Irish Government the time scale in which that report should be made.

On the immediate follow-up to the robbery, I welcome the announcement by the Northern bank of its intention to withdraw from circulation its current bank notes and replace them with notes of a different design and colour. That decision will reduce materially the value of the robbery to the perpetrators and we will discuss with the bank how best to publicise the detailed arrangements.

Since the Chief Constable's statement, there has been much comment about the impact of the developments on the political process in Northern Ireland. I cannot hide my own judgment that it is deeply damaging.

On 9 December, I came to the House to report on the proposals by the British and Irish Governments for a comprehensive agreement, which had been published the previous day. They represented a series of statements that would have been made if there had been an overall agreement at that stage. They included a statement to the effect that paramilitary activity by the Provisional IRA would cease immediately and definitively. There was also a statement, to which the Democratic Unionist party was committed, that after a period during which the good faith of the Provisional IRA's commitments had been demonstrated, an inclusive power-sharing Executive would be re-established in March this year. I need hardly remind hon. Members that that would have been nearly two and a half years after the devolved institutions in Northern Ireland were suspended.

In the event, an outstanding issue, in relation to the transparency of the decommissioning process, could not be resolved. However, as I said to the House in December, we had made significant and substantial progress, not least in rebuilding the trust and confidence that is the essential requirement of a stable, inclusive, cross-community, devolved Administration in Northern Ireland.

Today, I deeply regret that that progress has been put in jeopardy. I cannot forecast with certainty when it will prove possible to re-establish an inclusive power-sharing Executive, which the Government continue to believe provides the best long-term guarantee of peace and stability. We shall not abandon our commitment to that ultimate goal.

We are in no doubt, however, that it can be achieved only if the Provisional IRA gives up not only terrorism but all the other forms of criminality in which it is implicated. Unionists in Northern Ireland have made clear that if those tests are met, they will work with Sinn Fein in a power-sharing Executive. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has said repeatedly, it is entirely reasonable for Unionists to withhold their co-operation until those tests are met. We have consistently made it clear that, if a political settlement is to be achieved, any illegal activity has to come to an end. The documents published before Christmas were unambiguous on that point.

Let me reiterate to the House that the Government will not promote a political settlement in which a party inextricably linked to an organisation that has carried out major criminal acts can assume responsibilities again in a devolved Administration. Nor could it take on the further responsibilities implied by the devolution of justice and policing while criminal activity of the kind we have just seen, and the capacity to plan and undertake such activity, continues to exist. It would be ludicrous for anyone to suggest that the people of Northern Ireland, from whatever background, voted for a political settlement on that basis in the referendum in 1998.

Against that background, it is clear to me that decisions and responses on that are now needed from Sinn Fein and the Provisional IRA. The comments from the Irish Government in recent days indicate that they share that view.

Without the required responses from Sinn Fein and the Provisional IRA, I cannot see how we can reinvigorate the political talks that must precede a comprehensive settlement. Without those responses, the Governments and, indeed, the House, will need to consider how best in the changed circumstances to bring pressure to bear on the republican movement to complete the transition to exclusively peaceful and democratic means, including any penalties that might be applied to Sinn Fein.

[Mr. Paul Murphy]

I spoke to the Irish Foreign Minister on Friday and will meet him when he returns from a visit to the tsunami-stricken areas of Asia. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will meet the Taoiseach towards the end of the month. In the meantime, I expect to talk to the Northern Ireland parties over the next two weeks with a view to hearing first hand their assessments of the current position and their views on several difficult questions that now face us, including, for example, the appropriateness of continuing to pay the salaries and allowances of the individuals elected to the Northern Ireland Assembly in November 2003 and our proposed way forward on the regulation of donations to political parties in Northern Ireland.

I cannot disguise my deep disappointment at what has happened, but my disappointment is as nothing compared with that of the people of Northern Ireland. They deserve better, given the progress in so many areas of their lives in recent years. The Government, continuing to work in close partnership with the Irish Government, will do everything they can to ensure that that progress is not lost and that we can continue to move forward as soon as possible to a comprehensive political settlement. In the meantime, my colleagues and I will continue to apply ourselves to governing Northern Ireland as effectively as possible in the absence of a devolved Administration.

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury) (Con): First, I thank the Secretary of State for his statement and his customary courtesy in letting me see an advance copy.

The right hon. Gentleman rightly drew attention to the viciousness of the crime. I want to start by expressing our sympathy for the families who were the victims of those brutal acts.

The robbery and the Chief Constable's words last week have grave implications for the entire political process in Northern Ireland. The Prime Minister and the Secretary of State have frequently said—the Secretary of State did so again this afternoon—that Sinn Fein and the IRA are inextricably linked. The Independent Monitoring Commission's conclusions supported that assessment. In those circumstances, surely no Unionist or, for that matter, nationalist politician should be asked to share power with a party that remains inextricably linked to a violent criminal gang.

We cannot move towards the devolution of powers over policing and criminal justice until we can be confident that every party with Ministers in a devolved Executive is committed to supporting the police and the rule of law rather than to undermining them.

Will the Secretary of State today accept something that he has avoided accepting up to now, namely, that the same principles should now apply in Belfast and in Dublin, and that Sinn Fein cannot take part in a coalition or power-sharing Administration until it has permanently ended its connections to paramilitary bodies and to organised crime? I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that it would be in everyone's interests if the republican movement now rapidly completed its transition from terrorism to exclusively peaceful and democratic politics. The sad truth, however, is that the events of recent days have shown that we seem to be a long way from achieving that objective. What, therefore, do the Government plan to do now?

As far back as 7 September last year, the Prime Minister said that if the Leeds Castle talks failed to achieve a comprehensive settlement,

"then I think we've got to look for another way forward."

What is that other way forward that the Prime Minister and the Government envisaged? Will the Government now explore the possibility of establishing a power-sharing Executive who exclude Sinn Fein? Or, if that is unattainable, will the Minister consider ways of making direct-rule Ministers more accountable to the people of Northern Ireland?

The Secretary of State mentioned sanctions against Sinn Fein, and I would like to ask him three specific questions on that issue. First, in the light of the intelligence to which he and the police now have access, will he consider recalling individual prisoners who have been released early on licence under the Government's early-release scheme? Secondly, given the widespread belief that the profits of crime are helping to fund political parties linked to paramilitary forces, will he look again at some of the exemptions that parties in Northern Ireland have from the normal rules on party funding, especially those relating to foreign donations and to publishing accounts? I note that he said that he would be discussing this matter with the Irish Foreign Minister soon. In the light of those discussions, will the Secretary of State undertake to drop, or at least postpone, proceedings on the statutory instrument to extend the current exemptions, which the Government tabled shortly before Christmas? Thirdly, will the Government now introduce a motion to suspend the privileges and parliamentary allowances that have been given to Sinn Fein Members of this House despite their refusal to take their seats and represent their constituents properly? It is intolerable for taxpayers' money to be doled out in this way to a party that remains inextricably linked to violent organised crime.

Finally, will the right hon. Gentleman give the House an unequivocal assurance that the police, customs and every other law enforcement agency in Northern Ireland will be unrelenting in pursing not only the people responsible for this appalling robbery but all members of the mafia gangs, republican or loyalist, that prey on the people of Northern Ireland; and that the agencies of law and order will take that action regardless of any political difficulties that it might cause in any quarter?

Mr. Murphy: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his comments on the process. I agree with him that the impact of these events is deeply worrying and serious. I shall try to answer his individual questions one by one. He asked whether the principles that apply to a Government in Dublin should apply to a power-sharing Executive; I am sure that that is the case. I have already said that the Government will not tolerate any form of criminality associated with a group that is associated with a political party in Northern Ireland. Perhaps more significantly, however, the political parties in Northern Ireland take a very strong view on this issue.

In regard to whether we could form a power-sharing Executive without Sinn Fein, the Government's view—the view expressed in the Good Friday agreement—has always been that the people of Northern Ireland and, indeed, the people of Ireland voted for an inclusive power-sharing Executive. The ultimate answer is to see the end of criminality on the island of Ireland, and in Northern Ireland in particular, whether that criminality comes from republican or loyalist sources. The Government have not ruled anything out or in, but a lot will depend on the discussions that I have over the next couple of weeks with the political parties to discover their views on the issue. At the end of the day, two things matter: one is that there be consensus among the political parties in Northern Ireland as to what they want; the other is that, whatever happens, we cannot establish an Executive in Northern Ireland without either Unionist or nationalist representation. To that end, the parties could suggest other alternatives to us for the short term, over the coming months. They could include ways in which direct rule Ministers could be made more accountable; I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman on that point.

On recalling licensed prisoners who might be connected to the bank robbery, I am monitoring all the circumstances surrounding the robbery very carefully and I can confirm that I shall not hesitate to use the powers available to me to suspend the licence of any ex-prisoner if I am satisfied that he or she has broken, or is likely to break, any of his or her licence conditions. I am happy to give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that he requested on that matter.

The Government intend to move away from the current exemptions for the Northern Ireland political parties from the normal rules on publishing their accounts and receiving foreign donations. We shall be holding discussions with the Northern Ireland parties, the Irish Government and the Electoral Commission on these issues, and we shall seek an extension of the current exemptions to allow time for that consultation. I know that the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members will be discussing this matter with me in more detail in the weeks ahead.

The hon. Gentleman also raised the question of this House suspending the privileges and parliamentary allowances of Sinn Fein Members. First, I have already said in my statement that the Government will consider a range of possibilities in the coming days, and I think the House would agree that we need to take some time to consider the most effective way of bringing pressure to bear on the republican movement. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] Not least because we need to discuss a number of the issues relating to sanctions and penalties with the Irish Government—[Interruption.] Perhaps the House will allow me to finish. Secondly, I understand that the House has its own rules regarding whether we should allow such actions to happen, and the Government will have to reflect on the significance of that. Thirdly, the Independent Monitoring Commission also has a role in determining what sanctions and penalties, if any, should be introduced with regard to Sinn Fein. We do not want to take a decision on these issues today, because we need to look at the whole picture. I have not ruled anything out on these issues.

The hon. Gentleman referred to organised crime in Northern Ireland, be it from a loyalist, republican or any other source. He can rest assured that the Organised Crime Task Force and all the other agencies in Northern Ireland will bend their attentions to ensuring that we deal with these issues with the utmost urgency, not least because if this criminality is allowed to continue—not just the criminality that we have seen over the last few weeks, although the problem was dramatically illustrated by this robbery—it will corrupt politics and society. We cannot allow that to happen in Northern Ireland, not least because the people there voted against that.

Mr. John Hume (Foyle) (SDLP): Given that the allegations about this appalling crime represent a serious threat not only to our peace process but to the full implementation of the Good Friday agreement, and given that the leadership of Sinn Fein has utterly denied its involvement in it—I contacted members of the leadership directly on the telephone and they told me that they had played no role of any description in it—does the Secretary of State agree that, because of the terrible consequences of this terrible crime, it is necessary to publish the evidence behind the allegations?

Mr. Murphy: I agree with my hon. Friend that this is a threat to the process, as I am sure all hon. Members do. The Chief Constable made it clear in his statement last week that he came to his conclusion professionally and that his professional judgment rested on examining the evidence, whether that was from intelligence or the criminal investigation. He said that all lines of his and his senior officers' inquiry led him to his conclusion.

My hon. Friend will understand that between 45 and 47 police officers are working on the inquiry. A hundred interviews have been held with 100 more to be held in the near future. It would be wrong of the Chief Constable or the police to reveal all that evidence during the course of an investigation because, as my hon. Friend and others will know, that would seriously jeopardise the chances of catching and convicting the culprits—that is the danger. However, I have read a great deal of the evidence that the Chief Constable has seen and I have no doubt that what he said was right.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I am sure that we all agree that the raid was a terrifying ordeal for the civilians caught up in it. No doubt they feared for their lives, and it is a relief to us all that they escaped unharmed.

We all continue to have high respect for Hugh Orde, but I am also surprised by his and the Government's willingness to blame the IRA for the robbery without revealing the evidence. Will the Secretary of State confirm that he believes that anyone who is prosecuted for the crime will turn out to be associated directly or indirectly with the IRA? If he cannot give us that assurance today, he cannot claim that the IRA was necessarily behind it.

The Secretary of State asks us to take it on trust—without sharing evidence—that the IRA was behind the crime, but if he wants to use the defence that he should not share that evidence while the investigation is continuing, perhaps it was not wise to share a conclusion before the investigation had ended. Is there not a danger that that might prejudice the outcome of a court case, because we would be prosecuting not an organisation but individuals?

[Lembit Öpik]

We are meant to be normalising Northern Ireland, so is the Secretary of State aware that his fellow Minister, the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the hon. Member for Dudley, South (Mr. Pearson), refused this morning to say that the Government would necessarily specify an organisation on the basis of criminal activity? Why are the Government unwilling to specify sanctions against paramilitary organisations involved in crime, even if they are not willing to specify the organisations themselves? If it turns out that a paramilitary organisation is behind this substantial criminal offence, it is rather surprising that the Government shy away from giving an assurance that they would consider specifying it on the basis of that.

It will be difficult to normalise Northern Ireland if paramilitary organisations do not fear the sanction of being specified on the basis of serious criminal activity. That stems from the fact that we have never had a clear definition of "ceasefire". Is it not time to use paragraph 13 of the joint declaration as a clear definition of ceasefire, and to add to it the idea that sanctions will extend to criminality as well as terrorism? Is it not the case that until we have a clear and explicit statement of the sanctions that paramilitary organisations can expect when perpetrating organised crime, we are unlikely to resolve the problems of crime or, indeed, terror?

Mr. Murphy: I am surprised by the hon. Gentleman's question about the Chief Constable and the evidence, because I thought that I had made it clear that it is difficult for him to produce detailed evidence while an investigation is ongoing. However, the hon. Gentleman knows as well as I do, because he has been involved in Northern Ireland politics for a long time, that it is by no means unusual for the Chief Constable to attribute blame across the political spectrum in Northern Ireland for paramilitary crime. Indeed, the problem that Hugh Orde faced over the past couple of weeks was that he was not attributing quickly enough. However, he wanted to ensure that he was satisfied, in his highly professional opinion, of what was the case. If the detail were to emerge, it could have a detrimental effect on future court proceedings, which is why the situation has arisen.

I understand the hon. Gentleman's reference to specification, but as he knows, specification refers specifically to whether groups are on ceasefire. We should remember that the IRA is illegal and proscribed by law and the House, as are other organisations. Although we are not ruling out whether we specify or despecify, we must look at the whole picture before doing that.

The hon. Gentleman referred to sanctions—I have no doubt that this issue will raise its head later—but under normal circumstances, if the Assembly was up and running, they would be a matter for consideration by the Independent Monitoring Commission. As he knows, such sanctions would refer to various penalties affecting Assembly Members and parties when the Assembly is in session. When we considered the position some months ago, the IMC itself came up with sanctions, and it is quite possible that it may recommend them when it examines the matter. The Government, too, when talking to the Irish Government about issues that affect them, will consider such matters. On normalisation, however, the people of Northern Ireland want an end to such illegality and criminality across the board so that they can live in a decent society.

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall) (Lab): Does the Secretary of State agree that what he has said today will give a lot of heart to IRA-Sinn Fein because democratic politicians and parties from both sides of the community in Northern Ireland are being punished? Surely he should be saying that we will not be held to ransom by IRA-Sinn Fein and that we will go ahead and set up instantly a devolved Northern Ireland Assembly with nationalist and Unionist parties that have no links to terrorism.

Mr. Murphy: I could not agree less with my hon. Friend. I find it extremely unusual for her to suggest that the words in my statement could give comfort to the IRA—perhaps she will reflect on that.

I indicated in response to a previous question that I have neither ruled in nor out the possibility of persuading democratic parties in Northern Ireland to set up a voluntary coalition excluding Sinn Fein. However, the reality is that such an arrangement could be made only if the political parties in Northern Ireland that would form part of that coalition agreed to it. The coalition would have to be made up of Unionists and nationalists. It is thus incumbent on the Government, as the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) said, to consider other means of increasing accountability for direct rule Ministers.

I do not think that anyone would disagree that the most important matter before us today is how to stop criminality in Northern Ireland. If that stopped, and we were persuaded that it had stopped, we could of course enter into an inclusive Executive. If that does not happen, it does not happen, but anyone who suggests that we should not work towards that and stop criminality would not be thanked by people in Northern Ireland. If that does not work, we will have to find other arrangements—I have not ruled those out—but the House should reflect on the fact that it is incumbent on me to talk to political parties in Northern Ireland to get their views on where we might go, which I intend to do. People in Northern Ireland would not want us to take precipitate decisions today without doing that.

Rev. Ian Paisley (North Antrim) (DUP): This is a serious day for Northern Ireland. It is a day when the Government must cease to deal with politics, and deal with crime and paramilitaries. Until crime and paramilitaries are dealt with, we cannot have a proper democracy in Northern Ireland. As the Secretary of State well knows, the Democratic Unionist party took part in the talks process in good faith, but all the time we were in those talks, we were chided by his Government that we should have more faith and trust. We were sniped at by official Unionists, whose deputy leader says today that we were taken for a ride. The Democratic Unionist party was not taken for a ride. We took our stand boldly and strongly for what we believed. We did not change anything to which we said that we were dedicated, and we kept fully to our mandate from the people.

Then the Democratic Unionist party found out that the word of the IRA was not to be trusted. While we were sitting there, and while the Government were telling us about the goodness and character of the IRA, it was planning to rob the Northern Bank, to give it an unprecedented advantage in an election. With millions in its possession, it could outdo every other political party.

I am rather surprised at the hon. Member for Foyle (Mr. Hume) and the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik), who leads for the Lib Dems, talking about bringing evidence before us, as even the Taoiseach has said that the evidence that his police have is the same as what the police of Northern Ireland have. Will the hon. Member for Foyle repudiate the Taoiseach of the south of Ireland and say that he is talking nonsense, too?

Mr. Hume: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I did not say that anyone was talking nonsense. I said that, in the public interest, the evidence should be fully published. Who objects to evidence?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. That is not a matter of order for the Chair. The hon. Gentleman wishes to continue the debate, and there will be other opportunities for that. May I say to the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley) that this is not the occasion for a statement on his part? He should be putting questions on behalf of himself and his party to the Secretary of State. I have allowed some latitude to him because of his position in this matter, but he really must ask questions and not continue with an extended statement.

Rev. Ian Paisley: It seems strange, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as I am the leader of the largest party in Northern Ireland, that we cannot do what we are sent to do. I will make no further comment on that, because I know that your powers are greater than mine at present.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is not trying to tempt me to exemplify the powers of the Chair. I have recognised his position as the leader of the largest party, but it is still not in order for him to make an extended statement at this time. There will be other occasions for that. He should be putting questions to the Secretary of State.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I will do that now, but I had to answer some things that were said previously.

First, the Secretary of State said in his statement that "decisions and responses" are now needed from Sinn Fein-IRA. Will he please tell us what he means by that? There was not one word about anger. The people of Northern Ireland are more than disappointed—they are very angry about what has happened. Furthermore, what are the penalties to which he referred? The only penalties about which I have heard today are against the democrats of Northern Ireland, whether nationalist or Unionist. The hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) was right to make that point. We are being punished—because of a bank robbery, all democracy in Northern Ireland is to be brought to an end. I want to press the Secretary of State to tell us what those penalties are.

On the future of the Assembly, surely, as we have suggested to the Secretary of State, elected representatives could be organised to keep their eye on direct rule Ministers and to call them to account, as they did in the Assembly. That is a job of work that could be done.

Mr. Murphy: On those last points, we could certainly consider the sort of arrangement about which the hon. Gentleman talked. His party put forward various proposals with regard to a committee structure or corporate body of the Assembly. The Social Democratic and Labour party put forward suggestions with regard to a similar body, but with commissioners. There are ways in which to examine how best to deal with the accountability of me and other Ministers in the House who have responsibility for Northern Ireland.

On penalties and sanctions, the hon. Gentleman also knows that, when an incident occurred last year, we considered a host of different penalties and sanctions, ranging from allowances to other matters. Those will be considered by the Government and the Irish Government together, but the House will also have an opportunity to consider such matters, if it so wishes.

With regard to decisions and responses, those relate entirely to the first point that the hon. Gentleman rightly made—we cannot, to use his words, mix crime and a proper democracy. I hope that I made it clear throughout my statement that the Government will not tolerate that linkage, and that it is not right for that to happen. If he wants a voluntary coalition, however, I repeat that we can only have that if people volunteer to go into it, and it must be across the board. Therefore, there must be other ways. The point is also to end criminality so that we have a wholesome and uncorrupted politics in Northern Ireland.

The hon. Gentleman rightly talks about anger in Northern Ireland about the issue, but the anger is also because of the impact on the process, given all the work done by his party over the months leading up to Christmas, and the work done by all the parties involved in the peace process in Northern Ireland over the last several years. I assure him that no one in the House was more disappointed than me. Off and on, for 10 years, I have also been involved in the process, and the last thing that I wanted was to come to this House and deliver the statement that I have had to give today. I wanted to ensure that we saw progress from Christmas onwards, with an Executive and an Assembly up and running in the next six months, which the people of Northern Ireland wanted. Now we must put our heads together and work out where we go in the months ahead.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh) (SDLP): First, I want to pay tribute to members of both Governments who have worked so assiduously on this mater. That will not prevent me from pointing out that there is a fault line in the negotiation process, which is exemplified by the way in which, for more than seven years, every attempt was made to buy the IRA army council into the political process at the expense of other factors—not just buying in republicans but others. There is a fault line in any political process when people must be bought into such a process in a place like Northern Ireland. It is an even worse fault line when, added to that, we have secret deals that amount to political patronage, and secret arrangements with paramilitary groups, and when the law itself can be bartered for political reasons, as was attempted in the Republic of Ireland.

[Mr. Seamus Mallon]

May I ask the Secretary of State one thing? This bartering of the Good Friday agreement has sucked dry the idealism and hope that exists within the community. That idealism, vision and hope is disappearing. As the Secretary of State is a man for whom I have enormous respect, may I ask him to get rid of the fault line in the negotiating process and reinvent integrity, decency and honesty in it, so that once again I, as one who has been involved for many years, can say with pride that I am part of the political process rather than seeing it becoming more and more of a moral quagmire?

Mr. Murphy: Of course, my hon. Friend has been part of that process for many years. Its success, in the years in which we have had success, is largely due to him and others like him. He makes a point about the negotiation process, and perhaps it is time to take on a different type of negotiation. That will result largely from my discussions in the weeks ahead with political parties.

My hon. Friend rightly mentioned the Good Friday agreement, which of course lies at the heart of any negotiations that we have. What struck me as particularly awful about the events of the last few weeks was that they were so much against the principles of that agreement. People constantly talk of acceding to, agreeing to, accepting and implementing the agreement, but nothing could be worse than an act of major criminality—which is how we have described it today—that went against what people voted for when they voted for the agreement in 1998.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If there is not brevity in both questions and answers, I shall not be able to call every Member who is seeking to catch my eye.

David Burnside (South Antrim) (UUP): I wish the Secretary of State and his ministerial team a happy and prosperous new year. We should be optimistic about the future, and not be depressed about recent events. The statement, however, was depressing. We all like the Secretary of State and get on reasonably well with his ministerial team, but the statement was vacuous and empty, with no reference to sanctions or threat. Sinn Fein-IRA are laughing at the British Government again. The Secretary of State knows the facts from his security information. He knows about Bobby Storey, head of intelligence, reporting to the army council. He knows about Adams, McGuinness, Keenan, "Slab" Murphy—top of the criminal rich list, with £32 million—Gillen and the rest. He knows who carried out the Northern bank robbery. It was the Provisional IRA. It was Bobby Storey—Bobby Storey of Stormontgate, Bobby Storey of crime, Bobby Storey of Castlereagh—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am not going to listen to a long speech. I appeal to the House for short questions. If the hon. Gentleman does not have a short question, he may as well remain seated.

David Burnside: I think I have made my point clear, Mr. Deputy Speaker: everyone knows who was responsible.

What is the Secretary of State going to do? What sanctions are there? What strengthened will is going to emanate from the House with regard to facilities in the House, sanctions and fines? Will there be a fine of a couple of thousand pounds, when they have £26.5 million in the bank?

Mr. Murphy: I understand the hon. Gentleman's frustration. We are all frustrated by what has happened—but I always try to think about what the people of Northern Ireland would like to happen. Important as withdrawing facilities from the House of Commons might be, and important as withdrawing allowances from parties that can afford it might be from the hon. Gentleman's point of view—whatever the penalties might be—the most important thing for us to do in Northern Ireland is to stop the criminality and bring about a political process that can proceed without it. That matters more than anything else in Northern Ireland. I am not dismissing the penalties and all the rest of it. We will consider that with our Irish Government partners during the next week or two. But the most important thing for the people of Northern Ireland is to stop the brutality, savagery and criminality that I described in my statement.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): The Government have been looking at the whole picture in Northern Ireland for seven years, since the Belfast agreement. To an extent I have been one of those who have gone along with that approach, suggesting that we should nudge a bit further each time—but is there not a point at which the picture needs to be completed? We have now seen what has been involved, as confirmed by the Secretary of State. Surely we are now reaching that point. Must we wait for a "next time" before decisions are made and action taken against Sinn Fein and the Provisional IRA?

Mr. Murphy: I repeat what I said to my hon. Friend the Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon). The whole picture is important, because no one, but no one, wants to return to 30 or 40 years of troubles in Northern Ireland. I do not think that that will happen: I think we have come too far for it to happen.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Newry and Armagh that we may have reached a stage at which we must deal with different negotiating arrangements, but if that happens it must be based on discussion with all the political parties in Northern Ireland, particularly those represented here who have spoken today. Although we may have to act in that way, we must not give up the hope that we can have a Northern Ireland that is free of criminality and has wholesome politics. We will continue in that hope. I do agree with my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) that the impact of this event has been so enormous that we need to rethink many things.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): It has indeed been nearly seven years since the Belfast agreement. At our last Northern Ireland Question Time, I asked the Secretary of State when he would stop believing Sinn Fein lies. That they are lies is now proven beyond any doubt, so will he now cease speaking to the people who are lying, and stop believing them until—if ever—they prove their good faith beyond peradventure? I respect the Secretary of State, but I beg him to give us no more sorrowful words and no hand-wringing, and please to take action against those terrorist crooks. Will he start by suspending them from the House of Commons, and taking away the public money that is subsidising terrorism and criminality in part of the United Kingdom? The rule of law should apply throughout the United Kingdom. The Secretary of State has it in his power to take action. Will he do so now?

Mr. Murphy: I think that the idea of proof beyond peradventure is right, but I also think that the passion should be directed towards stopping the criminality and the things that I described in the earlier part of my statement. The Organised Crime Task Force, other agencies in Northern Ireland—the police, Customs or others—and indeed all of us must concentrate on stopping that criminality and ensuring that it does not profit people either politically or financially. We may well have to consider different sanctions and penalties, but I emphasise that ultimately the most important thing for those who live in Northern Ireland is stopping the kind of action that has necessitated my coming here today.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down) (SDLP): Will the Secretary of State, and indeed all Members, send a message of hope for the well-being of the families who were involved, or coerced, in this terrible, savage and brutal crime? My constituents the McMullen family, who are both neighbours and friends, were savagely treated.

The Secretary of State often says, as he did last Friday, that there can be no place for terrorist or criminal activity. Let me say bluntly that we have heard that mantra in different forms for a number of years. What about the intelligence to which the Secretary of State has been privy over those years, and what has been reiterated by me in the House month after month? Political Sinn Fein is mainly the Provisional IRA in lounge suits, and every day in my community it is imposing its will and diktat. When will the Government get real, and stop Sinn Fein's criminal and paramilitary activities being made to seem credible and proper?

Mr. Murphy: My hon. Friend has a long history of opposing criminality and similar activity in the part of Northern Ireland that he represents, and exposing it in the House of Commons. I do not disagree with a word that he has said, but the document that I have here, agreed before Christmas—"Proposals by the British and Irish Governments for a Comprehensive Agreement"—addresses the issue of criminality.

No one has suggested—certainly I have not, during my time as Secretary of State—that there has not been criminality on the part of paramilitary organisations linked to political parties, including the IRA. That has been said time and again. What we are dealing with today is this: the enormity of the robbery, and the savagery that accompanied it, were such that people can take no more. That is why the House has taken the view it has taken. But my hon. Friend and I know, because we were involved in negotiations for many years, that our aim must be to achieve a peaceful democratic Northern Ireland. His party worked very hard for that, and for a non-violent future for the people whom he and his colleagues represent.

Mr. Peter Robinson (Belfast, East) (DUP): The Secretary of State has already indicated his respect for the views of the people of Northern Ireland. How does he respond to the prevailing view in Northern Ireland that on this issue, there are two certainties? The first is that the Provisional IRA will continue with its terrorism and criminality; the second is that after a very short time passes, the Secretary of State's tough talk will dissolve and the Government will be back to holding their hands again. How is it that in paragraphs 7, 8 and 9 of the Secretary of State's statement, the clearest of indications is given to Provisional Sinn Fein that he will not allow the process to move on without it? Why is democracy in Northern Ireland to be held back because of gunmen and gangsters? Surely the time has come to make it very clear that politics moves on, and moves on without it.

Mr. Murphy: It may have to be that. Over past months, the hon. Gentleman and his party colleagues have worked hard to establish an agreement between the two Governments and the other parties on the way forward, and I know that, like everybody else, he is deeply disappointed that that has not occurred. I also know that he and other members of his party rightly want restoration of the institutions in Northern Ireland as quickly as possible. I share that view completely, and I made it clear in my statement that there can be no place in the government of Northern Ireland for a party linked to people who carry out the sort of robberies that I described today. The hon. Gentleman knows, however, that in order to get any substitute for what was agreed before Christmas, it is important for us to talk to the political parties that have raised issues here today about the way ahead. I simply say to him that we are not ruling anything in or anything out until we have had those discussions, which it is important to have. He speaks robustly and with great strength, but he knows that in order to deal with these issues, we have to sit down and discuss them—as I will do with him in an hour's time.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have other important business to protect, so we must move on.

Flooding (North-West)

2.42 pm

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): With permission, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to make a statement on the serious flooding that affected northern England, especially Carlisle, at the weekend. I also want to refer to the loss of drinking water supplies in Hexham, Northumberland.

The flooding was caused by a major storm that produced truly exceptional amounts of rain: some 9 in fell in a 36-hour period on already saturated land. This rainfall quickly reached the rivers Eden, in Cumbria, and Tyne, in Northumberland. They were unable to cope with such torrential loads, and flood banks were overtopped. I have to report that very sadly, three lives were lost in the Carlisle area. The coroner reported that two deaths were caused by drowning, and one by trauma when a wall collapsed in high winds. Inquests have been opened and adjourned.

Nearly 3,000 properties have been flooded in Carlisle. Elsewhere in northern England, nearly 100 properties were flooded along the River Tyne. The Carlisle major incident plan was activated and many residents were evacuated. Some stayed with family and friends; others have been housed in reception centres. There are continuing problems with the electricity supply and telephone connections to many houses. I saw for myself on Sunday just how serious the flooding was in Carlisle, and I know from this and previous experience how utterly devastating flooding can be for those affected. The thoughts of the Government—and, I am sure, those of the whole House—are with everyone affected, and especially with those who have lost loved ones.

I pay tribute to all those involved in the emergency response over the weekend—including the fire, ambulance and police services, the local authority, the Environment Agency, the coastguard, mountain rescue, and the military—who assisted greatly in rescuing those trapped by the flooding. I also want to thank the voluntary organisations that have given so much help in caring for those affected.

As a Government, we shall seek to ensure that all that can be done is being done to return the community to normal as quickly as possible. Emergency financial assistance is available to local authorities, under the Bellwin scheme, to help with non-insurable clear-up costs following a disaster or emergency in their area. Such an authority has one month from the end of an incident to notify the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister that it intends to apply for activation of the Bellwin scheme. If it is approved, the Department will usually reimburse 85 per cent. of eligible costs above a threshold related to the authority's annual budget.

I am also pleased to note that the Association of British Insurers has encouraged its members to play their part in the recovery by ensuring that they have sufficient capacity to deal with the exceptional volume of claims from Carlisle and elsewhere, especially given that further exceptional storms are expected imminently in northern Britain. As with all major flooding events, we will work with the Environment Agency in considering the lessons learned. We will do this once the agency has dealt with the immediate aftermath of the flooding, which is clearly its first priority, and there has been an opportunity to analyse the event and the response. However, preliminary indications are that this was the most serious flood in Cumbria since 1822. Although flood defences on the River Eden remained intact, they were overtopped by the extreme water flows. There were breaches of defences at Corbridge, on the River Tyne, but the event was so severe that those defences were overtopped anyway.

I should also inform the House that proposals are being developed for a new Environment Agency flood defence scheme to provide added protection for Carlisle. A number of options are being considered, and this analysis will now take account of the last weekend's flooding. However, I emphasise that whatever flood defences we provide—the Government have committed record levels of investment: almost £480 million in this financial year and £570 million for 2005–06—we cannot provide absolute protection in all areas against all conceivable flooding events. There is always the risk that truly exceptional storms and rainfall such as occurred at the weekend will strike somewhere.

I should further inform the House that the mains drinking water supply has been lost to properties in Hexham, Northumberland. Two water mains that pass under the River Tyne in the town were severely damaged by a fallen tree passing in the flooded river. The water company was able to maintain the supply to all but 1,100 properties until yesterday, but now, 10,000 are without mains supply. Northumbrian Water is providing emergency supplies of water in static tanks and bottles. The mains are about 1.5 m below the river bed and cannot be immediately accessed for repair. However, as an interim measure to restore the mains supply, the company is laying temporary overland pipework, which it expects to complete tonight. Some customers' supplies should be restored tomorrow, and others' throughout this week.

Soon, responsibility for the short-term and longer-term recovery effort will pass to the local authorities in Cumbria, and I am sure that elected members and officials will rise to the challenge. The Government office for the north-west and the Northwest Development Agency are already working with the local authorities to support them in that process.

What the Government can, and will, do is to ensure that we provide the investment for the Environment Agency and for others involved in flood defence to undertake works where they are most needed. We have always made it clear that nobody can guarantee that there will not be extreme weather events or flooding, but we can continually reduce risk—as we are doing—by investing in defences and warning systems, and by ensuring that there are efficient and effective emergency arrangements to cope with such extreme events. I repeat that commitment to the House.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): I begin by expressing my deepest sympathy, and that of the Opposition, to the families of those who lost their lives in the floods and gales that hit the north-west last weekend, and to the thousands of people who have suffered severe hardship, inconvenience and anxiety, along with damage to their property. I join the Minister in paying a warm tribute to the emergency services—they responded in very difficult conditions in order to rescue people trapped by the flooding—to the work of the many volunteers who supported them, and to the role played by Cumbria county council and other authorities.

I welcome the application of the Bellwin formula and the statement from the Association of British Insurers. The priority is, of course, to provide help for the victims of the floods and get them back home as soon as possible, and to restore essential services—including electricity and water supplies—very swiftly. On learning lessons from what has happened, and given in particular the loss of life, will the Minister review the arrangements for warning those likely to be affected about the onset of extreme weather that might threaten their homes? Indeed, I understand that such warnings might be needed again in that region in the near future.

Once the immediate consequences of the floods have been redressed, questions arise about what other steps the Government can reasonably take. Inevitably, sudden and severe rainfall is likely to cause floods and I accept the Minister's point that no system of flood defences can guarantee total protection against adverse consequences. It is, however, a characteristic of climate change that sudden and severe rainfall will occur more frequently in future than it has in the past. It may be more than a century since this part of England suffered such severe floods, but we cannot assume that another century will pass before it happens again.

The Government have admitted that more than a million homes around the country are at risk of being flooded, so is the Minister satisfied that the planning process takes enough account of flood risks? Have not the risks been worsened by too much development taking place in areas that are in danger of being flooded and in places where the construction of buildings will increase the risk of existing buildings being flooded? Regardless of whether that was a factor in the latest incident, does the Minister agree that one way to reduce the risk of loss of life and damage to property resulting from flooding would be to require local authorities to adopt a more precautionary approach in respect of flood risk when giving planning consent for new development?

Turning to the broader issue of climate change, does the Minister accept that the severity of the rainfall that caused these floods is indeed a characteristic of climate change and is likely to recur? Does he also agree that it adds urgency to the challenge that Britain and the rest of the world face in tackling a threat that some may see as distant and global, but whose consequences can be very immediate and local?

Finally, will the Minister keep Parliament and the public regularly informed in a timely way about progress made on the immediate task of restoring public services to the affected areas and providing help to those who suffered, and on proposals for a new flood defence scheme to protect Carlisle and the surrounding area?

Mr. Morley: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's support for the sterling work done by the emergency services and his thoughtful and measured response. I can tell him that there will be a review of the flood warning system when the immediate emergency is over. It appears from early indications that the warning system was activated, but that only some people received those warnings. Some did not, so we obviously want to look further into the details of that. Given the extent of storms and floods, tremendous demands were made of the emergency warning system. I understand that some of the telemetry in the river systems was overwhelmed because of the speed of the water's rise.

The hon. Gentleman is right about climate change, and we certainly need to take into account its long-term implications. Climate change is a reality and a fact in respect of global warming. We know the figures and we can see the impact that various activities have made. We need to measure long-term trends in weather patterns. We have seen a series of extreme weather events not only in our own country, but globally, with hurricanes and typhoons. People would be ill advised not to assume that there is a link between global warming and climatic change.

We are trying to understand climate change better and, as part of our G8 presidency, we are hosting a major scientific conference in February at the Hadley centre, which is recognised as one of the world's leading centres of climatic forecasting and analysis. That is part of our attempt to understand the long-term implications, but we cannot be complacent. That is why the Government set up the Foresight programme and climate impacts programme to examine the potential consequences of climatic change and prepare to deal with it.

I accept what the hon. Gentleman said about flood plain development. It is certainly the case that there has been inappropriate development over the years on those plains. We now have new guidance under PPG25, which places an obligation on planning authorities to take flood risk into account when assessing planning applications. The Environment Agency is a statutory consultee, and also offers its opinions on planning applications. Those are all part of the Government's long-term planning and long-term commitment to reduce the risks that people in this country face.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle) (Lab): Thank you for calling me, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I first ask you to pass on my thanks to Mr. Speaker for his kind words of sympathy and support for my constituents and myself yesterday? I also thank the Minister, not just for his statement today, but for his prompt action in visiting Carlisle. I rang him on the Saturday, and by Sunday lunchtime he was there. That was greatly appreciated by my constituents. The Minister was able to answer many of their questions about Government support. As I said, it will not be forgotten.

Last Friday night and Saturday morning were horrendous. The Minister said that it was the worst flooding since 1822 and there is a mark on the Eden bridge to show that flood level. The recent flood went beyond it. It was horrendous. Within 36 hours, we had 9 in of rain. Tragically, three people died: Mr. Scott was killed by falling farm masonry, and two elderly ladies, Mrs. Threlkeld and Mrs. Porter, who lived in Warwick road in my constituency, sadly drowned in the incident. I want to offer my sympathy and condolences to the families of all those people, and I know that the House is with me on that. Another consequence was the flooding of 3,000 houses, and almost 100,000 people were without electricity, many for three nights. It has been a very difficult time.

[Mr. Eric Martlew]

I particularly thank the agencies involved in support. The police and the fire service did everything that they could, and more besides. We need to recall that both the fire station and the police station were under 6 ft of water, reflecting the seriousness of the problem. The city council and the county council were excellent, especially social services in looking after the elderly and the young. The reception centres were manned by volunteers—the Women's Royal Voluntary Service, the Salvation Army and the Churches. The Minister and I visited them on Sunday and we saw the tremendous welcome that people were given at those centres. The community spirit in the city has been brilliant. United Utilities and the Environment Agency pulled people in from all over the country to get services back to normal as quickly as possible.

A special thank you should also go to BBC Radio Cumbria. Many people have told me that it was a lifeline. The telephones were down and there were no proper communications, so people listened to their car radios or battery-charged radios. It was the only way to get the information out. Without that, things would be have been even more intolerable for many people.

There should be further investigation of certain problems. I believe that the early warning flood system failed for some people, including myself. The local authority may also have been hampered by a shortage of sandbags. I am not convinced that the insurance industry has done itself any good, either. It was very slow to respond, especially at the weekend.

What of the future? Many industries and businesses in my constituency have been badly affected economically and I am sure that redundancies will follow. I hope that the Government will be generous in giving help. I want to ask the Minister to think about what more the regional development agencies could do to help us. He has already touched on helping local authorities. I have asked him to talk to the insurance companies to see whether they can lift their performance. Will he also ask United Utilities to do its best on the ground to get services back to normal? I understand that at this very moment, accountants are looking at ways to fiddle the compensation awarded to my constituents. It is very bad indeed to see people trying to wriggle out of their commitments. My constituents need every penny to get themselves back on their feet.

In conclusion, I thank the Minister and ask him whether he will come back to Carlisle in a few weeks' time when we know the full extent of the damage, in order to talk to the stakeholders in the area and move forward. Finally, I want to say how proud I have been of my constituents over the last few days.

Mr. Morley: I want to pay tribute to my hon. Friend and colleague, who contacted me immediately about the emergency that his constituents faced. He is a flood victim himself, and has been severely affected, but he took time out to go around the various centres and to talk to people and the local authorities involved. He did everything that he could to support his constituents in the emergency. I join him in paying tribute to BBC Radio Cumbria, which did a sterling job in passing on information and keeping people informed.

I assure my hon. Friend that a full and complete assessment will be made of the response to the emergency when the flood's immediate effects have been dealt with. There will be time then to begin the process of identifying any weaknesses in the warning system. If any such weaknesses are found, they will need to be rectified.

My Department has been in touch with the ABI which, along with many individual insurance companies, has a lot of experience with such problems. The record in relation to getting assessors out to people quickly is good. Assessments are made quickly so that people can get builders in and begin to replace damaged goods. I am sure that the ABI will take note of what has been said and that it will act accordingly.

As I said, local authorities will take the lead in the post-flood recovery programme. However, I have asked the Government office for the north-west to work with local authorities and the local regional development agency to determine what support it can give and which issues need to be addressed. I am sorry to hear what my hon. Friend says about United Utilities Water. Its staff worked around the clock and did a fantastic job in reconnecting a severely damaged electricity sub-station as quickly as possible. It is possible that some of the good will gained could be lost if there are difficulties over the detail of the agreed compensation packages. I assure my hon. Friend that I will draw his comments to the attention of colleagues in the Department of Trade and Industry, who I am sure will want to examine what he has said.

Finally, I accept that much attention is given to the immediate consequences of a flood. There is a lot of media attention, and people show a great deal of support at that time, but afterwards—when the clean-up and repair work is started—people can feel that they have been forgotten. I want to assure the people of Carlisle and the other affected areas that they will not be forgotten. I shall certainly look at my diary, with a view to returning to the area to see how the recovery process is progressing.

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): I also express, on behalf of my Liberal Democrat colleagues, my sympathy to the people of Carlisle and the neighbouring areas. The severe weather at the weekend must have been a dreadful experience, especially for the families who sadly lost their lives. I also want to endorse the thanks that have been extended to the emergency services, the local and central Government agencies that have been involved, and the voluntary sector. The help that has been given has been invaluable, as it has been on other occasions elsewhere in the country.

It is important to restore life to normal as soon as possible. I welcome what the Minister said in that regard, and I recognise the work that he and his colleagues in DEFRA and other Departments are doing.

The Minister spoke about the lessons to be learned. Does he agree that, in essence, there are two such lessons? The first is that we must accelerate even more our proactive efforts to put in place measures to tackle and limit the impact of climate change. The Minister will be aware that the Government's chief scientist, Sir David King, believes that flooding will be the first manifestation of that change to affect this country in an extensive manner.

That is already beginning to happen. I asked a parliamentary question about how many times the Thames barrier has been opened. I was told that the figure has risen from two or three times a year in the 1980s to a projected 325 times a year by the end of this century. It is clear that we are going to have major problems with water and flooding in this century.

The second lesson is that we must take measures to deal with the consequences of climate change, and to limit as far as possible the impact that it has on individuals and communities. I agree with the Minister that it is impossible to eliminate all floods all the time, but does he agree that there is a need to improve flood defences even faster than the current rate? I acknowledge that the Government have put more money into that, and that they have sorted out some of the delivery problems. However, even more must be done, because the risks are increasing dramatically.

Will the Minister tell the people of Carlisle when they are likely to have flood defences in place that will eliminate the greater part of the risk that they face at present? Will he reflect on what happened in the year 2000, when another series of severe floods hit Britain? My constituency of Lewes, and other areas, were badly hit, and the Deputy Prime Minister regarded what happened as a wake-up call. How many of the towns affected in 2000 have flood defence schemes in place now? How many have had such schemes authorised, and in how many areas has nothing been done?

With the best will in the world—and I accept that the Government are doing their best in many respects—I fear that we have not made as much progress as we should have done. Lewes in my constituency has had only a tiny part of the necessary flood defence work completed. Nothing else has been approved, but once again we have floods up to the bridge today.

Will the Minister look again at PPG25, paying particular regard to the Deputy Prime Minister's so-called sustainable communities east of London? Will he quantify the additional flood risk that will be caused by those communities if they are built in the way that has been set out?

Will the Minister encourage insurance companies to continue to provide cover for people in Carlisle and elsewhere? He will know that, after 2000, there was some dispute about whether cover should be provided for flood-affected properties. It can be a very unwelcome realisation for people who have been flooded to discover that they can have no insurance subsequently. Will he encourage the insurance industry to be creative in its response? Companies should not go for like-for-like replacements but should, for example, move electrical sockets up from floorboard level and place them higher up walls to minimise the impact of any future flood.

Britain will suffer more, and more severe, flooding in the future. The Government have begun to move on the matter, but we have not yet seen the step change that we need.

Mr. Morley: The hon. Gentleman is right about the implications of climate change. The Prime Minister has given a very clear and international lead on this matter. It is one of the key themes of our G8 presidency, and I have already mentioned the conference that we will hold. The matter will be discussed at a joint conference for Environment and Development Ministers—the first of its kind to be held under the aegis of the G8. Some of the developing economies, such as Brazil, India and China, will also be invited to participate in the conference, at which climate change will be one of the subjects for discussion.

Consultations in respect of the Carlisle flood defence scheme are already well advanced, as the process was already under way. The effects of the recent events on Carlisle will be taken into account when the scheme is designed. I hope that the matter can be progressed as quickly as humanly possible. In Carlisle, I was accompanied by Sir John Harman, the chair of the Environment Agency, who said that the scheme would be examined to determine how it could be taken forward as smoothly as possible.

I understand the point made about Lewes, but I can tell the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) that if he were to table a parliamentary question on this matter, I think that he would find that every community affected in 2000 either has a flood defence scheme in place now, or that there is one being put in place. In those areas where such schemes are not possible for technical reasons, we have put in place catchment area plans, and we have also made use of temporary, portable barriers with some success.

Our record is a good one. Spending has increased from some £300 million in 1997 to a projected £570 million this year. That is a significant investment in respect of flood defence. The hon. Member for Lewes asked whether it was possible to take things forward more quickly, but it is likely that the level of spending now implemented will absorb our total capacity when it comes to engineers and consultants. Moreover, the design and planning processes must also be taken into account. Unfortunately, neither of those processes is quick, but they are both necessary and important. Sometimes technical issues arise. For example, one complication in Lewes involved the question of which of the various riparian owners were responsible for the town's walls. That is another dimension that has to be taken into account. We have the latest strategy, which has been sent to DEFRA, and we are considering it in relation to Lewes.

With reference to insurance, the Association of British Insurers issued a statement of principles, whereby its members would continue to provide insurance because of the continued investment by the Government. The Government have met their side of the bargain, and I am glad to say that with that statement the ABI has done so too.

David Maclean (Penrith and The Border) (Con): I begin by passing on my condolences to the families of Margaret Threlkeld, Margaret Porter and my own constituent Michael Scott, who tragically lost their lives in the severe weather. I pass on my commiserations to all the thousands affected in Carlisle and to those in my constituency—in Penrith, Appleby and other parts—who have also been badly affected.

The emergency services performed magnificently, as we always expect them to. I also pay tribute to the excellent response of Cumbria county council and the superb emergency centre that it set up rather quickly, and to the actions of Carlisle city council. The voluntary sector was mentioned by the Minister, but I do not know whether people are aware of the huge amount of work done by the Salvation Army, the Women's Royal Voluntary Service and many others, and hundreds of people who are not part of the voluntary sector but just came along to help and brought their little boats to rescue people.

The Minister indicated that there would be emergency help for Cumbria, and that he might be willing to come back to the area. May I suggest a way in which he could help? For the Bellwin formula to trigger, Cumbria county council would have to spend £975,000. The clean-up costs and all the other costs will be enormous but will probably not come to that. They may come to £500,000 or even £800,000, in which case the Government will not contribute a penny. In view of the fact that the Cumbria rate support grant has been severely squeezed by the Government, if the Minister were to pay the £6 million that DEFRA still owes Cumbria from the foot and mouth compensation money which it is still outrageously refusing to pay, Cumbria would get the funding that it requires, he would not have to worry about the Bellwin scheme, justice would be done by all, and all Cumbrians, who have borne the events of the past few days with fortitude and courage, would be content that the Government had behaved fairly. Bring the cheque for the £6 million Minister, and Cumbrians will be content.

Mr. Morley: I shall deal with that point in a moment. I agree that the emergency service response was excellent. The gold command centre was set up quickly and the Carlisle plan was implemented. That is a result of the emergency planning put in place following the Bye report, which is regularly implemented. Wherever there has been a major event—I have attended nearly all of them since 1997—that has been applied effectively and efficiently.

On the Bellwin costs, I understand what the right hon. Gentleman says about Cumbria county council. The Bellwin formula was designed by the previous Government, so he will be aware that all local authorities are expected to have within their contingency funds an element for emergencies. That is an obligation. The idea of the Bellwin formula is that there is an expenditure threshold, as the right hon. Gentleman rightly stated. Carlisle city council will have a contingency for emergencies, but we would not expect that to cover the costs of what has happened in Carlisle. It is inevitable that Carlisle city council will qualify for the Bellwin formula.

Local authorities are not being penalised. It is a rule that they must all hold in their reserves contingency funds for emergencies. If the costs go over the agreed level, the Government start to pick up 85 per cent. of the relevant costs. That is not a new scheme; it has been established for many years, following discussion with the Local Government Association.

The right hon. Gentleman mentions the £6 million which is in dispute between the waste disposal company owned by Cumbria county council and DEFRA. He surely would not expect any Government to pay out sums of money unless there were proper invoices and agreements that had been properly approved and properly applied. To pay out money without those normal accounting methods and procedures is an irresponsible use of public funds. If that is the attitude of the Conservative party towards anybody—whether a private or a public company—who gives them a gigantic bill without the proper accounting and says "Pay up!", that bodes badly for the future of the Conservatives.

Mr. Peter Atkinson (Hexham) (Con): I join colleagues in thanking the Minister and his staff for their concern over the weekend and subsequently for the plight of the people of Hexham and surrounding villages, who lost their water supply, ironically, because of the flooding of the River Tyne. Although many businesses have had to shut and are facing losses, the majority of the population have faced the crisis with remarkable stoicism and good humour. I place on record their thanks for all the efforts of the emergency services, the Environment Agency and particularly Northumbrian Water, whose employees have worked tirelessly day and night to restore supplies and provide emergency supplies very efficiently.

For people who have lost their water supply, hopefully it will be reconnected within a day or two, but for those whose homes were flooded, it will be many months before they overcome the damage that has been caused. When the immediate crisis is over and the Minister takes a calm look at what happened, will he look particularly at the situation regarding the protective walls at Corbridge and Warden, where they were breached, to see whether anything should have been done? There was a suggestion—whether it is true, I do not know—that the banks at Corbridge were damaged by burrowing rabbits over the years and weakened as a consequence. Will the Minister also consider whether the warning system that was in place was adequate?

Mr. Morley: I can give the hon. Gentleman an assurance that we will look at the situation at Corbridge. It sounds as if repairs to the defences will be needed, and I am sure that the Environment Agency will look into that. As he rightly says, when the emergency situation in Cumbria has been dealt with, those are the sort of issues that we will want to examine. If rectification is needed, we will consider the steps that need to be taken.

Many hon. Members in the Cumbria area have been affected. I have spoken to a number of them, particularly my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Tony Cunningham), who contacted me over the weekend on behalf of his constituents in relation to the effects that many people had suffered across the Cumbrian region because of the gales and the extreme weather. We take such matters seriously and when the situation improves, all these aspects will be examined in detail.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale) (Con): Of the 5,500 people in Cumbria who were without power this morning, 1,500 are in my constituency. If the Minister intends to have a word with United Utilities or to invite his colleagues at the Department of Trade and Industry to do so, will he congratulate the engineers on the sterling work that they have been doing by working until 3 am reconnecting people, and suggest that United Utilities needs to improve its call centre, which has not been very efficient in giving accurate and timely information to people who have been extremely concerned about when or whether they will be reconnected?

Will the Minister make it clear that any financial assistance that the Government make available to local authorities will be available to all local authorities in Cumbria that have incurred exceptional costs as a result of these events, specifically including South Lakeland district council? Finally, given that further very severe weather is expected tonight and early tomorrow morning, what steps has the Minister taken in the past 48 hours, which have been working days, in consultation with local authorities there to prepare for a possible repetition of recent events in the next few hours?

Mr. Morley: I join the hon. Gentleman in congratulating the engineers of United Utilities who have indeed worked around the clock. I met some of its engineers; they were based in the gold command so that there could be liaison on the work that was being done. They were also able to give me a full and detailed briefing on the situation and on what they were doing to reconnect power.

I can certainly confirm that the Bellwin scheme will apply to any authority in the Cumbrian region that qualifies under the criteria. If there is additional expense above the agreed threshold, any local authority is entitled to make a claim within the one month qualifying period.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's comments about the call centre will be taken into account by the DTI. Just as we shall evaluate the response of the Government and of public bodies, I am sure that utility companies, too, will in due course want to evaluate their response.

Point of Order

3.19 pm

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. You will be aware that each of the statements, and the urgent question, is important; not one of us would in any way resile from the need to discuss those matters on the Floor of the House. However, the difficulty is that we are about to take the Second Reading of a major piece of legislation, so may I ask you, Madam Deputy Speaker, to draw the attention of the Leader of the House and the House authorities to the fact that taking three statements and an urgent question, one after the other, pushes back the time available to Members to discuss an important piece of legislation?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): I certainly note the hon. Lady's comments and I will bring them to the attention of the Leader of the House and the House authorities.

Orders of the Day

Road Safety Bill

[Relevant documents: The Sixteenth Report from the Transport Committee, Session 2003–04, on Traffic Law and its Enforcement (HC 105-I), and the Government reply thereto, Cm 6442]

Order for Second Reading read.

3.20 pm

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Alistair Darling): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill takes forward legislation that will, I hope, help to reduce the number of deaths and injuries that occur every day on the roads and to improve road safety for all road users.

The UK has one of the best road safety records in the world. It is a record that most EU countries, for example, strive to match. We are better than the United States and the Australians, and on a par with Sweden and the Netherlands, yet the fact remains that 10 people are killed on our roads every day. It is against that background that I ask the House to consider the Bill.

Like successive Governments, this Government are committed to reducing the number of people killed and seriously injured. That is why, in March 2000, we set out a strategy to deliver substantial reductions in road casualties. I remind the House of the targets we set: a 40 per cent. reduction in all road casualties by 2010, with a 50 per cent. reduction in the number of children who are killed or seriously injured.

Good progress has been made. For example, in 2003 we saw a 6 per cent. fall in the number of people killed or seriously injured—the biggest annual drop since the road safety strategy was launched four years ago. By 2003, the number of people killed or seriously injured had fallen by 20 per cent., which means we are about halfway towards our 40 per cent. target for 2010, and the number of children killed or seriously injured had fallen to just over 4,100, which is more than three quarters of the way towards achieving the 50 per cent. reduction target for children.

Despite that welcome progress, too many people are killed or seriously injured.

Mr. Denis Murphy (Wansbeck) (Lab): I am sure that my right hon. Friend will be aware of the tragic case in my constituency in which a young child, Rebecca Sawyer, was killed and her family seriously injured by a hit and run driver. The individual responsible had 89 previous convictions, one of which was for causing death by dangerous driving. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the public need to be protected from such individuals, who kill and maim? As the Bill passes through the parliamentary process, will he examine in detail the possibility of introducing a new offence of causing death by aggravated dangerous driving, which could carry a maximum sentence of life imprisonment?

Mr. Darling: We all have the greatest sympathy for the family who were affected by that accident, and my hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the fact that many people are needlessly killed or seriously injured by bad driving. As a result of changes that have been made, the maximum penalty is, I think, 14 years for causing death by dangerous driving. The Home Office is considering whether a series of aggravated offences should be introduced. Such offences are not in the Bill because the issue is still being looked at and further consideration is necessary, but most hon. Members would hope that the courts take incidents that involve death or serious injury on the road very seriously indeed. Someone who kills someone else using a car is just as guilty and just as culpable as someone who uses a weapon to do so. My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to what is happening.

Mr. Paul Stinchcombe (Wellingborough) (Lab): My right hon. Friend mentioned the ongoing Home Office review of the various offences where death is caused by bad driving. Will he prevail on the Home Office to look at an offence of causing death by careless driving? He might have already received a letter from my constituents, Mr. and Mrs. Melnik, about the tragic death of their 17-year-old daughter, who was killed recently by a careless driver. As no offence of causing death by careless driving is known to English law, the driver could not be charged with any offence that marked the fact of her death at all. He could only be fined—a price paid for the loss of a life caused by criminal negligence of just £500.

Mr. Darling: Again, I have a great deal of sympathy with what my hon. Friend says. The Home Office and my Department are looking at aggravated offences, because it is important that society can show its disapproval when someone causes death in that way. As I said just a few moments ago, killing someone with a car, where someone is culpable, needs to be dealt with. It needs to be treated by the courts with the utmost seriousness and, where necessary, exemplary sentences ought to be imposed. We should be very clear about the fact that someone who drives dangerously or carelessly and causes the death of someone who would otherwise be alive is just as guilty as if they took a weapon to them, resulting in their death.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab) rose—

Mr. Darling: I will give way; then I want to make some progress.

Dr. Iddon: I am sorry to delay the Secretary of State. My constituency has a particularly bad accident record, and we are very grateful to the Government for giving the local authority £750,000 as a pilot measure. In 18 months, there have been six very tragic incidents in my constituency of death by dangerous driving, some of which I have raised on other occasions on the Floor of the House. The Home Office is reviewing the sentences for causing death by dangerous driving. I know that that is not my right hon. Friend's Department, but is he able to say when we are likely to know the outcome of the review?

Mr. Darling: I cannot give my hon. Friend a precise date on which the Home Office will conclude its review, but Ministers are well aware, both from their constituency experience and from what my hon. Friend and others have said in the House, that people want us to make proposals as quickly as is reasonably possible. It is important that we get such things right. Equally, as I said, despite the fact that our overall record is better than that of many other countries, today, like every other day, nine or 10 people will be killed on our roads, and many of those accidents are avoidable.

There is no single solution to reducing the number of road accidents, and the right approach relies on a number of different measures. That is what we are doing: we are continuing to implement measures—for example, more local safety schemes. We are continuing to roll out the safety camera programme. We are involved in the greater promotion of road safety under the Think! advertising campaign. Indeed, a new phase of the television advertising campaign is starting today in relation to speed.

We are also considering measures that can improve the dreadful statistics on motor cycle accidents. Although motor cyclists account for 1 per cent. of road users, they account for 20 per cent. of deaths and serious injuries on the roads. In particular, there is a need to get across to people who use motor cycles, sometimes infrequently, the fact that, used the wrong way, motor cycles can cause the death of the motor cyclist and, indeed, other road users.

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger (Bridgwater) (Con): One of the problems in the rural area that I represent is that websites are now challenging motor cyclists to compete at high speed in a circuit. We lost five motor cyclists in fatal crashes in the area last year. We have tried to get the websites shut down, with the help of the Home Secretary, but have failed. Will the Secretary of State please look to see whether we can do something about such things, which are killing people?

Mr. Darling: We are aware of those websites, and many hon. Members will have seen them. The problem is that people are encouraged to use motor cycles—sometimes they are not used to riding powerful machines—in places where they are led to believe that they can go fast, when there is some sort of challenge, and they end up killing themselves and others. As I said, motor cyclists account for 20 per cent. of deaths and serious injuries on the roads. Over the past year or so, the statistics have been going the wrong way and there has been a rise in the number of motor cyclists killed or seriously injured.

The hon. Gentleman knows that stopping people putting things on websites is easier said than done. There is sometimes a fine line between what is acceptable and unacceptable. I am aware that in constituencies such as the hon. Gentleman's and others, especially if people visit them at weekends and so on, there has been an alarming rise in motor cycle deaths. The Government take that seriously, as should society. It is not just about the individuals involved, but about others as well.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): There have been motor cycling fatalities in my constituency in recent months. Has my right hon. Friend considered the suggestion of Brake and other organisations that we should re-test born-again bikers, as they are sometimes called, who take up motor bike riding after a period of inactivity, to ensure that they have appropriate and up-to-date experience for the bike they ride? Will he also consider the role of protective clothing, which would help to reduce the number of serious injuries?

Mr. Darling: My hon. Friend may be aware that motor cycling organisations have put a number of proposals to the Government, one of which is a further test before someone drives a larger or more powerful motor bike. When I first looked at this matter I was surprised to find that someone such as me, who has held a driving licence for 30 years and has never driven a motor bike, could buy a powerful machine and ride off on it tomorrow morning. The chances are that if I was not used to it I could get into difficulties. We want to consider that. I am bound to say to my hon. Friend, however, that I do not know how we would decide whether someone was a born-again motor cyclist as opposed to another sort of motor cyclist.

We must tread a fine line between allowing people to enjoy what can be the extremely pleasurable activity of using their motor bikes while at the same time protecting them and road users. I again remind the House that motor cyclists account for 1 per cent. of road users but 20 per cent. of deaths and serious injuries. If we are serious about making further inroads into road casualties, we need to consider that. Like everything else, none of these things is without difficulties. However, my hon. Friend is right to draw attention to those suggestions.

There are three strands to the Bill, the first of which addresses the problem of bad or irresponsible driving through better detection, better enforcement and more effective penalties. The second clamps down on motorists who break the law—for example, by driving without insurance or using cars, vans or lorries that are unroadworthy. The third, of course, raises driving standards and improves awareness through better education and training.

Mr. Gerry Steinberg (City of Durham) (Lab): I suspect that, like me, every Member of Parliament has had a constituent who was killed by someone driving dangerously. With great respect to the Secretary of State, it is all right being sympathetic but, frankly, the Government do not take notice of Back Benchers. My hon. Friend the Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Murphy) outlined his incident. I can give one exactly the same.

We have debated the subject in the Chamber and Westminster Hall. We have received sympathy all along the line from Home Secretaries. I have met two Home Secretaries in the past four years and still nothing is being done. Week after week, our constituents are murdered by criminals on the road. It is not good enough for the Secretary of State to give us sympathy. We are not after that. We are after justice. It is about time that it was recognised that virtually every Member of Parliament wants something done about people who break the law in their cars and murder our constituents. It is like allowing them to do what they like with a gun.

Mr. Darling: I do not disagree with my hon. Friend. I said earlier that I find it difficult to make an intellectual differentiation between a person who sets out with a gun and shoots someone and a person who drives irresponsibly or dangerously and ends up killing someone. I said that the penalties for causing death by dangerous driving have been increased, but I do not agree with my hon. Friend that nothing has been happening. Although deaths have been increased slightly, serious injuries have fallen. We have introduced a range of measures, and there are further measures in the Bill that I hope to discuss in the not too distant future which will help. Three things are necessary—education and awareness; making sure that there is the right range of offences and penalties; and—this is not in the hands of the House and the Government—ensuring that people who administer the judicial system use the available powers so that if someone kills someone else, as my hon. Friend described, an appropriate penalty is visited on them. Road traffic offences should not be regarded as lesser offences. People are often left with the impression that although a death has been caused the perpetrator is dealt with quite differently from someone who sets out with a gun or something else.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Darling: I am mindful of the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), and would like to make progress. I shall try, however, to let everyone who wishes to intervene do so.

The first strand in the Bill tackles bad or reckless standards of driving. Research has shown that driver behaviour is a key factor in about half of all car fatalities. Excessive speeding needs to be addressed, because over 1,000 people are killed and over 38,000 are seriously injured every year as a result of speeding. The use of safety cameras is controversial and has been the subject of a great deal of discussion in the House over the past year. However, I repeat that cameras are one way of addressing speeding and road safety, provided that they are effectively placed. The latest independent research, which I presented to the House last June, shows that there has been a 40 per cent. reduction in deaths and serious injuries at safety camera sites. Cameras are, of course, only one of a number of measures, but we are right to continue a policy introduced by the previous Government—until fairly recently, it received bipartisan support—as all the evidence shows that cameras reduce accidents.

Research suggests that the greatest reduction in road casualties would result from reducing excessive speeding. The Bill allows us to vary the system of penalty points to see what can be done further to discourage people from speeding excessively. That is controversial, so I shall I shall say a word about it. The Bill allows for a graduated structure of fixed penalty points. It does not introduce them, but it allows us, after statutory consultation, to introduce an order that would provide for a variable system of penalty points and fines. I made it clear in the preliminary discussion document that we published last September that there should be a variable system of penalty points and fines to make sure that the punishment fits the nature of the crime.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Darling: I said that there would be interest in the matter, and I am happy to deal with all the points that my hon. Friends wish to make. However, first, I shall make two points. The Bill allows for a system of graduation, and the preliminary discussion document showed that a majority of people thought that a graduated system of penalty points was a good thing. It is fair to say that there is a division about how that graduation should work. The Bill, however, makes it possible to introduce a graduated system, which is essential. Once the Bill has become law, we will have a discussion about the nature of the scheme.

Rob Marris: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his patience. A pedestrian hit at 20 mph has a 95 per cent. chance of survival, one hit at 30 mph has a 50 per cent. chance of survival, but one hit at 40 mph has a 10 per cent. chance of survival. I support the concept of graduated fixed penalties but, under clause 16, the Secretary of State seems to be suggesting a reduction in the penalty for some speeding from three points to two points. I am bemused by that, particularly in the light of what he said this afternoon about the seriousness with which he views speeding and the death that can result. The House might send the wrong message if it dropped the penalty for speeding from three to two points.

Mr. Darling: Last September, I made it clear that I think it important that any penalty regime distinguishes between somebody who is just over the speed limit and somebody who had driven far too fast, especially in built-up areas. The point that I made then, which I repeat today, is that if someone is not caught by a speed camera, but is instead sent to court, the court itself makes that distinction, depending on the circumstances.

It comes down to whether or not we believe that by having a two-point penalty and a £40 fine, as opposed to a three-point penalty and a £60 fine, drivers will say, "Oh, it is all right. I don't care." Most drivers start with the assumption that they do not want any penalty points or any fines. The point of the discussion document, which I introduced to find out people's views, was to see whether support exists for graduation, and the answer is yes.

Outside built-up areas, there is less of an argument, but in built-up areas people ask, "Is it right to impose a two-point penalty and a 30 to 40 mph speed limit?" Having considered that question for some weeks, the matter turns on whether people believe that a two-point penalty, as opposed to a three-point penalty, means that someone will be more likely to speed—in other words, the difference is one point. I take a different view from my hon. Friend's and happen to believe that the proposal that I introduced in September is right.

Today, we are dealing with a Bill that allows graduation. Some people—not, I think, the majority—say "no graduation at all", and their position is straightforward. After the Bill is enacted, we will be obliged to consult by statute. People must be able to see fairness and proportion in all laws, but I do not believe that the one-point difference that we are discussing, will mean that lots of people say, "Well, it is all right to break a 30 mph speed limit." I do not think that I am being inconsistent—I would say that—but I understand my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): I want to push my right hon. Friend on that point. In the context of clause 16, is he therefore saying that he is open to persuasion that the arguments set out by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) might be a better solution than his initial feeling that a move down is possible? Is he open to persuasion, or is he taking a fixed view at this stage?

Mr. Darling: It will clearly be for the Secretary of State to decide the Government's final view after the Bill has been enacted. Last September, I recognised that the issue is controversial, but I thought that my proposal was fairer and more appropriate. However, it is self-evident that not only Second Reading, but Committee and the rest of the proceedings should be used to raise those issues in the House of Commons, and I am sure that my hon. Friend and others will make their views clear.

At the moment, my view remains that my proposal from last September is reasonable, but we must consult formally, and when we consult there will be a specific proposal which will allow everybody concerned, whether organisations or individuals, to come forward, and the House will form a view. Throughout the past year or so, speed cameras have been a controversial issue. People understand that a balance must be struck between being fair to all of us, including those of us who drive, and remembering the purpose of speed cameras, which is to save lives. That point underpins my whole approach. We have to be fair and take people with us, but let us not lose sight of the fact that speed cameras do save lives and reduce serious injury. It is good that since we published the figures last summer we have heard rather less of the hysterical talk about removing every speed camera wherever it is.

The Bill has other provisions on developing and using retraining courses for more serious speeding offences. They are based on the successful drink-drive rehabilitation schemes and are set out in clauses 24 and 25.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): Can my right hon. Friend tell us about the Government's thinking on drink-driving, especially in relation to discussions with the Home Office about increased sentences for drink-driving and increased sanctions for uninsured or even unlicensed drivers, as in the major problem of kids taking cars and joyriding?

Mr. Darling: I will move on to insurance and roadworthy vehicles in a moment.

Drink-driving is obviously a matter of major concern, and we continue to have discussions with colleagues in the Home Office in relation to that offence. It is worth bearing in mind the fact that despite all the campaigns of the past 30 years, alcohol is a factor in nearly one in seven of all fatal crashes—that is, nearly 500 deaths a year. That must be dealt with. Up to 20 per cent. of those drink-drive convictions concern the cases that my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) is particularly worried about, involving repeat offenders who are predominantly younger male drivers. We must not only improve education, but improve detection and increase the number of people who are caught drinking and driving.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Darling: I want to set out what we are doing, and then I will give way to my hon. Friend.

The Bill provides for the introduction of roadside evidential breath-testing, which is far more efficient—it avoids the visit to the police station and saves police time—and more effective. There is a secondary power under which we intend to make repeat drink-driving offenders—for instance, someone who is automatically banned for three years after a second conviction—retake their driving tests. That is justified. We are also making provisions concerning serious offenders in relation to their medical examinations, as there is a loophole there that needs to be closed. Finally, we are allowing for the future use of alcohol ignition interlocks, which have been shown to be effective in discouraging reoffenders in other countries. Those provisions are set out in clauses 14 and 15.

Mr. Kidney: I support those three measures.

In 1998, when the Department for Transport was part of the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, it estimated that lowering the legal limit from 80 to 50 would save about 50 lives a year. Has my right hon. Friend's Department updated that estimate to today?

Mr. Darling: We continually keep the level of the limit under review. Most of the people with whom we deal are way above 80. Obviously, if the limit were lowered additional people would, by definition, be caught by it. However, at the moment the Government believe that the right level is 80. We always keep such matters under review. I am very conscious of the fact that our problem in this country, sadly, is that people are often not just over the limit—there would be a stronger argument for a reduction if we were catching a lot of people on 82 or 85—but way over the limit. The people we must really have a go at are those who do not just do it once but are caught and second and a third time. The bigger problem, which I suspect would occur even were the limit dropped to, say, 50, concerns the people who believe that they can have one or two drinks and it will be all right. In some cases it is not all right.

For a long time, I thought that we were reaching a situation in which drinking and driving would become socially unacceptable—that people simply would not put up with it and peer group pressure would take effect. Sadly, however, there appears to be a trend, especially among younger people, of saying, "It doesn't matter." We need to get it across to people that drinking and driving can kill the driver, the driver's friends and others. We will keep the level under review but the Government currently believe that it is set at the right amount and have no plans to change it.

Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West) (Con): I believe that the Government are right to keep that under review and not to make a change. Since 1979, the number of deaths that have occurred when the driver or rider is above the existing legal limit has decreased from approximately 1,800 a year to around 500. Even if the lower limit would bring the drivers involved in another 50 deaths into the ambit of the law, it is far better, as the Secretary of State said, to concentrate on those who are over the current legal limit or have consumed twice that. Cultural change needs to continue so that drink driving does not go on even at its current rate.

Will the right hon. Gentleman report to the House if it transpires that countries with a lower legal limit turn out to have fewer drink driving deaths than us? While we continue to have fewer deaths than those countries, it is better to continue with an effective policy rather than do things that simply change numbers, not behaviour.

Mr. Darling: I should certainly report to the House if such evidence emerged. However, the evidence, especially in continental Europe, does not show fewer deaths. My counterpart in France has been here to see what we do, because drinking and driving in France is a serious offence. Some countries in other parts of Europe have lower limits but no automatic disqualification. Drinking and driving is so important that it is right to signify our concern and disapproval through automatic disqualification of someone who is caught doing it. Of course, we will examine evidence not only from the rest of Europe but other parts of the world.

Two things will make a difference. The first is repeating the message that drinking and driving can kill. Secondly, if people believe that they are more likely to get caught than not, it concentrates the mind wonderfully. I therefore welcome the fact that many chief constables are turning their attention to the matter and recognising that it is a problem that needs to be tackled and regarded as seriously as other crimes.

I said that the Bill will increase penalties. The penalty for careless driving will increase from £2,500 to £5,000. Driving using a hand-held mobile phone will become an endorsable offence. We will also unify the penalties for seat-belt offences in relation to children. There is currently a lesser penalty for not wearing a seat belt in the back seat than for not wearing one in the front seat. There is no good reason for that. We will also introduce a mandatory disqualification for a second offence of using a vehicle in a dangerous condition.

We believe that those measures taken together will send a clear message to those who persist in driving recklessly or irresponsibly.

The second strand of measures clamps down on drivers who do not respect the rules of the road. Recent research has shown that unlicensed drivers are six to nine times more likely to have an accident than drivers with road tax. We need to deal more effectively with the one in 20 drivers who currently drive without insurance. We know from experience that they are high risk drivers who impose costs on the rest of us and can also cost lives. That is why the Bill includes several provisions to tighten up the regime.

The Bill will enable the police to make use of data already held by the motor insurance industry about vehicles that are not insured. Furthermore, for the first time, the police will be given the power to seize and dispose of vehicles that are uninsured, as part of the Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill, which is currently in Committee.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): Does the Secretary of State accept that, although it is important to change the law to ensure that the Data Protection Act 1998 does not impede fining people who drive unlicensed or uninsured, it is equally important that people who operate the system are aware of the law? When the Select Committee took evidence on that, we found a great deal of confusion about the state of the law.

Mr. Darling: There is much to be said for clarity about the law, no matter what subject we tackle, but I agree with my hon. Friend and we clearly need to attend to the problem. It is important to stress that, shortly, especially when the MOT computerisation programme is completed, the police will be able to tell whether a car has got its MOT, whether it is taxed and whether the driver is insured. That information has not hitherto been available on a database to police officers, but it will be shortly. This will cut down on evasion. It will also make it easier for the police to take action if they find someone driving without insurance, a licence or an MOT.

Kevin Brennan (Cardiff, West) (Lab): Will the Secretary of State consider the problem of people who seek to avoid more serious charges by failing to identify who was driving a vehicle at the time of an incident? In a recent case, a constituent of mine, Tony Davies, was the innocent victim of a road traffic accident in which the two people in the other vehicle refused to identify who had been driving and got off with a lighter charge as a result. What plans does the Secretary of State have to deal with this issue?

Mr. Darling: The Bill contains provisions to deal with that problem. Failure to disclose who was driving will result in a penalty of six points. My hon. Friend is right; at the moment, it might be open to a serious offender to refuse to identify who had been driving because they could get off with a lesser penalty as a result.

We wish also to provide a new system of endorsement of driving licences that will allow non-Great Britain licence holders to be given fixed penalties for traffic offences. We are also seeking powers that would allow the police and other officers to take a deposit from non-GB licence holders in lieu of a fixed penalty, or pending a court hearing. This will ensure that overseas truck drivers do not escape punishment when they commit offences, as can happen too easily now. We are also seeking the power to enable the disclosure of driver and vehicle data to foreign authorities, when that would be important.

Ms Keeble: In regard to HGV drivers coming from abroad, will there be any discussions in Europe to ensure that the requirements are equalised? I am referring in particular to the restriction on insulin-dependent diabetics.

Mr. Darling: Yes, such discussions are continuing with a view to reaching an agreement on those issues. As traffic between this country and the rest of Europe increases, it is only sensible to try to ensure that people are treated in the same way. We particularly want to avoid a situation in which, for very good reasons, someone could be dealt with quite strictly here but could escape if they went elsewhere. This would benefit all the countries involved, and those discussions are taking place at the moment.

Mr. David Marshall (Glasgow, Shettleston) (Lab): Further to the point that my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) has just made on HGVs, the Secretary of State has not yet mentioned any measures relating to these vehicles. They are involved in a high number of accidents, especially during the night. These accidents often involve side impacts, and many of the drivers involved have said that this is because they did not see the HGV until it was too late. Has my right hon. Friend seen the evidence submitted by the organisation Reflect, which calls for ECE 104 to become mandatory in the UK? This would require retro-reflective markings to be fitted to the sides of all HGVs. Does he accept that this is a good suggestion, and that that provision should be introduced throughout the whole of the EU?

Mr. Darling: I have seen some of that evidence, and I know that it has been considered in Germany in particular. My understanding is that the evidence is still being evaluated, and that it is not overwhelming. However, the Government will look very seriously at anything that would reduce the number of accidents involving HGVs. My hon. Friend is right to say that HGVs are involved in a number of accidents, and we need to consider what we can do to reduce that number.

The Bill will give the police and other authorities greater powers to deal with problems on the roads. This is supported by a strategy published this morning by my Department and the Home Office, which reaffirms road policing as a priority area.

The last strand of the Bill contains measures to improve driving standards, which is one of the most important elements of what we are doing. It is a fact that young and newly qualified drivers have a greater likelihood of being involved in an accident in their first year of driving. Indeed, one in five accidents involve a driver who has passed their test in the preceding year. Furthermore, 17 to 21-year-olds represent about 6 per cent. of licence holders, yet they are involved in about 12 per cent. of all injury accidents.

The Bill will put in place measures to provide for higher standards for professional driving instructors and to regulate driving schools, including not only those who give instruction, but franchisees as well as employees. The aim is to ensure that drivers and riders of all types of motor vehicles are tested in accordance with the demands of today's traffic conditions.

In conclusion, the Bill will help to create a safer and fairer environment for motorists. It will provide additional protection for all road users, but especially the more vulnerable groups of pedestrians and cyclists.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Darling: I shall take one further point, and then I think that I shall stop.

Mr. Drew: My right hon. Friend has not really mentioned the impact of motorists' road safety on pedestrians and cyclists. When cyclists are involved in road accidents, it is always up to them to prove that a motorist was the guilty party—one presumes innocence before guilt—but that can often be difficult. What additional measures will be put in place to protect cyclists and give them fair chances?

Mr. Darling: My law might be a bit rusty because it is 18 years since I practised it, but I think that it is always necessary to prove the guilt of anyone involved in a road accident, so not only cyclists face that problem. My hon. Friend is right that we want to improve the safety of cyclists, and several measures in the Bill will help to do that, although they are not specifically aimed at cyclists. Education and other measures can help to improve cyclists' safety. The onus of proof, however, applies to all road accidents, as it does to any other crime.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Darling: I think that I had better stop, or the House, and especially my hon. Friend the Member for West Carmarthen and South Pembrokeshire (Mr. Ainger), will get very cross.

The Bill contains many measures that will improve road safety, but I come back to a point that I made at the start of my speech: legislation is only one part of what we need to do. We must raise awareness and give courts the tools to deal with people who offend. We need to express the view that the courts will do their duty when people appear before them. The one thing that should unite us all—I was struck by this the last time we discussed railway accidents—is that 10 people will die today in road accidents, so 10 sets of families and friends will lose someone. It should weigh heavily with us that most such accidents are avoidable, so the country would expect the Government and the House to do everything possible to reduce the unacceptably large number of people who are killed every single day. I hope that everyone will support the Bill.

4.2 pm

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): To begin on a note of consensus, let me say that the Conservative party entirely shares the concerns that the Secretary of State and other hon. Members have expressed about road safety. For that reason, I am happy to make it clear at the outset that we will not divide the House on Second Reading, although my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) and I will set out several changes and additions that should be made to the Bill, which we will try to achieve during its passage, especially in Committee.

Let me make some general remarks about road safety that pick up where the Secretary of State left off. We share the concerns expressed. However, despite the progress made over the years to reduce casualties in Britain and the fact that we are doing better than many European countries, we need to give the matter more attention. Although I have shadowed many briefs over the past seven years and served in several Government Departments, this is the first time that I have dealt directly with transport issues, and I am startled by our inconsistent attitude towards different types of transport.

[Mr. Tim Yeo]

If 300 people were killed in a railway accident there would be a huge public outcry and a major investigation, which would almost certainly be followed by policy change. If an aircraft accident caused the same number of deaths, there would be a detailed investigation, procedures would be examined and training and qualification standards would be overhauled. If a cross-channel ferry sank with the loss of 300 lives, the most detailed inquiry would be held. But when 300 people die on the roads, pretty well nothing is done, despite the fact that 300 people die on our roads every month. All we seem to do is shrug our shoulders. Perhaps that extraordinary tolerance of road casualties is partly because they happen so often. Whatever the reason, it is not in any way a rational response.

Dismissing road casualties as the inevitable consequence of driver error does not make sense. Every casualty represents a personal tragedy. The hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Stinchcombe) referred earlier to the tragic case of Alexine Melnik, whose father copied the letter that he wrote to him to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch. It is a moving document describing the tragic circumstances of his daughter's death and the unsatisfactory outcome of the case, with the verdict that it was an accident caused by a momentary lapse of concentration. As Mr. Melnik points out,

"Isn't a car travelling at speed a lethal weapon and in every respect to be considered the same as a loaded gun"?

If someone had been carrying a loaded gun, and had accidentally shot and killed an innocent bystander, would that person face a charge of carrying a gun without due care and attention? Would the court have accepted a claim of a momentary lapse of concentration so readily? I am sure that Members on both sides of the House will have had similar cases brought to their attention, and that we all feel as strongly as those who intervened on the Secretary of State during his speech.

The problem relates not only to drivers. The AA EuroRAP results show that driver error is not the only main factor. Some roads are much more dangerous than others. Imagine the horror that would rightly be expressed if the Strategic Rail Authority—or, soon, its successor bodies—were to publish a table showing that one was far more likely to be killed on a train travelling between Slough and Swindon than on one travelling between Milton Keynes and Rugby. That would not be tolerated for a moment. What would happen if the Civil Aviation Authority revealed data showing that some airports had consistently more aircraft crashing than others? Rightly, neither public opinion, nor the airlines, nor their customers, nor the authorities or anyone else, would accept that position. Yet that is exactly what we seem willing to accept on the roads.

Let me make it clear: the next Conservative Government will not accept that. In my first year in office, if I am Secretary of State for Transport—

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeo: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. It is true that opinion polls are not yet making that the racing certainty to which I look forward, but we are not quite in extra time yet. If that happy eventuality comes about, however, and the British people have something to celebrate later in the year, I will require the relevant authorities, the Highways Agency and others, to assess what steps can be taken to reduce accident rates on roads classified as high risk—marked in black on the AA EuroRAP map. In the first full term of a Conservative Government, we will extend that requirement to all roads classified as medium-high risk, which are shown in red on the same map.

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that overriding powers should determine speed limits—for example, on roads that cross a local government boundary, as in my constituency where the limit moves from 40 mph to 30 mph on the same road, because separate local authorities are involved? Would he suggest that there should be some overriding power above local authorities?

Mr. Yeo: I am suggesting that we have clear data showing that some roads—happily, a relatively small number—are much more dangerous than others. We need to try to analyse what steps could be taken, and the hon. Gentleman may have just suggested one of them. I do not know whether changes in speed limit, for reasons such as he has described, are a factor on those high-risk roads. Given that we know that some roads are much more high risk than others, it is worth exploring whether simple steps—such as the one that he suggests, perhaps—could be taken to reduce those risks. I am sure that we would do that with any other transport mode, and we ought to start doing it with roads. Tolerating the idea that some roads are more dangerous than others seems simply unacceptable.

Data about other fatalities also need to be addressed. Young male drivers are five times more likely to be killed than middle-aged drivers. That is a horrifying statistic, and it is probably due less to inferior driving skills than to the attitudes adopted by some young male drivers once they are behind the wheel. I recall from my student days the circumstances in which fatalities might be higher than average. Particular concern arises when young males are driving with members of their peer group as passengers. Nothing in the Bill appears to address those challenges, which is a pity. Is it not time to explore new ways of encouraging more responsible driving by young men?

Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): What my hon. Friend says is absolutely true. The Secretary of State has been dealing largely with people who are insured and qualified to drive, but many accidents are caused by people, mainly young people, who are flouting the law by driving in the first place. They are actively encouraged by magazines and websites to save the money that could be spent on insurance for souping up their cars. Not enough is being done to clamp down on alterations that are made to cars: it is apparently still legal to soup up engines with nitrous oxide. People who are simply not capable of dealing with such powerful motors go out and flout the law, and get away with it.

Mr. Yeo: That is an important point. I am sure that the encouragement that some newly qualified young drivers may receive from a variety of sources to act in the way described by my hon. Friend is one element of the problem. Another, of course, is the fact that penalties for driving without insurance are often lower than the cost of obtaining insurance. A number of issues need to be dealt with and, as I say, the Government do not seem to be taking sufficiently urgent notice of them—in the Bill or elsewhere.

David Taylor: Should there not be a graduated system of driver licensing? Although the current arrangements have rightly been strengthened in recent years, they could be toughened even further by means of a two-stage approach. The first stage would restrict the size of vehicle that could be driven and the number of passengers carried; secondly, driving at night could be prohibited. One driver in 10 is under 25, and one in four who are killed is under 25. As the hon. Gentleman says, there is an important link to be investigated.

Mr. Yeo: That is an interesting suggestion. I think that we should adopt an evidence-based approach. If data suggest that particular types of driver are particularly prone to certain accidents, we may be able to identify measures—such as graduated licensing—to tackle that. I think that the Secretary of State accepted the principle when he expressed surprise at the idea that, with his existing driving licence and many years' experience of driving a car, he could get on to a very powerful motor cycle and would not be restricted from engaging in what might be a more risky activity—although I am sure that in the Secretary of State's case, it would not be. I have observed his measured approach to these and other issues over the past nine months or so, and I am sure that if he got on to a very powerful motor cycle, it would be equally measured.

The hon. Gentleman's general point is valid. I think that the public are ready to accept such changes, and there is recognition that by adopting an evidence-based approach we could reduce the risk. Some of the points made in the Transport Committee's report "Traffic Law and its Enforcement", published last autumn, reflect his thinking.

I have touched on the twin problems of roads that are more dangerous than the average and drivers who are more accident prone than the average. If the Government are to adopt a more comprehensive strategy, and if we are to reduce the number of people killed and seriously injured on the roads, they must accept that measures to tackle those problems directly will be needed.

A hollow laugh will greet the statement issued by the Secretary of State this morning—and referred to, albeit briefly, in his speech—about a new strategy for policing the roads. The Conservative party strongly supports the use of more police to tackle illegal and antisocial use of the roads, but this is the Government who have cut the number of traffic officers by 1,500 since they came to power. In 1999, traffic officers were conveniently redefined to include operational and organisational support officers, who are employed to perform functions other than being out on the streets. The actual number of operational traffic officers, mainly on motor cycles or in patrol vehicles, has dropped even further—perhaps by between a quarter and a third—since 1997.

That really is a scandal, and it is, I am afraid, one reason why the public now have such low regard for Ministers. The Secretary of State, who really should know better, is making a grossly misleading attempt to claim that he is doing something to address the problem through an initiative. Actually, the fact that there are fewer traffic officers enforcing the law and making our roads safer is entirely the result of this Government's policies.

Mr. Bellingham: My hon. Friend has hit on an important issue that affects rural areas in particular, where people want the security of seeing bobbies on the beat and road traffic police. Does he agree that if more road traffic police are around, fewer people will take the risk of drinking and driving?

Mr. Yeo: That is beyond doubt. Indeed, the likelihood of being caught drink-driving—I shall deal with that issue in a moment—is one of the most effective deterrents to taking such risks.

Rob Marris: The hon. Gentleman mentioned using the EuroRAP map, which indicates in black the roads with a higher incidence of such problems. Do he and his party support the deployment of safety cameras—they are often called speed cameras—in rural and urban areas?

Mr. Yeo: I shall come to cameras in a moment, but the simple answer is that where cameras can be sited so as to reduce accidents, we of course support their use. I wholeheartedly endorse the aim of reducing the unnecessarily high number of deaths and serious injuries on our roads, and cameras situated in the right position can contribute to that process.

The Bill contains a number of measures that are desirable in their own right, and will have our support. Overall, however, it is something of a hotch-potch of measures, rather than an absolutely coherent approach to the problem. It contains provisions directed specifically at the problem of drink-driving, and the Government are right to be concerned about that issue. The steady progress made in cutting the number of casualties resulting from drink-driving accidents seems to have halted in the past decade or so, which must be a cause for concern. I agree with the Secretary of State that more effective enforcement of existing drink-driving limits is essential if such progress is to be restarted, and we will want to explore how that can be done in more detail in Committee.

A central part of the problem is that, even according to the Government's own figures, the number of traffic police will still be lower in future than it was originally. As my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Norfolk (Mr. Bellingham) has just pointed out, if drivers feel that there is less chance of being caught, the likelihood of their offending, hoping that they can get away with it, is clearly greater. More will take the risk, and sadly, more casualties will occur.

Of course, "driving under the influence" does not just mean drink-driving. Drugs are also an issue, which my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch will pursue later in the Bill's passage.

Mr. Bellingham: What does my hon. Friend, who is making an excellent speech, think about increasing the powers of the police so that they can stop people randomly on the basis of suspected drink-driving? I have a reasonably open mind on the issue, but most chief constables would like greater flexibility in that regard.

Mr. Yeo: It is clear that we must take the views of chief constables extremely seriously. I, too, have an open mind on that issue, and I am not quite sure which way the evidence points. If such powers would be one effective way of reducing the number of people who drink-drive, or of increasing the number who get caught doing so, they deserve to be supported. However, I have not seen the evidence, so I am agnostic and open to being convinced.

Mr. Kidney: I hope to argue later that we should reduce the legal limit from 80 mg to 50 mg. What is the view of the hon. Gentleman and his party on that issue?

Mr. Yeo: I share the Secretary of State's view. The priority is to concentrate on people who are well above the limit, and on repeat offenders. If we are to devote more effort to this issue, I suspect that diverting some of it to stopping people whose blood alcohol level is between 50 mg and 80 mg will prove an ineffective use of resources.

If our aim, shared across both sides of the House, is to cut casualties from drink-driving and elsewhere, we have to be hard-headed about where we make the greatest effort, and I suspect that it makes more sense to focus on repeat offenders and those who are well over the limit than to opt for a slightly lower target. I believe that that is also the Secretary of State's view, and that of my hon. Friends as well. Let me emphasise that I approach the matter from a completely pragmatic point of view. I want progress to be made, and if it became clear that the hon. Gentleman's suggestion was the best way to make progress, I would have no objection to it in principle.

On speeding, I am delighted that the Government have adopted some Conservative party policies. Widening the range of penalty points that can be imposed for speeding offences is a good idea, and I am glad that the Government have seen the light. I wonder whether we could persuade the Secretary of State to go one step further. His Back Benchers expressed considerable interest in the idea, and it could be dealt with most effectively if we put directly into the Bill the range of speeds leading to different penalties, and the circumstances in which differential penalty points would be imposed. That would allow Parliament to be the arbiter, and there would be no uncertainty about it. I hope to pursue that point in Committee.

Mr. Barnes: On speeding, I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman is going to mention clause 17, which deals with detection devices. It proposes a way to deal with the jamming of the police ability to detect whether speeding has occurred, and the ability to ascertain whether a speed detector is in the area. That is a valuable measure, but proposals advanced in legislation sometimes have unseen side-effects. Mark Cornwall, a constituent who runs Derby Car Parts Direct, told me that the firm, dealing in radar detector provision, will finish when the legislation comes into force. Yet it has developed technology that might be valuable and helpful in other respects. Perhaps the Secretary of State could help such firms to switch away from producing equipment that will become illegal, into legal products. That would be valuable.

Mr. Yeo: That intervention seems to be directed towards the future, when I am the Secretary of State. I would be pleased to help, but at the moment it is more a matter for the present Secretary of State. I shall refer to those devices in a few moments, and I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on finding a good opportunity to argue a case on behalf of a firm in his constituency.

One of my concerns about our general approach to speeding is that it too often appears to be unrelated to an assessment of the risk. We have argued for lower speed limits to reduce accidents in certain areas—close to schools, for example. At the same time, in my judgment, few things do more to bring traffic laws into disrepute than rigidly enforced 24-hour limits of 50 mph on a four or six-lane dual carriageway. Given the good safety record of many motorways and trunk roads, it is surely time to consider raising the upper limit to 80 mph in certain places.

Tim Loughton: I want to return to the issue of the big reduction in the number of traffic police, which has gone largely unnoticed. I agree with my hon. Friend that we need lower speed limits, such as exist in 20 mph home zones, in school areas and residential areas with elderly people, of which there are many in my constituency—but part of the problem is that they are not enforceable. The traffic police are not there to enforce those speed limits, just as they are not there to advise on traffic safety. This is not just a question of their being there on motorbikes with speed cameras; it is also about their advising on the setting of speed limits. The traffic police are no longer there. I endorse a more flexible approach, but that can work only without such a ridiculous reliance on the broad-brush approach to speed cameras, at the expense of experienced police traffic professionals.

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. There is a well-founded suspicion that the Government strategy hitherto has been to encourage a proliferation of speed cameras to conceal the damage inflicted by cuts of between a quarter and a third in the number of operational traffic officers. As he says, that makes it much harder to introduce the more common-sense, risk-based and flexible approach to speed limits that we believe would go a long way to promoting safety and to winning public acceptance. A more flexible policy is the key, and the changes that I have suggested should be introduced in the context of a review of all speed limits.

It is well known that we share the concerns of those people who believe that in too many areas speed cameras are being used for revenue-raising purposes, and that they are not sited to achieve the maximum reduction in accidents. Because of that, once in government we will carry out an audit of all speed cameras to make sure that they are positioned where their impact will genuinely contribute to greater safety. Meanwhile, we should like two changes to be made to the Bill.

The first change relates to clause 17, to which the hon. Member for North-East Derbyshire (Mr. Barnes) referred. It deals with devices that detect the presence of equipment used to assess the speed of motor vehicles, and with other devices that jam that equipment. I draw a distinction between those two types of device, and have no objection to the proposed measures against devices that jam. However, devices that detect the presence of speed equipment belong to a different category. If the Government believe their claims that speed cameras are sited so that they slow down traffic in places where accidents are likely to occur, it is clearly helpful for drivers to have advance warning of them, as they will then approach high-risk sections of road at a moderate speed. The only reason to outlaw detection devices is that the number of drivers who might get caught for speeding would be reduced, with the result that the revenue generated by speed cameras would be cut.

Mrs. Ellman: Will the hon. Gentleman explain his hostility to speed cameras? Independent evidence shows that they can reduce the number of accidents by about 40 per cent?

Mr. Yeo: As I have said already, my proposal is that we should audit the position of speed cameras. Where they cut accidents, we are delighted about the contribution that they make, but I remain unpersuaded that every speed camera is sited in such a position. The proposal in clause 17 to outlaw devices that can detect speed cameras exposes the true intentions behind the positioning of many of them.

Another aspect of the Bill is relevant in this respect. The Bill provides opportunities to make sure that speed cameras promote safety. We could table a new clause to abolish the so-called safety camera partnerships, which serve no real purpose. If the speed cameras were operated by traffic police, it is more likely that they would be situated where they would genuinely prevent accidents. It would also mean that a higher proportion of the money paid in fines would be used by the traffic police to promote road safety in general.

Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): Those of us who have followed these debates will recall that the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson), challenged one of the predecessors of the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) to give examples of speed cameras being sited in places where they would raise money rather than promote road safety. I challenge the hon. Gentleman now to give the House an example of a speed camera that has been placed in a certain spot just to raise money.

Mr. Yeo: That will be one of the purposes of an audit. As I have stressed throughout, my approach is pragmatic. I want the siting of cameras to be based on evidence. If the hon. Gentleman wants me to search the country for examples of cameras placed solely to raise money, I have no doubt that my e-mail would be jammed within 24 hours with messages from people offering such examples, and I should be happy to forward any such messages to him.

The benefits of a new approach to speed cameras would be enjoyed not just by responsible, safe drivers. The police would be pleased as well. The Police Federation has pointed out that current policy on the use of cameras has damaged relations between the police and drivers. The police would like to see a balance between automatic devices such as cameras, and properly trained police—a balance that we wholeheartedly support. They point out that speed cameras do not detect drivers who have been drinking, uninsured drivers, under-age or unlicensed drivers. If our roads are genuinely to be made safer, traffic police cannot be replaced by cameras, as the Government seem to have tried to do in the past few years.

Mr. Miller: Cameras do detect drivers who are breaking the law. Surely the hon. Gentleman does not accept that those drivers should be breaking the law.

Mr. Yeo: I am not suggesting that at all. I should like drivers to be deterred from breaking the law, not just detected when they do so. I come back to the point about clause 17. I am puzzled as to why the Government think it is a good idea to outlaw a device that might encourage a driver to obey the law.

I shall move on to the topic of mobile phones.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Yeo: No, I must make progress. I am mindful of the understandable concern expressed by the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) in a point of order at the start of the debate.

Clause 22 as drafted has the effect, in relation to mobile phones, of introducing a more onerous regime for motorists than for cyclists. Superficially, that may seem to be justified. A car can do a great deal more damage to pedestrians and other cars than a bicycle can, but that does not mean that cyclists do no damage at all. The growing frequency with which cyclists ignore red traffic lights or cycle along pavements means that for pedestrians, especially vulnerable pedestrians such as children, elderly people and disabled people, cyclists can be a danger. There is no logical reason why the provisions of clause 22 should not apply to cyclists as well as to motorists. It is questionable whether the clause is necessary, given that the existing law provides the opportunity to prosecute drivers who use their phones while driving.

Another aspect of this part of the Bill concerns me. No distinction seems to be drawn between using a mobile phone while driving and using a mobile phone while sitting in the driver's seat of a stationary car whose engine is switched off. I do not see why, in the latter circumstance, drivers should be exposed to the risk of prosecution. We will pursue the point in Committee.

Rob Marris: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Yeo: For the last time.

Rob Marris: May I suggest to the hon. Gentleman that rather than having a go at cyclists, who cause very few accidents, he would do better to consider the research that indicates that using a hands-free mobile phone can distract a driver to the point where they are driving as though they had the legal limit for alcohol in their blood? Mobile phones are an important issue, but the hon. Gentleman should address the issue of hands-free mobile phones being used by drivers while driving, rather than taking a cheap shot at cyclists, who cause very few accidents. A cyclist using a mobile phone is foolish and much more likely to damage themselves than to damage anyone else. That is not the case with a driver using a mobile phone, who is much more likely to injure someone else than themselves.

Mr. Yeo: I do not know how often the hon. Gentleman walks round London—

Rob Marris: I cycle.

Mr. Yeo: Fine. After the close of business in the House, I frequently walk home to my flat, which is about a mile. I do not think I ever complete that journey without being nearly knocked over by a bicycle at least two or three times. If the cyclist is using a mobile phone, they are even more likely to knock over a pedestrian. I do not believe that cyclists are universally responsible and remain off the pavement. There are about three traffic lights on that same journey, and it is unusual not to see a cyclist going through a red light. That is a danger to pedestrians. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) may say that cars are more dangerous. I acknowledged that before I made any reference to cyclists.

As I have said, the Bill contains several desirable provisions and for that reason we shall not divide the House on Second Reading. We believe that the Bill can be improved and we shall seek to make those improvements in Committee. It falls short of being a comprehensive strategy for cutting the number of casualties in road accidents but, given that we are probably at most only a dozen weeks from the start of the general election campaign, a more comprehensive strategy can be eagerly anticipated on the election of a Conservative Government—a happy day for the nation, not long delayed. In the meantime, we shall do what we can, in co-operation with the Government and other parties who are ready to adopt our pragmatic, risk-based, common-sense approach to these important issues, to restore a downward trend in the number of people killed on Britain's roads.

Several hon. Members rose—

Madam Deputy Speaker (Sylvia Heal): Order. I remind all Members that Mr. Speaker has imposed a 12-minute limit on all Back-Bench speeches.

4.35 pm

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): There can be few areas of life where we confront as many risks as those faced by pedestrians, cyclists and even motorists in their day-to-day contact with traffic.

It is strange that when death comes calling in what we persist in describing as traffic accidents, it is a very lonely thing for each family involved. Although so many people are killed every day, traffic-connected deaths are, somehow or other, seen as individual incidents, and the families who suffer the trauma and agony of having to come to terms with what has happened to them frequently feel completely isolated. They cannot understand how frequent such a terrible set of circumstances is in our day-to-day life. So when the House considers road traffic legislation we must remember that it is not a small part of the daily life of our people; it is something that has an impact on children and adults across the board.

I know of no other area where we would accept the death of 10 people every day. Day after day after day, we kill 10 people on our roads—quite apart from those we seriously injure—yet there are still arguments in the House about the methods to restrict those who do not respect the necessary laws of the land, which are there to protect our people.

I welcome any Bill, such as this one, which specifically sets out things that will help us to improve the safety of our children and our people. If I criticise it and ask for more, it is not because I believe that it has been wrongly brought before the House, but because the fact that as a society we do not seem to have got our head around the enormity of what we do to our people every day concerns me so very deeply.

David Taylor: My hon. Friend refers to daily occurrences. One of the most moving and traumatic telephone calls that I have received recently was from the mother of a young man who was killed a few weeks ago by an articulated lorry, in a pedestrian accident on a fast road near Ashby-de-la-Zouch. She and his family simply cannot understand the present state of the law, which allows the charge against the driver to be restricted merely to one of careless driving, with a few points on his licence and a few pounds off his bank balance. They have had a son removed from their lives for ever.

Mrs. Dunwoody: That is exactly the sort of problem that we should be addressing urgently.

The Select Committee on Transport looked carefully at the Bill, because we thought that there were several straightforward questions that the House should ask. Is road traffic legislation correct and appropriate? Do the police have the right priorities in their attitude towards the whole question of policing traffic? Is there sufficient priority in legislation for the needs of pedestrians and cyclists? Could we do more to deal with dangerous drivers before they become lethal? Are we convinced that we need changes in responsibilities that will, almost inevitably, impinge on the way that we police our roads? Are we sure that those priorities are correct?

My Committee looked carefully across the board. We found many good things in the Bill, but we are also concerned. Inevitably, the House of Commons ought to lead on such a subject. Frequently, when we frame laws, we give a general impression to the public about how we ought to deal with death and destruction that comes in the form of a road traffic accident.

If we make it clear that we are utterly against such developments and that the decisions that we take about management tools, such as speed cameras, are meant to cut deaths and if we make it even clearer that the law ought to be enforced very strongly against those who cause death by dangerous driving, we ought to have the support of the general public.

If, however, we frame legislation that appears somehow or other to underplay the importance of deaths in road traffic accidents and if we run campaigns that, for various populist reasons, seem to say that speed cameras are not instruments of care and protection but something that ought to be destroyed, the general public will think either that we are not serious or that we do not understand the full implications of what we are doing. So my Committee was concerned about what is missing from the Bill as much as what is in it.

We have already heard from many hon. Members about death by dangerous driving. I am not a lawyer, and I am prepared to believe that there are real difficulties in framing certain charges, but the reality is that if someone has lost a member of their family because of someone driving a car, they do not believe that justice has been done if that person receives either a small fine or some kind of restriction on their licence, and there is no genuine acceptance of the fact that that death was not only unnecessary, but unwarranted and indefensible.

Mr. Stinchcombe: My hon. Friend mentions the offence of death by dangerous driving. Is she astonished that there is not even an offence known to English law of causing death by careless or negligent driving?

Mrs. Dunwoody: Absolutely astonished. That was one of the things that the Committee looked at very carefully—other members of the Committee will want to make such points strongly later—but the points that I want to make are about policy direction as much as anything else.

I believe the Secretary of State to be not only highly efficient, but very caring. He has demonstrated, time and again, that his legislative priorities are exactly the right ones. I therefore hope that when I say very strongly that I believe that his colleagues in the Home Office are not behaving in the same responsible manner, he will understand that I expect of him a commitment to chase them very hard about what is happening.

My Committee was told that an overall review of road traffic law is taking place in the Home Office, that a considerable amount of work is being done and that we must wait for the extension of road traffic legislation before the Home Office can produce measured conclusions. I therefore ask the Secretary of State why we are still waiting a year after we were promised the Halliday report. Where is that report? Given the high public profile of the Home Office, which seems to concern itself with every aspect of our lives, why are we still waiting for that report to be published and brought to the House of Commons?

If we are serious about road traffic legislation, that report is one of the things that should have been produced already. If the report has not been published, why not? If the report has been published, has the Department for Transport seen it? Was it allowed to look at the complex legal issues and has its advice been sought in relation to the report's conclusions? It is extraordinary that the Home Office is not working much more closely with the lead Department on road safety because such things will make the difference.

That brings me to the specific point of enforcement. It is essential that the Home Office realises that the failure to put road traffic among the core responsibilities of chief constables has meant that its importance is unevenly stressed across the United Kingdom. Some chief constables accept that legislation is vital and that the activity has to be regarded as seriously as other forms of criminal activity. Unfortunately, chief constables in some counties do not regard that activity as having the same implications as other activities.

The Select Committee was very concerned with the evidence and the responses we received from not only Home Office Ministers, but those who felt generally that there was no clear line of responsibility and that the pressure to take the matter seriously did not exist. If individual forces do not provide the people to police our roads and do not insist on the subject being taken seriously, we will see the results in terms of accidents. It is clearly a matter of cause and effect.

We have been given a long and, if the Secretary of State will forgive me, somewhat imprecise series of answers to the questions that we posed in our report's conclusion. I am still worried. Co-operation between the two Departments has not been demonstrated and there is no clear evidence of the urgency and targeting that should concern us. It is clear from our responses that most enforcement activity is carried out in 30 mph urban areas. The "Transport Statistics Bulletin" on vehicle speeds shows that the percentage of cars exceeding the speed limit reduced from 69 per cent. to 58 per cent. in 2003. In other words, more than half of all cars in urban areas are speeding. By doing so, they are vastly increasing the risk to pedestrians and other motorists. How can we accept a statistic like that? How can we still, in 2004, be debating the same questions over and over again?

Even today, the Opposition gave us a classic example of the muddle that exists. On the one hand, we appear to be saying that we want law enforcement, but on the other we are saying that we do not want to do anything that upsets the populace or the powerful motoring lobby.

As a nation, we have to clarify what we want in our minds. While television programmes, motoring magazines and individual articles constantly emphasise that speed is clever, macho and directly connected with the male persona—only alpha males know about speed—we are inculcating in our young men, and often in our young people generally, a very dangerous thought. We should be saying, "Yes, cars are important. Yes, you need them. Yes, you can use them. But they are killing machines." The damage done by tonnes of steel and glass hitting a body does not encourage us to believe that the subject should be treated lightly.

Our report will ask for many changes. I hope that the Standing Committee accepts some of them. If the Government are serious about death and destruction, this is the moment to have targeted, tough and explicit legislation.

4.48 pm

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): I want to pick up on the point made by the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) about the connection between speed and the male persona. An interesting article in Aberdeen's The Press & Journal yesterday—a paper I doubt she would have occasion to read—had the disturbing report that female drivers are starting to outweigh their male counterparts in terms of speeding. The problem, to which she is right to draw attention, is not just relevant to one sex, but runs across the strands of young people, be they male or female.

The United Kingdom has a good road safety record. In fact, it is one of the best in the world. However, as we heard, there are still 10 deaths each day on our roads. In 2002, the last year for which figures are available, 302,605 people were injured on the roads, 3,431 were killed and 35,976 were seriously injured. As has been said, with any other mode of transport there would be a public scandal, and we can certainly do much to reduce the total. A number of measures can and should be introduced, including many in the Bill, although, as I shall explain, there are some serious omissions. My colleagues and I are happy to give the Bill our full support on Second Reading. We will give it our general and broad support in Committee, but I hope that some of my suggestions will be taken on board.

The UK generally has a good road safety record, but, interestingly, it masks areas of poor performance. For example, in 2002, 179 children were killed, 58 per cent. of whom were pedestrians, so the UK's child pedestrian record is one of the worst in western Europe. Two thirds of accidents in which people are killed or seriously injured take place on roads where the speed limit is 40 mph or less. It is worth noting that 60 per cent. of accidents occur on rural roads. There are worrying signs that positive trends that have been moving downwards for a number a years, including drink-driving, are now either static or increasing. The UK's generally good record can be improved through targeted action, so the Government are right to introduce the Bill.

Clause 1 allows Ministers in England and the National Assembly for Wales to fund road safety initiatives. That is a sensible power that will do much to improve the situation, and it is already available in Scotland. A substantial contribution to road safety can be made through road engineering and safety schemes as well as enforcement measures. We therefore support the initiative.

I have considerable concerns about graduated penalties, particularly for speeding. It is a long-established principle in British justice that punishment varies with the severity of the crime, so I do not object to the principle of graduated penalties or punishment. I am, however, concerned that the structure proposed in the consultation paper published last September ignores the outcome of the offence, particularly for speeding in towns and villages. An armed burglar receives a more severe sentence than an unarmed burglar not necessarily because of what they have done but because of what might have happened if they met someone while committing the crime. Two thirds of accidents in which people are killed or seriously injured take place where the speed limit is below 40 mph.

In areas with a 30 mph speed limit, the consultation proposed a lower penalty of two points and £40 for speeds of up to 39 mph. The chances of surviving the impact of a car travelling at 35 mph are half those of surviving the impact of a car travelling at 30 mph. I am therefore concerned that if the penalty were accepted for speeds between 30 and 40 mph the House would send the wrong message, suggesting that modest speeding in towns is acceptable. By contrast, the difference in outcomes when cars are travelling at 70 or 80 mph on the motorway is less stark. To a certain extent, the speed limits on motorways and dual carriageways, which are specifically engineered for faster speeds, are a compromise between our desire to travel quickly and our desire to travel safely while having regard to the environmental consequences of higher speeds. However, where there is mixed use of the road by pedestrians, cyclists, horse riders and others, particularly in built-up areas, the balance must shift from the car and the driver and towards pedestrians, who the suffer the effects. Observance of the 30 mph speed limit is critical in reducing injury and death, and I hope that the Government take that point on board.

Almost every week, I travel up the A9 on several occasions. I have followed cars driven at 50 mph by respectable middle-aged people—people such as me—who do not slow down that much when they come to towns. I do 30 mph as they whizz away. Many middle-aged drivers do not understand the difference between impacts at 30 mph, 35 mph and 40 mph. They would think that one were a speeder if one passed them at 60 mph on the open road, but they happily go through towns at 35 mph or 40 mph. That point is extremely important. Although we do not oppose graduation in principle, our support in Committee will depend on the detail of the likely outcome being fleshed out—we have grave difficultly in accepting a two-point penalty for offences up to 39 mph.

I support moves to ban detection and avoidance devices. It is crazy to have a law, yet allow the use of a device to stop detection. I used to know people who fitted such devices to their cars, and they were not people who would inadvertently drive a little bit fast. They actually wanted to drive a great deal faster than the legal limit and knowingly to break the limit. I am sorry to say that they are the most likely people to buy such devices, which I have no qualms in seeing being made illegal.

Clauses 11 to 15 deal with drink-driving. We have come a long way since the introduction of the breathalyser. I obtained my licence at about the time when the first breathalysers were introduced, when, if someone was caught drink-driving, people would say, "Oh dear. You poor fellow. What bad luck."

Most sensible drivers—the vast majority of the population—now accept that drink-driving is a dangerous and serious crime. Together with sound enforcement, that change in attitude has seen a steady decline in drink-driving and drink-related accidents. However, it is worrying that that trend appears to have stopped and even to have reversed, with figures showing a rise in drink-related injuries and deaths over recent years. It has already been said that the rise has been accompanied by a fall in tests undertaken by police and the number of police who are on the road and who are available to conduct tests, although I must state that the percentage of tests failed has risen too. I cannot believe that a relationship does not exist between lower police numbers, fewer tests and higher drink-related accident rates.

This summer, I discussed drink-driving with the area commander in my constituency, who pointed out that one of the greatest worries is that many drink-drivers are not young people but middle-aged males. Again, the problem is not that those people have one drink too many, but that they consume as much as twice the limit. The trend by which people who should know better commit seriously-over-the-limit offences is very disturbing.

Mr. Hopkins: To reinforce the point that the hon. Gentleman is making, may I point out that when random breath-testing was introduced in Australia, the police suddenly found that they were catching many more middle-aged people who were used to drinking and driving—the people who should have been caught but were not?

John Thurso: A week ago, I had an interesting discussion with my mother. She said, "Oh darling, I am so glad—I have now been told how many glasses of wine I can drink and it's safe to drive." I said, "Mama, you cannot do it like that, because there are different percentage rates of alcohol, and glass sizes are different. If you want to be really safe, don't do it all. If you happen to be just down the road and have half a glass, that's fine, but don't go any further than that." That is the problem. Middle-aged people think that the limit equals two or three glasses of wine, a couple of pints or three whiskies, but do not realise that depending on the metabolism of the person, the percentage by volume of the alcohol and the size of the glass, one drink may put them over the limit. Really, one does not drink and drive.

Although there is considerable merit in the proposal to reduce the permitted blood-alcohol level from 80 mg to 50 mg, there remains a big problem with people who are well over the limit, and we need to target them. The measures in the Bill are clearly sensible and will definitely help. However, we need to look again at the question of enforcement, as there is no substitute for traffic police officers who are able to stop people, make random searches and o ensure that offenders are kept off the roads.

Much in the Bill is sensible and deserves our support, and I do not intend to touch on all those aspects. I have reservations about some of the details, such as the fees to be charged for recalled licences, but those can happily wait until Committee. I am more concerned about notable omissions from the Bill that I should like to be included. One partial omission relates to what can be done about uninsured drivers, who are a major danger on our roads. They cost a great deal in terms of money and lives, and create immense misery. That issue deserves to be tackled. Although clause 39 will help, the Greenaway report made several recommendations that would have been of great value had they been included in the Bill and would have received support from all over the House. I hope that during the passage of the Bill the Government, perhaps with the aid of the Select Committee on Transport, will introduce further measures to combat that particular evil.

Another omission—I will not say that it is less important, but perhaps less severe—is that of measures to make standard ECE 104 reflective tape for lorries mandatory. The Secretary of State said that he is unaware of the evidence on that, but I have compelling evidence that shows:

"The introduction of retro-reflective tape on HGVs in the USA reduced side and near impact collisions in 'dark-not-lighted' conditions by 41 per cent.

The US Federal Highways Administration found that the ratio of savings to costs is such that every £100 invested . . . results in a reduced economic cost to society of £162.

Research by The University of Darmstadt found that 37 per cent. of all side collisions with trucks at night occurred because they were seen too late."

I should like to raise that evidence in Committee, and I hope that the Government will at least consider it.

Another example is the retro-fitting of bull bars. Many Members have commented on bull bars, which are completely unnecessary in this country. I can think of no circumstances, not even on a farm—or, dare I say it, an estate—where bull bars are a necessity. The retro-fitting of bull bars greatly increases the vehicle's danger in the case of impact with a pedestrian, and I encourage the Government to insert a clause to ban it.

I have highlighted another problem, which although not grave is none the less important, to the Under-Secretary in correspondence. Several local authorities would like to be able to put up repeater signs in 30 mph limits, especially in rural areas where long distances may be travelled with some doubt about the limit. Local authorities of all hues and persuasions have asked me why they cannot erect repeater signs. According to the Under-Secretary's replies, they are not permitted to do so by law. Perhaps we could examine that.

Perhaps the most important point is framing a charge of causing death by negligent driving. An interesting debate was held in Westminster Hall at the beginning of September in which the subject was raised. Like many hon. Members, I am fully aware of the difficulty of framing such legislation but I have heard pleas for it from so many hon. Members and so many of our constituents that I believe it is incumbent on us as legislators to frame and introduce such a law. Again, I hope that the Government will be inclined to consider that.

I have a final suggestion. I doubt whether we can include it in the Bill, but I believe that it would make a difference. Several speakers have said that if the accident rate—perhaps it should be more properly called the incident rate—applied to any other industry or mode of transport, we would be up in arms. All other modes of transport have specific units that investigate accidents. We should consider establishing a dedicated road accident investigation unit so that we could understand centrally what caused each accident and learn and apply the lessons. That is probably too complicated to include in the Bill but I should like the Government at least to think about it.

The Bill contains many sound provisions. As I said, we are happy to support it on Second Reading and we shall support it in Committee, where we should like to make some changes. I believe that many of the changes that I propose would find support from hon. Members in other parties. We all ultimately have an identical concern: we want fewer people killed and safer roads.

5.7 pm

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax) (Lab): As joint chair of the all-party group on road safety, I am pleased about the Bill, which contains many welcome provisions. The Government's road safety strategy over the years has been progressive. It is worth repeating the Secretary of State's opening remark that we have one of the best road safety records in the world. However, it is essential to recognise that far more can be done.

In 2003, the number of people killed and seriously injured fell to 37,215. Although I say "fell", it remains a huge number, yet it is 22 per cent. below the 1994–98 average. Nevertheless, the figure represents human beings who have been seriously damaged or are no longer with us. The number of children killed or seriously injured fell to 4,100, which is 40 per cent. below the 1994–98 average. However, the figures still mean, as my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) said, that 10 people, some of them children, die every day on our roads. Imagine the outcry if that happened on trains or aeroplanes. Although we have a good record and the Government's strategy has been progressive, a big problem remains.

I do not want to go into too much detail about drink-driving because many other hon. Members have spoken about that. There had been advances until recently, but we have now reached a plateau and we might even go in the other direction. We should remember that 500 people a year die because of drink-driving. That is a shocking statistic. I am pleased that the Bill will give police new powers to take drink-driving evidence at the roadside. As the Secretary of State said, that closes a loophole and we are all pleased about that.

I wish that the Government had gone a little further, however, and introduced measures to bring the UK into line with most of the rest of Europe on drink-drive limits. I disagree with the hon. Members who said that there is no need for a reduction in those limits. I agree with Brake, the road safety charity, which is arguing for the limits to be brought down to the same level as those in Sweden. That would be 20 mg of alcohol per 100 ml of blood—if we went for the European average, it would be 50 mg—and I think that that would be an acceptable level. The most up-to-date law on this is the Railways and Transport Safety Act 2003, which makes provision for a limit of 20 mg of alcohol per 100 ml of blood for train drivers and pilots, and I do not see the logic of its provisions not applying to road users. I hope that the Government will reconsider this matter. Having said that, I congratulate them on some of the measures in the Bill.

I would like briefly to refer to Brake again, because I have been involved in its campaign, "Watch out, there's a kid about". In 2003, the number of deaths on foot of children aged between eight and 19—the age range in which children use the roads on foot without being accompanied by an adult—went up by 26 per cent. to 110, compared with 87 the previous year. We also should note that, for children aged between five and 14, road deaths are the second biggest killer after cancer, so we should take this issue seriously. Again, I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich on this matter. Brake recommends speed limits of no higher than 20 mph—and, where appropriate, 10 mph—around schools and in residential and built-up areas. I do not know why the Government do not accept that recommendation. A child on foot has a 95 per cent. chance of surviving a crash in which the car is travelling at 20 mph. That chance dwindles to almost none when the speed is increased to 40 mph.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: One measure that has been very successful in many areas is the introduction of the flashing "20 mph" signs that teachers switch on when children are coming and going around a school. Perhaps we should try to persuade the Government to introduce that system across all areas of the country.

Mrs. Mahon: Absolutely. I ask the Government to consider that, because we would all agree that the prize of fewer child deaths would be worth while.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): Unfortunately, I was attending a Committee when the Secretary of State made his speech; otherwise I would have spoken in this debate. The hon. Lady and I jointly chair the all-party group on road safety, along with one of the Liberal Democrat MPs. One of the things that I have tried to impress on the Government relates to the length of time that British summer time lasts. There is an increase of child road deaths in the winter months and, if the Government will not consider abolishing turning back the hour, I would like them to consider reducing the period of time involved. At the moment, we are on winter time for four or five months, but even a reduction of that period would have significant consequences, if the Government will not go the whole way and abolish it completely.

Mrs. Mahon: The hon. Gentleman makes a very good point, and I hope that the Minister was listening to him.

The Bill contains proposals to deal with fatigue-related accidents, which account for about 20 per cent. of deaths on motorways. I have been working on this issue with a small working group involving people from both the medical side and the road transport side. I welcome the inclusion in the Bill of measures to mitigate driver fatigue through the provision of picnic sites for motorway users and the better enforcement of EU rules on drivers' hours. According to the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency, up to one fifth of accidents on motorways, and about 300 fatalities a year, may be caused by drivers falling asleep at the wheel. We should take that statistic very seriously.

Although the Bill includes measures to address driver fatigue, I am worried that it does nothing to tackle the serious problem of drivers with undiagnosed or untreated sleep disorders. About 770,000 people in the UK have a sleep disorder, many hundreds, if not thousands, of whom are driving on our roads today. People with untreated obstructive sleep apnoea—a prevalent sleep disorder—are up to 12 times more likely that others to have a road accident. I have tried to take that up with the Department of Health, but the Under-Secretary of State for Health, my hon. Friend the Member for South Thanet (Dr. Ladyman), did not seem very interested, so I hope that Transport Ministers will talk to him and perhaps get a bit further than I did.

The Royal College of Physicians has pointed out that there is an especially high incidence of sleep apnoea among professional drivers, as the condition is common in middle-aged men who are slightly overweight. A study of 35 professional drivers at one depot found that nine of them were at extreme or high risk of the condition and that four others were at risk of other sleep disorders. Although the Bill addresses sleepy, yet otherwise healthy, drivers, I am concerned that it misses an important opportunity to tackle the worrying problem of accidents caused by drivers with undiagnosed or untreated sleep disorders.

I shall cite one example. In August 2003, John Stevens died in a road accident while driving to work. He was 41, with a wife and two young sons. As a motorway roadworks technical manager, John's job involved driving long distances and he was an experienced driver. In the year leading up to the fatal accident, John had become progressively sleepier during the daytime, despite sleeping for seven hours each night. He did not think that the sleepiness could be due to a medical condition, even when he suffered a minor accident after falling asleep at the wheel. His employers eventually insisted on a medical check and he sought help.

John's general practitioner diagnosed sleep apnoea and referred him to a clinic for diagnosis and treatment. Almost all patients who need medical treatment go on a long waiting list, and three months before John's appointment, he crashed his car with fatal consequences. That demonstrates just one example of the devastating effect of the lack of awareness of sleep disorders in the UK and the importance of speedy diagnosis and treatment.

I recently met Professor John Stradling, who told me that there is a currently a seven-month waiting list for diagnosed patients to receive treatment for sleep apnoea, so at any one time hundreds of people could be waiting for treatment or diagnosis. A joined-up response from the Department for Transport and the Department of Health is required to tackle the problems caused by sleep disorders, because the number of people affected is not small. Such people are ticking time-bombs on our roads and motorways. I urge the Government to seize the opportunity to address the matter in their proposals on driver sleepiness. Edinburgh university sleep centre puts the cost of treating 500 sleep apnoea patients for five years at £400,000, yet the cost of accidents caused by the same 500 untreated patients over the same period is put at £5.3 million, so I hope that the fact that I have raised the matter will encourage the Department for Transport to examine it. Additionally, under criminal law, it is no defence that a driver had an accident while asleep. The presumption is that the driver should have known that he or she was likely to have fallen asleep and thus not have driven. That is an unfair presumption to make about people with sleep disorders who do not know that they have such a medical condition.

I thank the Government once again because the Bill contains good measures and they have a good record on road safety. Important matters have been addressed and I hope that the Minister will take seriously the suggestions that hon. Members and I raise during the debate.

Mr. David Atkinson (Bournemouth, East) (Con): My constituents will welcome much that is proposed in the Bill. In Bournemouth, in 2003, more than 20 per cent. fewer road casualties occurred than in 2002. That is a considerable decline, which will undoubtedly be enhanced by some of the measures contained in the Bill. We have seen such declines previously, however, only to see them equally dramatically reversed a year or two later. The fact remains that the average number of serious and fatal casualties in Bournemouth has been the same over the past 10 years—103 citizens killed or seriously injured on our roads every year. That means 100 partnerships and families temporarily or permanently deprived of a loved one because of carelessness or irresponsibility on our roads. I am therefore encouraged that all parties in the House are approaching this Bill in a constructive spirit of support.

All of us have received representations from interested parties expressing concern at some of the measures in the Bill and proposing amendments to improve it. Such representations apply to the range of points and fines available through the fixed-penalty system, on which I read the article by the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) in The Times yesterday with great interest. I must declare an interest because of my current six penalty points for speeding, in which I suspect that I am not alone in the House. I was sorry to read that one hon. Friend has recently been banned from driving—there but for the grace of God . . .

I agree with those who say that the current penalty point system needs to be revised. Of course, I do not object to the provision of safety cameras provided that they are placed at obvious and known places of accidents caused by speeding vehicles. We have been reassured by the Government that that is the case, and I hope that the Minister will repeat that in his wind-up today. I welcome the commitment given by my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) that the next Government will audit the current provision of safety cameras to re-justify their location.

There is no doubt that safety cameras influence most of us to keep our speed within the law. It is not so much the minimum fine of £60 but the awful prospect of being deprived of driving, and thus, in many cases, of livelihood, which concentrates the mind wonderfully. I suggest that most of us do not exceed the speed limit deliberately, and that we do so neither purposely nor excessively: for example, when temporary cameras are put in place on roads that are being repaired and that are not clearly indicated. That was the case when I incurred both my penalties. That is no excuse, but is unfortunate. I therefore agree with the proposed variable, graduated system of penalty points, which differentiates levels of speed. In addition, I suggest that the fixed minimum fine be raised from £60 to £100. That would be fairer, and also effective.

I welcome the enforcement of legislation against uninsured drivers in the Bill. The Royal Automobile Club tells us that the current average penalty for driving without insurance is £150, which is far too lenient to discourage such extremely serious and irresponsible behaviour. The current cynical perception of many uninsured drivers is that there are not enough police patrolling our roads to apprehend them, and, of course, they will avoid on-street parking where they can. Better detection, as the Bill proposes, together with higher penalties and proper enforcement would change that perception and the practice; nor should foreign drivers be exempt.

[Mr. David Atkinson]

I agree completely with the provision of motorway rest areas, which will contribute greatly to the reduction in fatigue-related accidents, but surely we do not need to pilot the provision of such rest areas, because of their obvious effectiveness where they already exist. The experience of the French péage motorways and trunk roads where such rest areas are frequent is sufficient to propose to the Highways Agency that it should proceed with their introduction on our roads forthwith.

I welcome the proposed enforcement of measures against foreign drivers committing offences in the United Kingdom. Such measures should be the same throughout the European Union. While I will always support the right of a national parliament to introduce laws and standards to reflect and respond to the situation in our constituencies, the whole point of the European Community is to ensure and enforce minimum standards in every state. Such a policy need not be restricted—in the context of road safety—to the 25 European Union member states; it could apply to all 46 member states of the Council of Europe, perhaps through an appropriate convention. I look forward to an assurance from the Minister that a level playing field will be introduced throughout the EU.

Mr. Lazarowicz: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that he will be in favour of a reduction of the drink-driving limit to the 50 mg level that is normal in most other EU countries?

Mr. Atkinson: I have not mentioned that issue because I have no clear views on how the position can be improved, and I shall therefore not respond to the hon. Gentleman's invitation.

I welcome clause 22, which deals with the use of hand-held mobile phones. Most of us see that totally unacceptable practice being engaged in all too frequently by drivers trying to steer through traffic. It can cause them to hit another car, or a pedestrian or cyclist. Such accidents are unavoidable, and they must not be allowed to happen. The same applies to accidents and near-misses at night involving cars and bikes without lights. It seems to me that too many cyclists nowadays do not display lights at night. They are putting themselves at needless risk, yet it remains the motorist's responsibility to avoid them. Any programme to improve road safety must include a relentless policy of zero tolerance by the police of cyclists who ride without lights at night.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: Could that not be tightened up by means of the insurance system? If those without lights were not insured, would that not make them act?

Mr. Atkinson: I am not sure that many cyclists seek to insure themselves. It is an idea, but I am not certain that there is a great deal of worth in it.

In the context of road safety generally and the Bill in particular, let me stress the need for ever greater education and training, especially for young people. The encouragement of personal responsibility among primary school-age children as pedestrians, cyclists and passengers will contribute to a generational shift in attitudes to road safety as those children grow up and become car drivers themselves.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): Should not young motor cyclists be given much more training? Sadly, in the last 12 months many young people have died on our roads in Cornwall. Training of young motor cyclists, and the checking of that training, are very important.

Mr. Atkinson: I entirely agree. No doubt the Minister heard the hon. Gentleman's suggestion, and perhaps he will respond when he winds up the debate.

A few years ago, a road safety initiative by Bournemouth university graduates, called the junior citizens programme, demonstrated that children who received the training that I have described retained more knowledge than those who did not. That led to the establishment in Wallisdown, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Sir John Butterfill), of the Streetwise safety centre, sponsored by local authorities and the Dorset police. It is a life-sized indoor village where people of all ages can discuss how to stay safe and what to do in an emergency. They can learn about accident prevention in the home, at work and on the roads, and much else besides.

The centre is working directly to meet the target set by the Government's road safety strategy to reduce the number of people killed or seriously injured on our roads by 2010. More than 65,000 people have visited the centre since it opened in January 1999. My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West is a trustee of its partnership. I pay tribute to his personal interest in it, and especially to the excellent work of its manager, Alison Curtis. That unique centre is undertaking valuable pioneering work in education and training in road safety, which can only support and complement the Bill. I have no hesitation in drawing it to the attention of the House, and commending it as an example of best practice to be emulated by local and police authorities throughout the country.

5.29 pm

Mr. Paul Stinchcombe (Wellingborough) (Lab): Thank you very much, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to make a brief contribution to this debate. Let me state at the outset that I not only welcome the Bill; I believe it to be vital.

We live in a society, and an age, in love with the car. We all know how powerful the road lobby is. It can bring the country to a standstill over the price of petrol; it can fill our postbags with letters of disgust whenever someone is caught breaking the law speeding. I do not say that by way of an attack on the motorist—I am one—but in simple recognition of the way in which most of us live today. In rural areas, the car is often the only effective means of transport. For many in urban areas, it remains absolutely essential to our work. In some ways, perhaps, the car is even a badge of personal freedom. For many of our youngest drivers, for example, the car marks their coming of age—an outward sign of their adulthood. The first driving lesson might be a cherished present from mum and dad; for some, their first car might even be the reward for getting through the test. For them, the car is literally and metaphorically a rite of passage.

But along with that comes a big responsibility. A car, however beautifully designed, is not a comfortable air-conditioned extension of one's front room. For all of us, the car is a potentially lethal weapon that not only can kill but does kill. It killed my teenage cousin. It kills 10 people in this country every day, and 3,500 every year. The Bill will help to reduce that number, thereby saving lives and reducing grief. That is why I welcome it today—as we all should—and warmly.

However, I do not welcome the Bill unconditionally. Although it is good, it can be improved in several ways, one of which I wish to discuss. We need to rewrite the law concerning cases in which bad driving causes death. At the moment, a wide range of charges are available to deal with those who drive below the standard that the criminal law requires, yet at the heart of that law there is a yawning gap: the complete absence of the offence of causing death by careless or negligent driving when not under the influence of drink or drugs.

The extent of that gap is readily apparent from the sentences available for the various offences for which charges are most usually brought. For dangerous driving, the maximum penalty is two years in prison. For causing death by dangerous driving, the maximum penalty rises to 14 years in prison—a 12-year difference, to mark the gravity of life being lost. For careless driving, the maximum penalty is a fine and points on the licence. For causing death by careless driving when under the influence, the maximum penalty rises to 10 years in prison.

But what about causing death by careless driving when not under the influence of drink or drugs? That is not even an offence known to English law. The maximum penalty is exactly the same as for any other case of careless driving in which no life is lost—just a fine and points on the licence. I find that absolutely bewildering. The law has created two offences—dangerous driving and causing death by dangerous driving—with markedly different potential penalties. The reason for that can only be that the law generally regards cases where driving of the same unlawful standard causes loss of life as more serious than cases where such driving causes just a dent or a scratch to a vehicle.

Moreover, there is a good policy reason for that differentiation. It underlines in law the simple fact that cars can kill, so all of us must be especially careful when we take to the road in them. Why, then, is the same principle not consistently applied to careless driving? Where is the sense in the law considering dangerous driving, but not careless driving, as much more serious when a life is lost? There is no sense. The law contains a gaping hole—the absence of any offence of causing death by careless driving—and in one way or another it needs to be filled.

That gap needs to be filled not just for legal neatness, but to meet the concerns of those who suffer the grief of loved ones being killed by careless drivers. All Members will have recently received a letter from my constituents, Peter and Tracey Melnik, about the death last year of their daughter, Alexine. Alexine was returning home with her boyfriend and friends from a pop concert in Great Yarmouth, when the car in which she was a passenger was hit from behind and pushed into the path of oncoming traffic.

Everybody else escaped the accident uninjured, but Alexine died. She was only 17 when she was killed by a careless driver. The driver was charged, and Peter and Tracey went to court, hoping for some semblance of justice and a sense of closure. The driver was found guilty and sentenced, but because he was charged only with careless rather than dangerous driving, and because he was neither drunk nor under the influence of drugs, the fact that he killed Alexine through his unlawful careless driving—in short, his criminal negligence—simply did not matter.

No offence of causing death by careless or negligent driving is known to English law, so that driver could be charged only with careless driving, for which offence he could only be fined and have points on his licence. In the end, for killing Mr. and Mrs. Melnik's daughter through his criminal negligence, the driver received just a £500 fine and nine penalty points. The total value placed on the life of their child was £500. Furthermore, because the driver pleaded guilty, there was no need to go through in detail the nature of the careless driving that caused her death. There was no forensic examination of the evidence, no detailed consideration of the circumstances leading to the loss of Alexine's life, and no questioning of why he failed to brake in time. There was just a plea and a £500 fine.

Little wonder that Peter and Tracey Melnik left the courtroom with no sense of closure, just a burning sense of injustice to add to their agonising grief. That is why they have written to all hon. Members to suggest that the Bill should be amended to prevent anyone else having to go through that again. I pay personal tribute to them for the courage and dignity of their campaign, and I agree with them. Like Peter and Tracey, I do not believe that the existing structure of the law can possibly be justified, and I believe that this Bill can be the legislative vehicle for making the improvement that needs to be made. It can easily be amended.

Perhaps surprisingly, an alternative method could be an amendment to the Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill. I am advised that either Bill could properly be amended to fill the gap. All we need is a simple amendment to create an additional offence of causing death by careless or negligent driving when not under the influence of drink and drugs. Then we need to legislate to create for that offence an appropriate maximum prison sentence, perhaps of seven years.

In so arguing, may I make it clear that I do not want all cases where careless driving causes death to result in custody? I am a trustee of the Prison Reform Trust and spend much of my time arguing that fewer people should go to prison, not more. I believe, however, that it should be possible to sentence more seriously if the facts of any given case merit it. Legislating to create that opportunity would mean that the facts surrounding any road death caused by carelessness would have to be properly considered in court to ensure that the sentence passed was appropriate, matched the degree of carelessness, and reflected the fact that a death occurred. At the moment, as in Alexine's case, that simply does not happen. In the future, it must surely be possible.

On behalf of Alexine's parents, I ask my right hon. Friend to consider amending the Bill before it comes back to the House so that the gap in the law can be filled and what is becoming known in Wellingborough as "Alexine's law" can be enacted. If not, will my right hon. Friend prevail on the Home Secretary to amend the Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill to identical effect? I am not alone in so asking, and I ask not just on behalf of Alexine's mum and dad and her immediate family, but on behalf of the overwhelming majority of my constituents.

[Mr. Paul Stinchcombe]

Just a week ago, I asked my local newspaper, the Evening Telegraph, if it would run a story on Alexine and include a ballot paper asking people whether they supported a change in the law. We were inundated with responses: 650 replies in just four days. A further petition to similar effect was drawn up by Mr. Craig Coogan—a constituent of the Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Phil Hope)—and it was signed by some 2,000 people. All but two of the respondents wanted the law changed. Why? Because, driven carelessly, vehicles are killers, because the criminal law has to reflect that reality consistently in respect of all types of unlawful driving, and because, quite simply, £500 is too low a value to put on the life of any child killed by criminal negligence.

5.39 pm

Mr. Andrew Miller (Ellesmere Port and Neston) (Lab): I am pleased to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Stinchcombe), who made a strong case in respect of the circumstances affecting one family in his area. I was also pleased that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said in his opening remarks that he accepted that driving a car in such a way as to cause a death was very similar to killing a person with any weapon. He is the first person in his position to say that.

Some years ago, I gave evidence to the Law Commission and argued that there should be an offence of causing death by driving. It is absurd that cases can be brought to court yet the question of the death caused is never exposed because of technicalities such as those that we have heard about. It is absurd that the structure of our law does not consider death to be at the centre of such cases. Although such a provision may not be appropriate for this Bill, I think that the House should look for an appropriate mechanism to adapt the law so that the principle that I have outlined can be addressed.

There are exact parallels between manslaughter and causing death by driving. Investigating officers, the Crown Prosecution Service and, most importantly, the courts should be able to determine where a person's death fits in the spectrum of culpability. Courts would then be in an appropriate position to mete out an appropriate sentence. That is the way forward.

The hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) made an important point about drawing parallels between deaths on the road and deaths in other circumstances, and referred to examples of deaths caused in accidents involving aeroplanes and trains. Society—and in particular the media—seems to adopt a different psychological attitude to rail or air tragedies from that which it takes to individual deaths on the road. It is important that the House should be seen to take a lead in the matter, and to say that the total number of deaths on our roads is far too high. The fact that those deaths are scattered around the country should not deter us from the sort of bold decisions that the public would expect us to take in response to a major incident—such as a plane falling from the sky—that causes hundreds of deaths. We need to address both sets of circumstances in the same way.

Various hon. Members have said that we need to raise public awareness about the scale of the carnage facing our society. The British record is good compared with that of some other countries, but my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has said that we must do better. The same sentiment was expressed by the spokesmen for the Conservative and Liberal Democrat parties.

We need to find practical solutions, and the Bill contains some ways to make progress in that respect. Training is important. We should consider whether drivers should be more actively encouraged to raise their skill levels—for example, by taking advantage of the help offered by the Institute of Advanced Motorists. That does not apply only to middle-age people, as the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) implied. It also applies to young people, and it is encouraging that in my own area there is a sprinkling of very young drivers—the number is growing all the time—who want to take advantage of the high-quality extra tuition that the IAM provides. Perhaps we can take the opportunity, not necessarily by writing it into the Bill, but by engaging in dialogue with insurance companies, for example, to create massive benefits for drivers who undergo such extra training. People who do that are made aware of the risks that they face on the road.

Because so many hon. Members want to speak, I shall keep the length of my remarks tight. A number of colleagues have spoken of overlaps with other Government Departments. I should like the Department for Transport to take a strong initiative that engages directly and openly all the other key Departments that can influence the debate. The Home Office, the Department for Education and Skills, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, the successor to the Lord Chancellor's Department, and the Department of Health are all important players. We need a joined-up approach to the problems facing us.

There are some aspects of the Bill that cause me concern. I have serious reservations not about the principle, but about the way in which the Bill deals with variable graduated points. I agree with the comments of the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross, and I find it difficult to see why we should harmonise downwards. I can see the merits of graduation, but I believe that we should start at a higher base point. I also agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon), who called for a reduction in the drink-drive limit. Real benefits would accrue from that. However, I do not disagree with the analysis of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. It is the extreme cases that cause problems, but we must set standards and enforce them rigidly.

Finally, I shall deal with technology issues. I am a great fan of technology, from such simple devices as speed cameras to enormously powerful technology such as the new advanced number plate recognition tools. Under no circumstances should we allow a driver to use more sophisticated technology to get round such technology. Clearly, that should be an offence. I hope that when we deal with that part of the Bill in Committee, we will look at the technical issues and set standards. We should not try to be technology-specific, as that would be dangerous, but we should set standards that embody the principle that driver aids should not include devices that enable a driver to do ridiculous things on the road that increase the risk of death and serious injury.

The Bill is a very good one, although there are some weaknesses. I hope that in Committee we can achieve unanimity to show the public that we take such matters seriously. The deaths of 3,500 people, such as the constituent of my hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Stinchcombe), every year are largely avoidable if we get the structure right.

5.49 pm

Mr. John Randall (Uxbridge) (Con): I, too, welcome the Bill's provisions but, like other speakers, I want to tell the Minister that the Government should not have the mindset that the measure is set in stone. They should listen to the members of the Standing Committee. As we have already heard, there are some good ideas in the Bill, but there are also some gaps and I hope that the Government genuinely use the opportunities offered in Committee and on Report further to improve it.

I want to talk briefly about two families who were affected by fatalities. David Burrows, the son of my constituent Keith Burrows, was killed tragically only a couple of hundred yards from my home, before I became a Member of Parliament. Ever since, Mr. Burrows has worked tirelessly for road safety, and became a local councillor so that he could put road safety at the heart of local civic life. There is still a problem with that stretch of road, however. Sadly, there have been more accidents and last year there was another fatality.

One of the problems is that we seem to move so slowly when dealing with these things. The hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso) mentioned repeater signs. There is a 30 mph limit on the stretch of road where the accidents took place, but as it is a dual carriageway no one really keeps to the limit. Over the past seven years, since I have been a Member, I have raised the problem periodically and although I can understand the Government's response, there must be some way of telling people clearly that there is a speed limit on that road and that it must be adhered to. There is a strong case for speed cameras in the area. All the local people, even those who complain when they are caught by speed cameras, would have no hesitation in saying that cameras would prevent fatalities.

The second family are the constituents of the Minister for School Standards, the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Twigg), but I have met them due to the problems they share with my constituents. George and Julietta Galli-Atkinson's daughter, Olivia, was killed tragically when a car mounted the pavement where she was standing. They have instituted annual Olivia awards to recognise all aspects of the work of traffic police officers—from those who counsel the bereaved to those who are out on the streets. I pay tribute to all the parents and families who have suffered traumatic loss and to those who work so hard for them.

A common theme, to which the hon. Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Stinchcombe) referred, is the feeling that there is a lack of appropriate offences and that sentences sometimes do not reflect the gravity of the offence. I am not saying that we should impose minimum sentences; we cannot legislate for every eventuality, but the courts must be able to recognise the gravity of offences and if that needs a change in the law, the Bill offers the opportunity to introduce it and to bring in a new offence.

As the Secretary of State said, the answer is not just legislation; it is very much about education, and in that regard I want to mention a couple of the things that really irritate me when I am driving. I am sure that lots of the things I do irritate other people, but I want to get these off my chest. I do not know whether we can legislate; indeed, some things are already covered by legislation. It is one thing to introduce laws, but we should also ensure that existing laws are observed—to echo the words of my hon. Friend the Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) and others. No matter what technology is introduced, there is no substitute for police officers.

I abhor tail-gating, especially by the cabs of heavy-goods vehicles that have released their loads. The drivers are on their way home and travel at high speeds along motorways close behind other vehicles. That is incredibly dangerous and it seems to be a common practice.

Without upsetting cyclists too much, I would echo the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson). Increasingly, I see cyclists—young children—out at night without lights switched on, and we must imagine what it would be like for people if they hit those cyclists and the trauma that it would cause them and, obviously, the victims themselves.

I am sure that other hon. Members must see children sitting in the front seats of cars—they should not even be there—without wearing seat belts. I see lots of people not wearing seat belts, despite the fact that the legislation has existed for goodness knows how long. I see children climbing over from the front to the back while the cars are moving. Every day, I see people not only using mobile phones while driving, but drinking coffee and reading maps or even newspapers while doing so. All I would say is that although such legislation is welcome—I hope that improvements can be made—we must do everything to continue to educate people about the real problems of motoring.

5.55 pm

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): In view of the shortness of time, I will restrict my comments to two issues. We have heard a wide consensus indeed in the House this afternoon. I greatly welcome that and hope that it is continued throughout our consideration of this very good Bill, which I support enthusiastically. Like many of my colleagues, my misgivings about the Bill are that it does not go far enough and are not about what it contains.

While listening to the debate from the Back Bench today, I have been reflecting on the importance of road safety cases—a point that has been made already. I was formerly a solicitor in a small market town in Shropshire. During the relatively short time that I worked there—about eight years—four young people were killed in different road traffic accidents. Although

[Ian Lucas]

I did some criminal law at about the same time, no other deaths of young people ever came across my desk during my work there. That gives some idea of impact that road safety issues have on our constituents. We have heard today, with great eloquence in a well-argued speech, from my hon. Friend—my good friend—the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Stinchcombe), about the impact that deaths can have on all our communities.

I want to talk briefly about the graduated points system. I have a great deal of respect for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, but he lost me in his arguments this afternoon in putting the case for reducing the number of penalty points from three to two. We all know that speeding drivers are more dangerous than drivers who do not speed. We all know that the faster people drive, the more dangerous they are. In that context, I cannot for the life of me understand how it makes sense to reduce the number of penalty points imposed for a speeding offence from three to two. I have grave concerns about that. I have no difficulty with the concept of a graduated points system. If clause 16 was amended to refer to a range of three to six points, I am sure that that would carry widespread support throughout the House.

My second concern relates to an omission from the Bill. This is a road safety Bill and road traffic offences, particularly those that cause serious injury or death, are very important matters indeed in our constituencies. Our constituents find it completely frustrating that no offence can be brought before the courts that reflects the gravity of the death of an individual, when someone who is at fault causes that death while driving a vehicle. In short, our constituents cannot understand why there is no offence of causing death by careless or negligent driving.

We fail as legislators if we do not address that concern. John Halliday has been investigating that lacuna in the law since July 2003. The Home Office, to which he will report in due course, has been giving assurances to Members of Parliament and to members of the Transport Committee, on which I serve, that the issue will come to the House and be addressed, but we are still waiting for that. The Bill gives us the appropriate opportunity to address the huge gap in the law.

One of the cases with which I dealt when I was a solicitor in Oswestry involved a 19-year-old motorist who was travelling down the A5, a road that my hon. Friend the Minister knows well. Three passengers in the vehicle that he was driving were killed in a road traffic accident. For a year afterwards, the case proceeded through the courts, based on an allegation of causing death by dangerous driving. I represented the driver and at no stage was there sufficient evidence to justify such an allegation. However, I think that the effect of three deaths, and the importance of those deaths to the families concerned, caused the prosecuting authorities to decide to proceed with the allegation.

Ultimately, a year on, that case was thrown out in the Crown court. As a result, the families of the three people who were killed felt badly let down by the criminal justice system. Equally, the individual who was acquitted felt let down because he had been awaiting trial for 12 months and did not consider that the allegation was ever justified. An offence of causing death by negligent driving would have allowed the case to be dealt with quickly to the satisfaction of all parties concerned. There would have been an element of closure for the families and even for the defendant, who was devastated by the impact of the accident.

Every hon. Member has said that they believe that that offence is justified. It is incumbent on us as legislators to act now, to wait no longer and to ensure that the offence of causing death by careless or negligent driving is available to our courts so that bereaved families can have justice.

6.3 pm

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): I declare my non-pecuniary interest in that I co-chair the Parliamentary Advisory Council for Transport Safety. The approach of PACTS is strictly non-party political. I want to praise successive Governments and Parliaments for keeping the politics out of road safety for decades. The great gain from that has been to our society as a whole, with a huge reduction in the number of people killed and seriously injured on our roads over that time.

However, it is valid to make the point that last year, for the first time in a number of years, the number of fatalities in the statistics for those who were killed or seriously injured went up instead of down. We should not read too much into one year alone. Longer term, the trend in killed and seriously injured is still clearly downward, but as we have heard so movingly so many times, every loss of life on the roads is a tragedy. So I want to concentrate on ways to reduce the fatalities on our roads.

I very much support calls for a wider range of offences and tougher sentences for killing by driving, as that would meet the public desire for justice and provide an opportunity to introduce further deterrents against the careless use of dangerous vehicles on our roads. I want to focus on preventive measures but, because of the limited time left for Members who wish to speak, I shall ditch most of them and concentrate almost entirely on drink-driving. However, I urge all parliamentarians to have regard to the report by the advisory group on motorcycling, given the huge increase in motorcycle deaths last year. I urge all employers to have regard to the guidance from the Health and Safety Executive on work-related driving. I alert the world in general to the huge gains from technological solutions, including intelligent speed adaptation, which can reduce fatalities further in future.

To keep my contribution short, I shall concentrate on drink-driving. Ever since laws on drink-driving were introduced, the legal limit has been 80 mg of alcohol in 100 ml of blood. That limit has served us well, and is robust and well-understood. However, because of changes in the law, the practices of modern society and the retailing and marketing of alcoholic drinks, it is time to reduce the limit from 80 to 50 mg. After significant falls, there was a plateau in the number of deaths in the 1990s. As a couple of Members have pointed out, the number of drink-driving deaths has been creeping up. Since 1998, when it was 460, it has risen by more than 20 per cent., and last year it was 560. In 2003, 19,000 casualties were caused by alcohol-related crashes. The Government consulted on whether to change the limit in 1998, and in its consultation document the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions predicted that, as a result of reducing the limit from 80 to 50 mg, 50 lives a year would be saved. Using rough statistics, 97 per cent. of drivers either have no alcohol at all in their system or less than 50 mg. Those drivers are not anywhere near the present limit and most of them would not change their behaviour if it were reduced to 50 mg, as they are within that limit. Those people cause hardly any of the deaths on our roads, and their behaviour would be unlikely to change in future.

As some Members have said, about 2 per cent. of drivers have no regard at all for the legal limit and far exceed it. They are often caught two, two and a half or three times over the limit. I concede that changing the limit from 80 to 50 mg will not make much difference to their behaviour. Our priority for them must remain enforcement, tough sentences and, to some extent, education and publicity. The final 1 per cent. of drivers are close to the present legal limit, and attempt to stay within the law. They are just under, just over or at 80 mg, and are responsible for a significant number of deaths on our roads. One assumes that they would adjust their behaviour in accordance with the new limit. They may not be within it, but they would try to keep to it, and would probably be a little under, about the right level or a little bit over. The latest assessment based on the 2003 statistics on alcohol-related deaths on our roads was made by Professor Richard Allsop of the centre for transport studies, University College London, who estimated that we would save 65 lives a year if we reduced the limit from 80 to 50 mg, and if 1 per cent. of drivers changed their behaviour to the extent that I described. That gain is worth having. The target is continually to reduce casualties, and it is reasonable to expect a contribution through the reduction of fatalities caused by drink-driving, but such a contribution is not currently being made. In addition to enforcement and education, we must change the limit.

Mr. Greg Knight (East Yorkshire) (Con): I am listening carefully to the hon. Gentleman's argument. How are the statistics relating to those motorists who are just under the limit collected? I understand how figures are available for drivers whose tests show 81, 82 or 83 mg of alcohol, but how on earth do we know whether a driver has a figure in the mid-70s? If we do not know the figures, does that not destroy the hon. Gentleman's argument? Those who break the existing law, not those who are just under the limit, are the problem.

Mr. Kidney: The right hon. Gentleman has a point in the sense that we cannot tell who has been breaking the law if people are not prosecuted. If people are killed, however, an assessment is made—in assessing why they died, the alcohol content in their blood is tested for the coroner, so we have the statistics to make an assessment. The up-to-date assessment is that about 130 deaths involve the 1 per cent. of drivers who are somewhere near the legal limit.

I hesitate before introducing Europe into any debate, because I know that it has an unhealthy effect on some hon. Members, but the European Union has considered whether we should harmonise the limit across Europe. In 2001, the Commission recommended that all countries should adopt the same limit of 50 mg. That has not happened and, as hon. Members have said, some countries still have a limit of 20 mg. Three countries still have a limit of 80 mg—we are with Luxembourg and Ireland—but the centre of gravity has nevertheless moved to 50 mg, which is persuasive but not in itself convincing.

I support the three measures in the Bill on drink-driving. Evidential roadside tests and, I hasten to add, tests at hospital bedsides are significant and will benefit the police in catching more people who break the law. We can make gains by closing the loophole relating to high-risk offenders and by piloting alcolocks. However, why do the Government not view the Bill as the right time to change the limit? I know that they say that most people are familiar with the present law, that enforcement is effective, that the penalties are tough and that we do not want to distract from the present regime by changing the law as well. I say that we would still have the same rigorous enforcement if we changed the limit.

The Government spend a lot of money on publicity and education campaigns, which get ever harder hitting. Since 1998, however, they have not seen a return for their investment in a reduction in the number of fatalities. Now is the time to consider an additional element—not a substitution—in order further to reduce such deaths. Because of the pressures of time, I will stop there, but I hope that we can further pursue that matter in Committee.

6.13 pm

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): I welcome the Bill, which is an important contribution to reducing deaths, accidents and injuries on our roads. It is unacceptable that 10 people per day die on our roads, and it is also unacceptable that 90 people per day are seriously injured on our roads. We sometimes underestimate the importance of serious injury through accidents—injuries can mean blighted lives.

Given the shortage of time, I shall concentrate my brief comments on my two areas of concern. First, although the Government are well aware that speed kills and have shown in many ways how they want to deal with the issue, it is ironic that the unintended consequence of the proposal on graduated speeding fines, as it has been introduced for consultation, is that speeding in 30 mph zones could result in a reduced penalty. It is known that a pedestrian hit at 30 mph has a 50 per cent. chance of survival, while 90 per cent. of those hit at 40 mph die. Indeed, a pedestrian hit at 35 mph is twice as likely to die as one hit at 30 mph. In view of those facts, I ask the Government to think again before the Standing Committee considers the proposal for graduated penalties. Given the severe consequences, hon. Members should have more information about the Government's intentions before they are asked to vote for that principle.

The second area to which I should like to draw attention is that of culpability for death or injury on the roads. Like other hon. Members, I ask the Minister to pursue with the Home Office the long-awaited publication of the Halliday report. All the evidence shows that death because of accidents on the roads is viewed far less seriously than death caused by any other means. That is simply unacceptable. When the Transport Committee recently took evidence, it became clear that bereaved families, among others, lack confidence in the system. There are worries about investigations at the scene of accidents and whether sufficient evidence is gathered and sufficient attention given to the possibility of culpability, and about the number of charges brought by the Crown Prosecution Service concerning careless, rather than dangerous, driving. Surely it is not right to put together and equate offences that include reading a newspaper and turning into a minor road and colliding with a pedestrian. Those two actions cannot be comparable, yet they are both classed under the heading of careless driving.

No proper statistics are kept on what happens following fatal accidents or accidents where there are serious injuries. That requires changes by the Home Office and the CPS as well as by the Department for Transport. Bereaved families and families of injured people are not kept informed about or involved in the progress of prosecutions that follow the accident. I ask the Department for Transport and the Home Office to consider the Transport Committee's recommendation of a new offence of causing death or serious injury by negligent driving. That, with other measures, would show that the Government mean what they say and that the Secretary of State for Transport follows up his words about how seriously he regards death because of accidents on the roads.

In general, this is a good Bill that will help to reduce accidents and death. However, as it passes through the House it is important that the Government reconsider the two areas of concern that I have outlined very briefly .

6.18 pm

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): Many points that I would have made have already been dealt with in the excellent speeches that have been made. I do not need to repeat them, but I hope to reinforce some of them.

Road safety measures clearly save lives. I hope that the Bill will save more lives in future, but if it were strengthened it could save even more. In the past, there has been a cultural reluctance to accept safety measures and a kind of misguided libertarianism about driving. I think that that is well in the past and I hope that it will not return. We have experimented with voluntarism, especially with seat belts; that did not work, and we now realise that compulsion is necessary in many areas. We are making progress, and it is comforting that there is consensus across the Chamber.

We have heard a lot this afternoon about the effect of different speeds on pedestrians hit by cars and their chances of survival. If we look at that in another way, we realise that between 20 mph and 30 mph one's chances of survival decrease 10 times, and that between 30 mph and 40 mph those chances decrease five times. Even between the speeds of 20 mph and 30 mph, there is a much greater chance of being killed when hit by a car. In crowded pedestrian areas in towns, it would therefore be sensible seriously to consider a default speed limit of 20 mph. The proposal has been presented by the Safer Streets Coalition in a well argued briefing that I urge my hon. Friends on the Front Bench to read.

We have heard much debate about alcohol limits. I supported the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Foster), who tabled an amendment on Report to the Railways and Transport Safety Act 2003. The amendment was rejected, but the case has to be put again. I hope that the Government will be persuaded that the 50 mg limit should eventually become law. I would argue for an even lower limit. We have come to realise that we can save hundreds of lives by restricting alcohol and driving. We should go further to save lives and my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) made an effective speech on that.

The culture and attitudes to driving have changed. That shows that hon. Members, as legislators, have a duty to represent people at their best and most sensible, not their most spontaneous and perhaps selfish. When Barbara Castle introduced the breathalyser, I was sitting in a pub, drinking a pint of beer. I hasten to add that I was not driving and that, even then, I was careful about the amount that I drank when I was driving. A petition against the breathalyser was circulated in the pub. I was the only person there who refused to sign it because I thought that the law was sensible and would save thousands of lives, thus making us all safer. I was not popular in the pub that day but I believe that I was right and that subsequent events have proved that.

I support a general 20 mph limit in towns and a lower blood-alcohol level for drivers. Those measures would make a tremendous contribution to saving thousands more lives in future. I urge my hon. Friends on the Front Bench to consider those two specific points seriously. Otherwise, I support the Bill.

Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): Like other hon. Members who have spoken, I support the Bill, which contains many good provisions. I want to concentrate on aspects of it on which we can build and I hope that the Government will take some points on board either in Committee or in other ways in future.

First, I endorse the comments of many other hon. Members about the problem with the graduated penalty proposals. I am worried that the message conveyed by adopting proposals for lower penalties for lower speeding would undermine the Government's good work on road safety. It would convey a message that a little bit of speeding does not do any harm. That is a dangerous message and it would be a big mistake to send it. We should face the fact that the problem of speeding below 40 mph in a 30 mph zone is not that people receive many penalty points but that, too often, the law is not enforced.

In many parts of the country, there is no genuinely effective enforcement until people drive at 38 or 39 mph. I do not suggest that we should pursue with the full vigour of the law someone who inadvertently creeps one or two mph beyond a 30 mph limit. However, we must have much more effective enforcement of existing speed limits below the 10 mph leeway, which appears to be allowed in many parts of the country. That approach is not consistent and I would be interested to hear today or on another occasion what my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary believes he can do to try to ensure a more consistent approach to enforcement of speed limits throughout the UK.

I endorse the comments made by many hon. Members on drink-driving limits. The arguments for reducing the level to 50 mg are convincing and I hope that the Government will consider them in Committee. I also endorse the view expressed by many hon. Members that, if we are to improve still further our relatively good road safety record, we need to change not only our legislation but public attitudes. The change in public attitudes can be brought about in a number of ways, and legislation will certainly play a part in that, as it will underline the message that we take seriously offences of this nature. We also need more public education, although a lot of good work has already been done in that regard. We need more public information, more road safety education of all sorts in schools, including basic education about street safety, cycle training and a wide range of other measures. We also need more driver education, and more work to be done by vehicle manufacturers.

Above all, we as public figures need to send a consistent message that cutting the toll of deaths and injuries on our roads must have a higher priority in the decisions that we take about traffic and transport. I, too, welcome the clear message given by the Secretary of State today about the way in which we should regard people who use their vehicle to drive dangerously. He drew a parallel between such people and those who create a danger by using a gun or other weapon. That was a powerful message and I endorse what he said.

We have heard today about the tragic cases that have affected many hon. Members—we all see such cases in our communities from time to time. It is also important, however, to send out the positive message that we can do things to make a difference at local level as well as at national level. In my own city of Edinburgh, the city council, the police and other agencies have worked together to make a real impact on reducing the number of deaths and injuries on the roads. Last year, for the first time since records began, some 75 years ago, not a single school-age child was killed on the roads in Lothian, the area that includes Edinburgh. That result was achieved by a road safety strategy involving a combination of engineering measures such as road humps, enforcement involving speed cameras, and education. This was not just a one-off strategy. Over the last 10 years, we have seen a reduction of 30 per cent. in the number of injuries on the roads. That consistent reduction has meant that we have had one of the highest reductions in accidents in the UK. It is time to learn from the example set by my city council, as well as by many other councils of different political colours in different parts of the country that have introduced measures to improve road safety in their communities.

The use of speed cameras and other traffic calming measures of that nature results in howls of derision from certain sections of the community and the media. However, we have to underline the fact that none of us—I am a driver myself—has the right to break the speed limit. We must reject the spurious arguments about the Government attempting to raise revenue from cameras, because it diverts us from the fact that speed kills, and we do not need the carnage on the roads that still takes place despite our relatively good record compared with most other European countries.

I welcome the fact that the Conservatives have said today that they will not vote against the Bill. This is an area in which we must try to achieve as much political consensus as possible. However, it is no use Conservative Front Benchers saying that they support the headline measures on road safety if, in the next breath, they come out with language that undermines the message being sent by those measures. I do not want to undermine the cross-party consensus that we have here today, but as we listened to the opening speech by the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo), we heard all the same old arguments and urban myths about speed cameras. We heard the idea slip through that the Conservatives, if they came to power, would abolish the safety camera partnerships, which have done more than anything to reduce deaths and injury by speeding. It is no good, at one level, supporting road safety, while undermining in practice, with the message that is sent out, the intent of legislation.

I say this with some hesitation but it needs to be said: when the message is sent out by some leading Conservatives—although there are some honourable exceptions in the Conservative party—that a little speeding is okay and that it does not really qualify to be in the same league as other criminal offences, that contributes to the overall climate in which speeding is okay, and contributes to the campaign in some quarters against speed cameras and against enforcing speed legislation. We hear that too often from the Conservative Benches, and it contributes to making the roads less safe, and ultimately results in people dying or being injured on our roads who would not otherwise have died or been injured.

Conservative Front Benchers must recognise that when they undermine the message of strict enforcement of speed limits, they are acting irresponsibly and encouraging some drivers to drive in a way that leads to people being killed and injured unnecessarily. With not too much expectation of a change of heart today, I urge them to act a little more responsibly in this area, and not to take an approach that leads to more people losing their lives and being injured than would otherwise be the case.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch) (Con): This debate has been well attended, and the contributions have been fewer and shorter than would have been the case had the Second Reading not lost two hours and 50 minutes to the three statements and the urgent question, which was a point made very well by the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody). Because of time constraints, I will not be able to respond to all the pertinent points that have been made. Unlike in most debates in the House, however, everyone who has spoken shares the same objective of improving road safety, and relatively small differences exist in relation to some of the means of achieving that objective.

I shall start with one area in which there is unanimity about the need for enforcement. I must emphasise the way in which the Government have failed both their supporters in the House and Opposition Members who believe that we need more police enforcement of our road traffic laws. Road traffic law enforcement is not included in the core responsibilities of chief constables, a fact which was investigated by the Select Committee in its excellent report. All that has happened is that the Government have produced a rather lame response to the Select Committee report, and have today announced that they will now get serious about enforcement of road traffic law.

Fortunately, only on 5 January I received a much delayed answer to a question that I had put to the Home Secretary on how many road traffic police officers there were in 1996, and how many there are now. It was quite a straightforward question, but it received a holding answer on 13 December, no doubt while the Government worked out how they were going to respond. The answer is rather interesting, as it shows that in the past four years 1,653 fewer police officers have been in front-line operational road policing, while the number of support staff has increased by 399, and an extra 400 have been involved in administrative support—a twentyfold increase. In 1996–97, this Government inherited 9,201 road traffic police officers, whereas now, according to the answer that I have received, there are only 6,276 operational traffic officers—a reduction of between a quarter and 30 per cent. In the meantime, there has been an enormous increase in the number of operational support officers and organisational support administrative back-up staff.

Rob Marris: The hon. Gentleman has given some figures. Will he tell us what has happened to the fatality rate per 1 million km driven in the United Kingdom during the same period?

Mr. Chope: I deal with miles, actually, but I can tell the hon. Gentleman that this Government—his Government—have tried to transfer the debate to a discussion of fatality rates per, say, 1,000 miles. When I was Roads Minister in a Conservative Government, we set a target for reducing the actual number of people killed on the roads, and we were very successful in achieving it. I do not claim all the credit myself, but during the two or three years for which I was the Minister, the annual toll of fatalities on the road fell by more than 1,000 a year. Under this Government, since 1997 the number of fatalities has reached a plateau. In fact, according to the most recent figure it rose slightly.

Not surprisingly, the hon. Gentleman and, perhaps, Ministers are falling back on the number of fatalities per 1 million miles driven. Because of the higher mileage on the roads, the number may be falling as a small proportion, but it certainly does not compare with our record in government. Indeed, we would like to see a significant further reduction in the number of fatalities. One of the key ingredients is proper enforcement, and it is one of the ingredients that have been lacking in the Government's policy. It is no good just coming out today with a lame press release suggesting that everything will be rosy in the future, when we know that the figures suggest otherwise.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz) referred disparagingly to Conservative Members' comments about the need for police officers, and the fact that road safety cameras cannot be an adequate substitute. On 13 May 2004, Jan Berry, chairman of the Police Federation, said:

"I don't think you can remove the human element of policing and replace it with a camera—in some force areas if you are going 35 mph at 2 am in a 30 mph area and no other traffic it would be extremely unusual for an officer to give you a ticket—a speed camera doesn't have that discretion."

That is what worries us. In 1996 there were about 300,000 speeding fines; in 2004 there were probably 3 million, but as I have pointed out, there has been no reduction in the absolute number of fatalities. Despite that, the Government are probably raking in anything between £60 million and £100 million in extra fines. Their policy is not working, and it is alienating the travelling public and road users generally.

Mr. Lazarowicz: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Chope: I will not, because unfortunately our time is limited.

The Select Committee Chairman, the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich, said that the incidence of compliance with 30 mph limits was very small—that there was 58 per cent. non-compliance. Speed limits must be worthy of respect, or they will be ignored. It is essential for us to have a sensible regime of speed limits, and sensible enforcement. That point has been made strongly by the Institute of Advanced Motorists, of which I am privileged to be a member. It has drawn attention to "the increasing use of non-discretionary cameras in place of police officers who are able to able to apply discretion taking account of prevailing conditions. For example, the Government position on the motorway limit included the assertion that while at 70 mph drivers would regularly travel at 80 mph, if increased to 80 mph they would travel at 90 mph. This argumentation is clearly undermined if zero-tolerance cameras substitute police enforcement."

The briefing paper continues by pointing out that

"speed limits are exactly that: limits. The IAM and other road safety organisations constantly remind drivers of this. They are the maximum speed where conditions allow and therefore, by definition, a lower speed must be appropriate where there are additional hazards e.g. traffic density, rain, fog, high pedestrian population etc . . . For their message to be credible it follows that the speed limit should be set as the maximum permitted speed where the road appears empty of moving hazards, the conditions dry and visibility clear."

That is, I am afraid, far too infrequently the situation, which is why I am pleased to be able to tell the House this evening that the next Conservative Government, which will come in later this year, will conduct a review of speed limits on all English roads to ensure that posted speed limits are appropriate to the function and characteristics of the road. We will implement a consistent signposting policy across England to inform drivers, riders and passengers of these posted speed limits. That will have a major effect on the motoring public's confidence in the fairness of the system.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) made a most important speech, and I certainly endorse what he said about the Streetwise safety centre, which I also had the privilege of visiting. It has achieved an enormous amount for road safety in our area. He admitted to having been the victim of the penalty points system, and of speed cameras imposed temporarily on roads under repair. I am afraid that concern about such cameras is often expressed in the postbag by people who, when travelling along a road whose normal speed limit has been replaced by a temporary limit, find that the signposting is inadequate. As a result, they are caught out—in circumstances for which they find it very hard to accept responsibility.

My hon. Friend also made a very important point about the many cyclists on our roads who ride without lights. The Government should do something to help those who ride with lights that flash or pulsate, or which consist of light-emitting diodes, because currently they are outside the law. The chief executive of the parliamentary advisory committee on transport safety admitted to me in a conversation yesterday that he had such lights on his bike. Strictly speaking, they are outside the law, and this Bill gives the Government an opportunity to bring such cyclists within the law, and then to bear down more heavily on those who ride with no lights at all.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Chope: I am afraid that I do not have time to give way again.

My hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) raised a number of important points, but his overall theme of the importance of education is one that we should take seriously in this debate on road safety. It is apparent that the Government are putting too little emphasis on education's role in improving road safety.

Several contributors discussed the vexed issue of whether there should be a separate offence of careless driving resulting in death, and I can see the arguments for and against creating such an offence. However, I hope that, in responding to an amendment that we will table in Committee, the Government will compare that issue with what happens under the terms of section 2 of the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974. Through it, people are prosecuted for failing in their duty to ensure, so far as is reasonably practicable, the health and safety and welfare at work of an employee. The consequences of that failure bear heavily on the penalties imposed, and it is such issues that the victims of road accidents and the relatives of those involved in fatalities want the Government to address.

Let us not forget, however, that motorists are paying £8 billion more every year in vehicle excise duty and fuel duty than they were when this Government took office. What are they getting in return? They are getting precious little investment in the road infrastructure or in new engineering works, which are also very important elements of road safety. I am pleased to announce that although this Government have backed away from a commitment to improving the A3 trunk road at Hindhead, the incoming Conservative Government will bring forward that project as quickly as possible.

In conclusion, I think that the chairman of the Institute of Advanced Motorists hit the nail on the head when he spoke at the annual lunch. A member of the Government party was invited but, sadly, did not turn up: a space was left there, but I do not know the reason for the absence. The chairman said:

"Car cyclists and motorcyclists are not just part of the problem: they can be—and need to be—part of the solution. Treat them fairly and get them back on-side, and there will be a rapid pay-back" in "road safety".

6.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): It is always good to follow the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope), because anyone can sound reasonable and measured after he has spoken at the Dispatch Box. I was interested to hear his comments. He says that he would spend more on roads—particularly the A3 at Hindhead, for some reason—but I do not know how that squares with the £2 billion cuts that the Conservatives have also promised. At some future time, we may hear the answer to that question.

We have had a good-tempered debate with some excellent contributions on both sides of the House, and we have seen a wide degree of consensus on both the Front and the Back Benches for many of the measures in the Bill.

Roads are key to our economic success, and vital for the movement of people and goods. Our economy is doing well. We have a successful and vital economy with more people owning cars, which is why our roads are busier than ever before. We must use those roads safely. The speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), the first to speak from the Back Benches today, was a powerful one, which made that point eloquently. We are grateful to her Select Committee for examining the proposals before the Bill was published, and its report was extremely useful in preparing the Bill. I hope that it will be used in the forthcoming stages of the Bill, too, particularly with regard to implementing particular measures later.

I know that my hon. Friend will be disappointed that the Bill does not deal with some of the serious offences that have been under review for some years. Her views on that matter were also expressed by my hon. Friends the Members for Wellingborough (Mr. Stinchcombe) and for Ellesmere Port and Neston (Mr. Miller). Let me assure her and other Members that these matters are on the Home Office agenda, and consultation on them will start as soon as possible.

Safety on our roads is important to each and every one of us in representing our constituencies, and all our constituencies are affected in some way by road safety. We have heard today, as we so often do in such debates, a number of personal and harrowing stories of constituents who have either suffered injuries themselves or had friends and neighbours killed or seriously injured. We also know that vulnerable young children and the elderly are particularly affected by road safety issues. That interest has been the catalyst for the high-quality debate that we have conducted here today. The debate continues outside this Chamber. Many interest groups, some of them parliamentary, have helped to progress those issues through their discussions and lobbying.

[Mr. David Jamieson]

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said in his opening speech, UK roads are some of the safest in the world, certainly in comparison with those in many other countries. That is due to action taken by successive Governments over a long period. I am not referring only to what has happened recently, but to the longer term. The vast majority of drivers in this country, young and old, are careful, considerate and law-abiding. The large quiet majority are people who wear their safety belts, do not exceed speed limits, do not use their mobile phones while driving and obey traffic laws.

However, their safety—and the safety of the rest of us—is compromised by the small minority who put other people's lives at risk. The people in that minority think that when it comes to driving, insurance is somehow an optional extra. They think that they are special, and can drink and then drive safely. They chatter on their mobile phones when they should be concentrating on the road ahead.

Mr. Tyler: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Jamieson: Certainly. I am chattering, and will give way.

Mr. Tyler: I warmly welcome clause 22, which deals with mobile phones, but will the Minister look again at the evidence provided by Brake, that very effective road safety pressure group? It suggests that even hands-free mobile phones can distract drivers. Will he consider that evidence again in Committee?

Mr. Jamieson: Our recommendation is that people should not use a mobile phone at all when driving. However, the law must be enforceable. When we brought in the £30 fixed penalty last year, we said that we would hold a review in a year's time. The Bill contains the new measures to raise the fine and to impose the three penalty points that we promised. If necessary, we will review the law again in the future. The Bill contains a range of sensible and proportionate measures to make our roads safer.

I will not have time to respond to all the points raised in the debate, so I invite hon. Members to whom I cannot respond to correspond with me, or to raise matters in Standing Committee. The hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) opened the debate for the Opposition, and I am grateful to him for his shared concerns and consensual approach. He said that he would not divide the House on Second Reading, as did the Liberal Democrat spokesman. It is good to have that consensus on this important Bill, although I fully expect there to be some differences about some of the smaller matters in it, which we will debate in the usual way.

The hon. Member for South Suffolk said how differently we in this country treat deaths on the road from deaths arising from rail or air crashes, or other causes. Other hon. Members made the same point, including my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon).

I think that we are going through a gradual cultural change in this matter. I am glad to say that the number of people injured is falling, as is the death rate. The static figure for deaths is about 3,500 a year, and we have to tackle that. I hope that the House's consensual approach will allow us to find a way to do so.

The hon. Member for South Suffolk mentioned the EuroRAP map, and said that it showed some roads to be more dangerous than others. That is to be expected, but local authorities and the Highways Agency are devoting a lot of energy to identifying which roads and junctions are most dangerous and problematic. We are focusing our attention, and our funding, on those roads. If we are to pay for the improvements that the hon. Gentleman wants, we must put the funding in. In those circumstances, cuts would not be appropriate.

Mrs. Anne Campbell: My hon. Friend has said that he will be taking another look at dangerous roads, so will he look again at the A14, which runs between Cambridge and Huntingdon? A very large number of accidents happen on that road, so can anything be done to improve the situation before 2010?

Mr. Jamieson: We appreciate the dangers of that piece of road, and I know that my hon. Friend has lobbied consistently on the issue. Those are the sort of dangers that we want to address, but she will know that it is incumbent on us to tackle the worst first. We must deal with the greatest problems first.

The Conservative party has performed either a U-turn or a complete 360-degree turn—I am not sure which—in respect of speed cameras. The hon. Member for Christchurch did a wonderful job in 1990 when he introduced safety cameras. However, the hon. Member for Ashford (Mr. Green) argued all last year that most of those cameras were in the wrong place and should be removed. I am glad that the hon. Member for South Suffolk has brought some calm common sense to the Conservative Benches, as he clearly realises that he is on a losing issue with the electorate. The vast majority of people in this country do not believe that people should be able to speed freely. They believe that their children should be able to cross the road without having speeding drivers around them. I welcome the hon. Gentleman's support.

The hon. Member for South Suffolk proposed an audit of the cameras. We have already done that. Some of his Conservative colleagues in local government have also carried out an audit. I repeat the challenge that I made to the Tory Front-Bench team 13 months ago. If the hon. Gentleman knows where there are cameras that do not meet the criteria, let him tell the House where they are. After 13 months, nobody on the Conservative Benches has come up with a single example of a camera that has been wrongly placed.

I am glad to have the support of the hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (John Thurso). He spoke about pedestrians being killed at various speeds, and the issue of variable speed limits. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said in his opening remarks, the variable penalty is only an enabling power in the Bill. The detail will come later, after careful consultation. That is an important matter, because the faster the car is going, the more likely it is that people will be killed.

Repeater signs are not dealt with in the Bill. There are difficulties associated with cost and with the clutter of street signs. The present system, whereby a built-up area where there are lights is a 30 mph zone, goes back 70-odd years. On bull bars, a subject which interests my hon. Friends, we are negotiating a new European directive to control their use. It is my view that they have no place on any vehicle on the road.

My hon. Friend the Member for Halifax, who chairs the all-party group on road safety, contrasted our attitudes to death caused by various modes of transport. The law already empowers local authorities to reduce speed limits to 20 mph. I take her point about sleep-related issues. They are important, but in the main do not need to be dealt with in primary legislation.

The hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) spoke with great enthusiasm about many of the measures in the Bill, particularly those dealing with foreign lorries, equal treatment of British subjects and foreigners on our roads, rest areas and uninsured drivers. He spoke about a level playing field across Europe. I agree about common practice, enforcement and information sharing—but whether we want the same laws as other countries in the European Union, I very much doubt. We have a better record, and those countries look to our legislation as an example, rather than the other way round.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wellingborough made an impassioned speech on behalf of his constituents. The penalties issue that he raised is being examined by the Home Office. My hon. Friend the Member for Ellesmere Port and Neston has a long history of interest in road safety matters. I thank him for his support. He raised some interesting points, which the Committee may want to consider.

The hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) made a helpful speech, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Ian Lucas), although he said that the Bill did not go far enough. My hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) chairs the Parliamentary Advisory Council for Transport Safety, so his commitment, and that of the people with whom he works, is clear.

We are concerned about the death statistics. We have been successful in reducing the number of serious injuries on the roads, and I agree that we must now turn our attention to reducing the number of deaths. Sadly, the figures rose last year, mainly because of an increase in the number of motor cyclist deaths, and we must address that issue. However, I am very much opposed to the harmonisation of penalties across Europe.

In conclusion, each crash brings human misery for those who are injured and the families of those who are killed, and a massive cost to our economy. The Bill contains a number of measures that will help to make our roads safer; it will be welcomed by all of us, and I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

ROAD SAFETY BILL (PROGRAMME)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 83A(6).

That the following provisions shall apply to the Road Safety Bill:

Committal

1. The Bill shall be committed to a Standing Committee.

Proceedings in Standing Committee

2. Proceedings in the Standing Committee shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion on Thursday 3rd February 2005.

3. The Standing Committee shall have leave to sit twice on the first day on which it meets.

Consideration and Third Reading

4. Proceedings on consideration shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour before the moment of interruption on the day on which those proceedings are commenced.

5. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on that day.

Programming Committee

6. Standing Order No. 83B (Programming committees) shall not apply to proceedings on consideration and Third Reading.

Other proceedings

7. Any other proceedings on the Bill (including any proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments or on any further messages from the Lords) may be programmed. —[Mr. Watson.]

PETITION

Cliff Erosion

7.18 pm

Mr. Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): I wish to present a petition from the residents of Warden bay, Leysdown, Bayview and from holiday home owners at the eastern end of the Isle of Sheppey. The petition states:

We declare that because of failure to remedy the cliff erosion homes will be lost, property devalued, and we live in constant fear of flooding by sea.

The petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons take immediate action to ensure that the cliffs are protected with the method presented to DEFRA.

To lie upon the Table.

Community Transport (South Derbyshire)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.— [Mr. Jim Murphy.]

7.19 pm

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire) (Lab): We have an opportunity in this short debate to reflect both on a local south Derbyshire success story and on evidence of the success of a Government and local authority programme in my area, which, I am sure, is reflected to some extent in other parts of the country. That success has been based on a partnership between Derbyshire county council, supported by central Government funding—I shall expand on that subject later in my speech—the local, voluntary and professional management of the community transport service in Swadlincote, South Derbyshire district council and a number of parish councils in south Derbyshire, which have been involved in developing local transport solutions for their individual communities.

First, I shall provide a few raw facts. In 1997, Community Transport (Swadlincote), which had been in existence for some eight years by that time, carried 17,583 passengers in five vehicles. In 2004, the same service carried 72,683 passengers in 21 vehicles. All hon. Members will accept that that is a huge increase in passenger usage and in the scale and capacity of community transport in south Derbyshire. Community transport was operated over nearly 100,000 miles during 2004.

In 1997, the service operated out of a Nissen hut. Thanks to a lottery award early in the life of this Government, however, it now operates out of a modern, purpose-built garage, which has, however, become increasingly hard pressed for space as the service has developed. The garage has also provided a base for a number of innovative schemes to offer transport services to rural areas, and I shall touch on several of those schemes in my speech.

One such scheme, which I shall mention now, was prompted by the introduction of the new deal and my identification, along with the county council, of the fact that it was difficult for unemployed people in rural areas to obtain transport to get work or even to go to interviews and take up opportunities. A bid was put in to support new deal transport for people in rural areas, and the service was run for a number of years to support people with those needs.

Although I shall mainly concentrate on Community Transport (Swadlincote), I also want to acknowledge the role played by other voluntary sector transport schemes in the area. In particular, I want to refer to the social car scheme operated through the South Derbyshire Council for Voluntary Service, which completed nearly 2,000 runs in 2004 to those who need specific and personal transport, which is often required for medical reasons. Some 31 volunteers have given freely of their time, energy and vehicles to provide that important and personal service in the past year, and this is an opportunity to thank them and those who organised that service for their valuable contribution to community needs in south Derbyshire.

Government help has been available on several levels. First, they have supported two rural bus challenge bids, which have directly helped Community Transport (Swadlincote). Since 1999, that help has secured the growth of the service until 2007—the latest scheme has just been authorised for a further three years. In the first phase of the rural bus challenge, 30,000 additional passenger journeys occurred. People would not otherwise have been able to undertake those journeys, and they would have had to rely on their own private transport or lifts from other people.

The latest award—£245,000 over a three-year period—will consolidate the development of rural services and link to a specific award in the north-west of south Derbyshire, which is the most rural and remote part of the district, serving the areas around the villages of Hilton, Etwall and Church Broughton. This is an opportunity to pay tribute to the parish councils for those areas for their vision and practical work, assisted by others. I did a mailing to several parish councils in my area suggesting that they address local transport needs. I particularly congratulate the three that I mentioned and one or two others in the area. Findern, the village in south Derbyshire where I live, has also been active in taking up the opportunity to look closely at local transport requirements and then working with community transport on solutions.

Much of the area involved had virtually non-existent services. The bus service in Church Broughton was charmingly described as a "market-day" service. The traditional view of what was provided in rural areas was a bus service that went only once a week and was related to a market somewhere else in another town. That very rudimentary access to public transport has now been supplemented dramatically by access to dial-a-ride services and group services for individuals and groups in those communities.

The Government have sharply increased the funds available to the county council for more general support for public transport in Derbyshire. This is an opportunity to congratulate a Labour county council that was, with substantial justice, classed as excellent in the last three comprehensive performance assessments. It has used the additional funding extremely well. Part of it has gone towards supplementing additional scheduled services in the area, for example by deepening the coverage for weekends and evenings, but a very large proportion—£134,000 last year—has gone to Community Transport (Swadlincote) to support dial-a-bus and group travel services throughout the district.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend agree that community transport in south Derbyshire could well be integrated with some form of improved rail services linking Leicester via Coalville and Ashby-de-la-Zouch to Burton-on-Trent, and serving some of the villages in his constituency? Would some Government funding in that area repay the necessary investment, and could we hear from the Minister on that?

Mr. Todd: I thank my hon. Friend and neighbouring Member for that contribution. He is absolutely right. We have both campaigned actively for the restoration of passenger services through the southern part of south

Derbyshire. Such a scheme would include a new station at Castle Gresley It is regrettable that a combination of narrowness at central Government level and occasional lack of vision from some of the councils involved—although not Derbyshire county council and my own district council of South Derbyshire—has meant that little progress has been made on the project, but it would undoubtedly improve access to the main rail transport network for many of my constituents.

The second initiative that deserves credit is that the Government now rebate fuel duty to community transport operators. To give the Minister an example of how valuable that is to a community transport service, in south Derbyshire in the past year it has saved £18,000 that could be applied to service development. It is an extremely valuable supplementary source of revenue that was not available before that change implemented by this Government.

The Government have made more flexible the rules relating to the operation of community transport. We all recognise that it would be entirely inappropriate to support through public funds direct competition with private sector bus providers. However, too narrow a restriction on the development of services can be unhelpful. When I spoke to Community Transport (Swadlincote) before speaking here this evening, I was told that although legitimate restrictions remain, it is now much more a case of defining instances where services may not be provided than of following the much narrower path of very precisely restricted services that could be provided by community transport.

I welcome that change of tone and balance in the regulatory framework in which community transport operates. Much of the development of group travel services, which has grown rapidly in south Derbyshire, providing, for example, door-to-door services that deliver frail passengers to shopping centres in nearby towns, reflects that more liberal approach of dealing with community transport in a more permissive environment than previously existed.

I would personally welcome a further examination of the restrictions on community transport, especially the way in which it could work with employers to develop sustainable travel packages for employees. I should like my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary to reflect on that. There is much to commend the way in which a small, flexible operator could work with employers to develop packages to bring employees to work. I can remember working in a company that operated a bus service for its employees around the town where most of them lived. That has gone out of fashion. However, there is now an opportunity to reflect on what a neat and nimble-footed operator such as Community Transport (Swadlincote) could do with local employers to improve the sustainability of transport options for employees in the area.

It is worth adding that the massive development of service and the growth in passenger numbers has been achieved while maintaining excellent relations with private operators, both private scheduled operators and those who offer coach services in the area. People get on well together, understand the differences between their businesses and I have come across no complaints about that. Indeed, offers of co-operation have sometimes been made and much appreciated.

Is there any cloud on that undoubted local success? I should like the Under-Secretary to give some thought to a couple of matters. The first point is mainly a matter for local initiative but the Government could examine ways in which to facilitate it. I am proud to say that south Derbyshire is now generally an area of relative prosperity. South Derbyshire district has the highest average income in Derbyshire. Employment is high and rising. That means that recruiting volunteers, who play an important role in supplementing the activities of community transport's paid employees, can be tough and rewarding paid staff sufficiently to retain them can also be difficult. Opportunities for other employment abound in the area.

The county council has recognised the problem and is trying to develop a package of promotions that will attract people to the important roles of, for example, assisting disabled users, which need to be filled. It is normally helpful to have a volunteer to supplement the work of the driver and others to help people to get in and out of vehicles. It is hard to get people to fulfil those critical functions.

The second point relates directly to central Government responsibilities. While the range of services that Community Transport (Swadlincote) offers is secure in the medium term—I have mentioned 2007—for the rural services in particular, much has depended on the success of bids to central Government. As with any project based on that initial funding—I also have a mini Sure Start scheme in Derbyshire that suffers from the same problem—the start of the process is pump primed, but a way of mainstreaming the funding support must be found so that the service can continue to develop and be retained.

I urge the Under-Secretary to initiate discussions on how to structure a transfer of funding responsibility over time, subject to quality tests on the services supported. All the evidence that I have seen suggests that Community Transport (Swadlincote) is doing an absolutely fantastic job in serving a large number of people who are disadvantaged, either because they live in a remote rural location or by their disabilities or other requirements, and are therefore less able to use public transport.

Community transport in south Derbyshire has achieved huge growth across a wide range of services, and it has started to demonstrate that there is a huge, unmet demand for public transport in the area. It deserves greater certainty in its planning, and if the Government take the steps that I have described, they will be able to offer it that increased security, which will allow it to build on the tremendous successes that it has already achieved.

7.35 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Charlotte Atkins): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire (Mr. Todd) not only on securing this debate, but on his role in promoting community transport in his constituency. I know that he has been a champion of this transport service.

Community and voluntary transport have a key role to play across the whole country, in both urban and rural areas. I do not want to disappoint my hon. Friend the Member for North-West Leicestershire (David Taylor), but I fear that his proposal would require an excessive subsidy to make it viable. We are at present focusing on bringing community transport schemes into being under existing viable projects, as he knows because he was present at our debate earlier today. I hope, however, that the kind of scheme to which he referred will become viable in future.

The challenges might vary, but the need for transport for those who are socially excluded for reasons of income, gender, race, disability or geographical isolation is always there. The community and voluntary transport sector has been at the forefront in helping to meet those people's needs. Indeed, the services that it offers have developed and evolved over many years, particularly over the past decade, with enormous changes to their scale, scope and range, and to the professionalism of those providing them.

The breadth of the community transport sector's activities is impressive, and it is perhaps too easy to lose sight of the sheer scale of the operation. The Community Transport Association, which represents the majority of schemes across the country, estimates that there are some 5,000 schemes in the UK, which between them run about 60,000 minibuses. They do so with the help of about 250,000 volunteers and 10,000 full-time paid drivers. I take on board the comments made by my hon. Friend the Member for South Derbyshire about the difficulty of recruiting volunteers; many organisations face that problem. Together, the schemes deliver some 5 million trips for almost 2 million people with mobility problems. Any transport provider would be proud of that record. It is perhaps all the more laudable when we consider that this activity is taking place in the voluntary sector. However, as my hon. Friend has pointed out, funding for the sector is not straightforward, and I fully appreciate the difficulties to which uncertainty over future funding and the complexities of funding applications can sometimes give rise. We shall certainly consider those issues.

This brings me to the issues surrounding rural transport services. Rural travel patterns have changed markedly over the past 30 years. We have seen a significant growth in car ownership in rural areas. Public transport had become a marginal form of transport, and people's journeys became longer as the number of local shops and services declined due to the consolidation of essential services such as health care, post offices and banks. For people without access to a car, that meant increasing difficulties in accessing employment opportunities and essential services.

This lack of accessibility is a significant cause of social exclusion in rural areas, and we recognise the need to improve the transport infrastructure and to enhance rural accessibility. The measures that we are taking are having a positive impact. New and enhanced bus services are being delivered across all rural counties, improving the links between market towns and halting the decline in bus use in rural areas.

Over the past five years, we have more than doubled local authority funding for transport projects. For those authorities with extensive rural communities, considerable funding is being directed at rural areas. An important ingredient of achieving rural renewal is good-quality rural bus services. We have specifically targeted more resources to improve rural bus services. More than £50 million will be spent this financial year alone on the rural bus subsidy grant. More than 2,200 new and enhanced bus services are now being funded from this grant across England, on which some 29 million passenger journeys are being made per year. We have succeeded in giving a much-needed boost to transport links for many rural communities. Our "Future for Transport" White Paper announced the continuation of the rural bus subsidy grant beyond April 2006.

Additional resources for conventional bus services are not the only answer in rural areas. Solutions need to be tailored to local circumstances. We want better targeting of resources by local authorities to meet accessibility needs, greater promotion of rural transport services and a more joined-up approach that links public transport and less conventional services

David Taylor: The Minister refers to a more joined-up approach, and at the beginning of her speech she was kind enough to refer to my intervention. Does she acknowledge that there is a possibility of joining up and integrating bus and rail services in some parts of the country? Will she review with her officials the costings for the national forest line running between Leicester and Burton, through North-West Leicestershire and South Derbyshire, because the passenger figures that produce the prime income are excessively bleak and were drawn up at a time when the two districts involved were much less developed, in all sorts of senses, than they are now?

Charlotte Atkins: Certainly, I will be happy to accede to that request. I have not seen the detailed figures, and I would be only too delighted to examine them.

Detailed local transport planning and accessibility planning guidance was distributed to local authorities at the end of last year. It asks authorities to produce accessibility strategies as part of their next local transport plans, which should include their visions and objectives for accessibility based on an assessment of the needs and problems of the area. The strategies should also suggest how initial priorities will be tackled. The Department has a number of initiatives aimed at supporting the community and voluntary sector in rural and urban areas, and is currently reviewing the permit regimes relating to the community transport sector in order to reduce the barriers to further expansion

Mr. Todd: On that point, I referred specifically to considering partnerships with local employers on transport packages. In my area, for example, a major employer such as Toyota, which obviously produces motor vehicles, would, I am sure, welcome an opportunity to work with other transport providers to provide appropriate transport to bring its employees in and out of work.

Charlotte Atkins: That is absolutely right. We should not forget the bicycle in this respect, as there are tax incentives for employers to provide bicycles to employees at good rates, to ensure that they encourage employees to come to work by bicycle rather than provide them with a car parking space. There are many ways in which employers can encourage sustainable transport policies.

One of the most significant initiatives has been the extension to many community transport operators of the bus service operators grant. Since its introduction in May 2002, more than 800 community transport operators in England have become eligible, and I understand that all the Derbyshire schemes are now claiming. This is a continuing grant providing the organisations concerned with significant help in meeting their operating costs.

With regard to the interests of rural communities in particular, since 1998 the Department has provided significant levels of funding to improve the provision of bus services in rural areas. The rural bus challenge scheme, which has funded 300 projects, has been successful in making possible the development of a wide range of innovative schemes. It has helped many successful projects to become established and to reach the stage of being strong candidates for mainstream funding from local authorities or other sources. It has demonstrated the potential, in particular, of flexibly routed and demand-responsive services in the meeting of local transport needs. More specifically, the Department provided nearly £500,000 for the 2003 rural bus challenge competition for four different rural transport schemes in south Derbyshire involving community transport providers. While we have helped to stimulate many of those initiatives, I acknowledge the hard work and dedication that community groups have invested in improving the quality of life for the many people who rely on them.

Of course we recognise that the funding regimes I have outlined do not provide a long-term funding base for schemes, but that was never our intention, and we made it clear from the outset of the rural—and urban—bus challenge that it was never intended to be a source of permanent revenue support. The main aim was to show the scope for innovation and new approaches, and to get projects under way that would then become part of the mainstream in terms of funding. While I recognise the pressures on local authority resources for revenue support of buses, I should point out that overall Government grant has increased for this year by 7.3 per cent., and by 30 per cent. since 1997.

Some authorities clearly have an exceptional record of working in close and supportive partnership with community transport. Derbyshire is one such authority: its record is commendable and long standing. Others, however, have not yet recognised the value of working in partnership. Many are continuing to provide funding one year at a time. That gives no basis for planning or development.

I believe that it is also important to engage community transport providers in the local transport plan process at a strategic level, in recognition of their contribution to public transport delivery. Again, I acknowledge that Derbyshire is at the forefront of that approach. The LTP guidance to local authorities emphasises the need to encourage active involvement by that sector, but too many community and voluntary transport providers continue to be treated as an optional extra in the transport mix. Those issues too are addressed in the accessibility planning guidance.

Where do we go from here in terms of funding? We all recognise that community and voluntary transport schemes are vital to the mix of transport provision. The Government want to do all that they can to ensure that such schemes can thrive. As we have heard today, the funding issue is a key factor in determining how the sector can continue and develop effectively. It is important that for those involved to be able to share their experiences, learn from others and develop their funding policies with the broadest possible understanding of the sector. To that end, we have commissioned the Community Transport Association to produce a good practice guide to funding. The association is due to deliver the guide early this year, and we intend to make it widely available to all involved. Moreover, the funding issue will no doubt be considered in the context of a research project that we have commissioned to look at the role of community transport in reducing social exclusion. One of the aims of that work is to identify and evaluate the funding regimes available to the sector.

As part of our commitment to the compact with the voluntary sector, we have now completed the "working in partnership with the voluntary and community sector" strategy and action plan. That document outlines how the Department has met, and will continue to meet, the aims of the compact. Through continued liaison with the sector, we will obtain views on the Government's transport agenda and on barriers that voluntary organisations face in providing a full and sustainable service. A community liaison manager has been in post for six months to deal with that.

Our role is to provide a policy, regulatory and financial framework at national level so that the transport system works for everyone. That is a challenging task, but one that we are committed to completing.

Question put and agreed to.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

The Deputy Prime Minister was asked—

Housing (South-East)

1. Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): What representations he has received about the scale of proposed house building in the south-east; and if he will make a statement. [207359]

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): We have received the regional assembly's proposals for the east of England for the period up to 2021, which are now out to public consultation and will be considered in a public examination by an independent panel in September. Proposals for house building in the south-east up to 2026 are expected later this year.

Mr. Francois: I thank the Deputy Prime Minister for that reply. He will be aware that, in November 2004, the East of England regional assembly, which encompasses some south-eastern counties, voted for a house building target of 478,000 dwellings by 2021. In December, the same body withdrew its endorsement for its own target on account of the lack of Government infrastructure funding to accompany the house building. Now that even the Deputy Prime Minister's own quango has turned on him, will he—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

The Deputy Prime Minister: Any judgment about how many houses are needed in the north-east will be considered not only by the proposals—[HON. MEMBERS: "The south-east."] It is the same for the south-east and for the east of England. To be clear, the proposals considered included some parts of the south-east as well as the east of England but, whatever the figures, they will be decided in public consultation. I will then appoint an independent review and it will make judgments about whether there is sufficient transport investment—which I believe there will be—to meet the housing requirements. Let the review make its recommendations, and then I will make a proper judgment about them.

It is rather curious that the hon. Gentleman calls in aid the regional assemblies just when the Conservatives are recommending in the James review to get rid of them as well as the regional government offices that they set up. Some 3,000 people would be made unemployed and the land of the regional development agencies would be sold off. The good, old James proposals go back to the old formula: more on the dole, fewer public services and the typical boom-and-bust policy of the Tories.

Mr. Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): We have 8,000 homes in our local plan for the next 10 years. Does my right hon. Friend accept that if the Rushenden link road were built on the Isle of Sheppey it would allow 1,000 extra houses to be built that could be given over to key workers and older people? Some 15,500 older people need housing on the Isle of Sheppey, so will he consider that proposal in the near future?

The Deputy Prime Minister: My hon. Friend has made a considerable contribution to this discussion. As he knows, the proposal is under active consideration by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning. We hope shortly to make a further statement on matters relating to key housing and social housing.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings) (Con): The national land use database reveals that 5,700 hectares of brownfield land have been identified by local authorities as being suitable for housing in the south-east. When that would provide nearly 140,000 new homes, why has less than a third of that land been taken up for housing? Instead of the Deputy Prime Minister's usual bluster, will he confirm that he wants to blitz Britain's countryside because he is absolutely determined to fulfil his pledge that the Labour party invented the green belt and he means to build on it?

The Deputy Prime Minister: That was cutting. Let me give the hon. Gentleman a couple of facts. When we came in, 56 per cent. of houses were built on brownfield sites. The figure has now gone up to 67 per cent. and even beyond the target that we set. That is a remarkable achievement. Secondly, the density of housing has now increased from 25 to 33 per hectare. Therefore, we can now build the 200,000 houses that we need for the south-east on the same amount of land that the Conservatives were building on in 1997.

Local Government

2. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): What proportion of local government spending was (a) met by Government grant and (b) raised locally in the 2004–05 financial year. [207360]

The Minister for Local and Regional Government (Mr. Nick Raynsford): In the 2004–05 financial year, budget estimates indicate that 74 per cent. of local government revenue expenditure is being met by Government grant, including redistributed business rates, and 26 per cent. by council tax.

Paddy Tipping: Is not the balance of funding wrong? Should not more money be raised locally so that local councillors are more accountable? Is it not a fact that, ultimately, the council tax is unsustainable? When can we see the results of the Lyons review and action on it?

Mr. Raynsford: I have a lot of sympathy for the views expressed by my hon. Friend. As he will know, the balance of funding review reported in July last year and concluded that there are strong arguments for shifting the balance towards more local funding, but that depends on the feasibility and desirability of any measures that might be used to achieve it. That is precisely what the Lyons inquiry is looking at, and it expects to report by the end of this year.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton) (LD): The Minister says that the Lyons review is considering these issues. Will he confirm that it is subject to the Freedom of Information Act 2000? What support is his Department giving Sir Michael Lyons to ensure that the inquiry's working papers and research are accessible to the public as soon as they are available?

Mr. Raynsford: The Lyons inquiry is independent, so the hon. Gentleman should pose his question directly to Sir Michael Lyons himself. However, I assure him that a great deal of detailed work has been done. As he will know, because there was a Liberal Democrat representative on the balance of funding review, all the working papers were made publicly available. He will also know only too well that the evidence makes it clear that his party's proposal for a local income tax is a mistake and that it would be impractical and not in the long-term interests of the country.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton) (Lab): When considering local government expenditure and finance, will my right hon. Friend examine the major problem that is developing in many areas because health and social care is funded by the Department of Health and local government? Will he take into consideration the need for local authorities properly to fund health and social care?

Mr. Raynsford: My hon. Friend makes a fair point, but he will be aware that under recent settlements there has been a sustained increase in local government funding, with a 33 per cent. increase in real terms since 1997. Specifically, the funding that is targeted on social care has increased above the average, so the Government are well aware of the need and are putting money into local government to ensure that the needs of communities are met without imposing unreasonable council tax increases.

Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden) (Con): Since 1997, council tax has risen by 70 per cent. and average bills are set to top £1,000—the highest ever. At the same time, council tax receipts to the Treasury have soared by 80 per cent. Does the Minister accept that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has been filling the Chancellor's coffers by stealth and that the sooner it is gone, the sooner we can restore fairness and accountability to local government?

Mr. Raynsford: In terms of fairness and accountability, when the hon. Lady's party was in power grants to local government were cut year after year and local authorities were faced with the real problem of trying to meet local needs without adequate finance. Since this Government have been in power, the grant to local government has increased by 33 per cent. in real terms, which has enabled councils to budget prudently. If she were really worried about council tax, she would be talking to Conservative councils, because they had the unenviable record last year of setting larger increases than Labour councils—5.4 per cent. compared with 4.7 per cent. Labour is leading the way on keeping council tax down.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside) (Lab/Co-op): How much of Liverpool's growing success does my right hon. Friend attribute to the Government's increased funding for its local services?

Mr. Raynsford: My hon. Friend makes a good point. It has been possible for councils throughout the country to make real improvements, as the comprehensive performance assessment published by the Audit Commission at the end of last year demonstrated. There have been real improvements to performance, and public needs have been met more effectively because of much more generous funding from the Government, and we are proud of that.

House Building

3. Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): When he next expects to meet representatives of county councils from East Anglia to discuss house building targets. [207361]

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Keith Hill): The East of England regional assembly produced a draft spatial strategy in November, which included modest increases in house building figures. The Government will give their response to the proposals in the course of the public consultation that is under way and will be followed by an examination in public later this year. Of course, if the Conservative party were to come to power during that period, its planned £1 billion cut to the housing budget would mean fewer homes for the sons and daughters of hard-working families in the east of England, less affordable housing and more homelessness.

Mr. Bellingham: Is the Minister not aware that his house building targets for East Anglia have met overwhelming opposition—even the East of England regional assembly rejected them? Does he not understand that people in Norfolk want more affordable housing for local people, not thousands of ugly four-bedroom homes on greenfield sites that will be bought by commuters, second-home owners and retired people?

Keith Hill: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the East of England regional assembly voted in favour of the new planning figures before the Tories on it voted against them a fortnight later. He talks about affordable housing, but the fact of matter is that the east of England region has received the highest increase in new investment for affordable housing—50 per cent.—of any region in the country. Under the proposals in the James report, all that investment would be removed, so what would the hon. Gentleman say to his constituents whose children are desperately in need of homes in which to live?

Mr. Stephen McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green) (Lab): Could those representatives and the representatives of all other Tory authorities be advised of the implications not only for housing but for a range of Government initiatives directed at the poorest sections of society if the act of wilful vandalism promised by the shadow Chancellor were ever to be visited on the Department?

Keith Hill: My hon. Friend is entirely right. That set of proposals would devastate investment in our cities, investment in housing and investment in essential local services. The Conservatives will be held responsible in the months ahead, and we look forward to their having to account to themselves and their electorate for such devastating proposals.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex) (Con): May I point out to the Minister that his Government's record on building social housing and reducing homelessness is a good deal worse than that of the last Conservative Government? May I serve notice on him that the people of Great Bromley, Elmstead and Frating do not want a Labour-inspired new town imposed on rural Essex? Rural north Essex is not for sale.

Keith Hill: The hon. Gentleman ought to revisit his statistics. The Government are investing three times the level of funding for new social housing that we inherited in 1997. Under the new proposals only an additional one in eight new homes is proposed for the east of England region. If those homes are not to be delivered, he must explain to families in his constituency why their children, who are so desperately in need of new homes, will not receive them and why the Conservative party opposes that provision.

Housing Renewal

4. Valerie Davey (Bristol, West) (Lab): What steps his Department is taking to identify and spread good practice by local government in housing renewal work. [207362]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): The Department is fully committed to improving the quality of the private sector housing stock by encouraging, through financial support and guidance, the development of innovative housing renewal policies by local authorities. In particular, the Department is supporting the work of the four councils awarded beacon status for housing renewal in 2004. I am pleased to put on record the excellent leadership role played by Bristol city council as one of those four beacon authorities.

Valerie Davey: Indeed. Bristol city council's housing section has been awarded additional funding, particularly in connection with training for the health and safety ratings system, and in relation to houses in multiple occupation it has involved the police, the fire service and the university in that training. Will my hon. Friend join me in commending the department's staff for the quality and range of the work that they are doing?

Phil Hope: My hon. Friend is right. I am delighted to congratulate the staff of Bristol council and its partnership agencies with which they have been working to protect the health and safety of the most vulnerable tenants, who are at the forefront of our drive to improve housing conditions. We would like other local councils to follow the example of authorities such as Bristol in establishing those strong partnerships so that we can protect vulnerable families in high-risk housing. Such families would suffer most from the £1 billion cuts to housing budgets that the Opposition would inflict on local authorities, were they ever to get into power.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet) (Con): Is it the Minister's experience after two years that the Regulatory Reform (Housing Assistance) (England and Wales) Order 2002 is working better than the old Housing Grants, Construction and Regeneration Act 1996? If so, will he say how many properties have benefited in kind or in cash, excluding those that were being helped and continue to be helped by disabled facilities grants—about 27,000 grants a year?

Phil Hope: I may not be able to give a detailed reply now to the hon. Gentleman's questions about people with disabilities, but the regulatory reform order on housing renewal has been very successful. It has given housing authorities greater discretion in giving grants, loans and equity release packages to homeowners, as well as the grants. We set a target to increase the proportion of vulnerable households in the private sector who live in decent homes from 57 per cent. in 2001 to 70 per cent. in 2010. That is good news for those vulnerable households. I will write to the hon. Gentleman with the details that he asked for. I might also include in the note the potential impact of the £1 billion cut in housing budgets that the Tory party would inflict on those vulnerable households and families.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): I am sure that my hon. Friend would like to identify as an example of good practice the work of Sheffield city council and tenants' representatives in the city in consulting on and then developing and creating the citywide and area arm's-length management organisations, which will certainly improve the city's housing in the next few years and bring it to a decent standard. Will he give an assurance that, as part of the internal review on ALMOs, there will be no reduction in the funding available to ALMOs to create decent homes, and that there will be no attempt to remove the right of ALMO tenants to have their homes remain in the ownership of the city council, which is one of their most important features?

Phil Hope: I am happy to congratulate Sheffield on its excellent record. The important feature of an ALMO is that the stock remains in the ownership of the local authority. There are now 50 ALMOs covering a total of some 700,000 council homes—about one in three of all local authority stock. That is a remarkable achievement. Those homes are being improved. Hundreds of millions of pounds are being spent—with another £2 billion being invested to upgrade homes in the social sector—to ensure that vulnerable people, people from all walks of life, have decent homes in which to live.

Travellers

5. Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): If he will make a statement on enforcement action available to local authorities in respect of unauthorised Travellers' sites. [207363]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Yvette Cooper): Local authorities have a range of enforcement powers available to prevent inappropriate development. They need more powers to be able to take swift action to prevent damage from being done, and that is why we are introducing temporary stop notices. We also expect local councils to do more to identify appropriate sites so that Gypsies and Travellers have somewhere else to go.

Ann Winterton: Middlewich and the surrounding areas in my constituency have been blighted over a number of years by illegal encampments, and local residents believe that the Human Rights Act 1998 militates against the law-abiding citizen. Notwithstanding the Minister's reply, even more robust powers are needed to allow local authorities to seize and remove illegally parked caravans, and to allow courts to levy fines that—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady is making a speech.

Yvette Cooper: The hon. Lady will know that I obviously cannot comment on the details of her individual case, but I can say that local councils have powers to remove caravans at the end of the planning process, for example, and the police can take action where there are unauthorised encampments. I disagree with her concerns about the Human Rights Act, which insists that the rights and responsibilities of Gypsies and Travellers be considered, but also the rights and responsibilities of the settled community. The real underlying problem here is that we do not have enough appropriate sites for Gypsies and Travellers to move on to. If we expand the number of appropriate sites, it will be possible to take much swifter action. More enforcement is needed, but that needs to go hand in hand with local councils doing more to identify appropriate sites as well.

Andrew Bennett (Denton and Reddish) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that the real problem is the lack of sites for Travellers, and is it not high time that local authorities were forced to provide sites and to ensure that under the planning system Travellers can buy land to provide sites?

Yvette Cooper: The Select Committee on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, which my hon. Friend chairs, has done some important work on the issue. I agree that we need more sites, and that is why we are consulting on new planning guidance, which would oblige local authorities to identify sites in their local plans, and if they did not the planning inspector would be able to intervene.

Affordable Housing

6. Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): If he will make a statement on the provision of quality affordable housing. [207364]

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): Investment in affordable housing will be about £2 billion in 2007–08—double what it was in 1997. This will provide for 75,000 new social homes for rent by 2008 and help a further 40,000 into home ownership. New build homes from that programme will fulfil regionally identified needs and reach the demanding standards for design quality and environmental performance.

Sir Nicholas Winterton: Does the Deputy Prime Minister accept that quality affordable housing often forms part of a larger development? Does he therefore accept from me that the housing moratorium that exists in my constituency is very damaging indeed to the provision of affordable housing? Will he therefore remove that moratorium to enable the economic progress of my constituency to continue and to enable affordable housing to be provided?

The Deputy Prime Minister rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the Deputy Prime Minister replies, I say to the House that the noise is intolerable. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Perhaps those who are cheering me on will take heed.

The Deputy Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that we have improved the quality and design of the houses built, which are reaching a far higher standard. There is no moratorium with regard to social housing. I have looked into the figures, and I can say that there is no moratorium for new homes in Macclesfield; indeed, there are 12,790 additional homes each year, and 1,600 of them will be in Cheshire. That is hardly a moratorium. He must recall that, when he was in the previous Administration, housing investment halved in its last four years, while it has doubled under this Government, providing more homes. I suggest that he talks to those on his Front Bench, as the recent James proposal would take £1 billion out of housing in his constituency and everyone else's.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley) (Lab): Given the increasing number of homeless people throughout the United Kingdom—it is starting to rise in every council area—does the Deputy Prime Minister agree that we should be building houses or encouraging local authorities to spend money to build houses for rent for these unfortunate people?

The Deputy Prime Minister: We have more than doubled the amount of investment since we came to power, and we are encouraging local authorities to invest more in both the improvement of housing and other proposals, even building new housing. I will make a statement about this matter shortly. It is of absolute importance that we build more homes in both the public and private sectors, and we are doing that, but as my hon. Friend will be aware, we inherited such a backlog that we still have some way to go.

Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): How many of those new affordable homes will be council houses? The Deputy Prime Minister must accept that the private sector has not delivered; that housing associations do not have enough resources and that the number of new council houses built by new Labour is only 3,000 in seven years. The Thatcher Tory Government built 350,000 council houses in their first seven years in power.

The Deputy Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman has asked a great deal of questions about housing, so he must surely be aware that he should take into account how many social houses are being provided. I understand the point about council housing, but many houses are built by the Housing Corporation, and transform building will improve many houses, so it is a different category of definition. I say to the hon. Gentleman that I am not against building council houses, but at the moment there is a desperate need for us to put the investment back into improving the £19 billion disinvestment in council housing that had taken place when we came to power in 1997. Bringing 2 million houses up to decent standards is our objective, and we are on our way to completing it.

Grassmoor Lagoons

7. Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): If he will discuss with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry extending funding approved for remedial work and development at the former Avenue Cokeworks site in north-east Derbyshire to the clearing up of the connected tar beds deposited at Grassmoor lagoons. [207365]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Phil Hope): The Government of course accept that they have inherited a liability in respect of the Grassmoor site. My hon. Friend is aware that the Department of Trade and Industry has agreed to fund a study, which is already under way and will, we hope, be completed around May this year, to update the remediation strategy on that site.

Mr. Barnes: Is my hon. Friend aware that Grassmoor lagoons are in the middle of a country park and contain residue from a cocktail of chemicals deposited in liquid from nearby Avenue cokeworks, which was closed 12 years ago, although it is brought back to life when it rains, creating many problems in the area? Now that the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has supplied a very welcome £104 million to tackle the problems of Avenue cokeworks, does that not add to the case for the Grassmoor lagoons to be dealt with, which means that we should encourage the Department of Trade and Industry to act quickly?

Phil Hope: I have some good news for my hon. Friend and his neighbour, my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner): the Department of Trade and Industry has already put aside an additional £4 million to cover liabilities at the Grassmoor site, and it will make a further announcement once the strategy is complete. That is good news for the environment and the local community. In sharp contrast, the Conservative party would make cuts through its £1 billion attack on the ODPM and the housing budget.

Fire and Rescue Control

8. Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): If he will make a statement on his planned regionalisation of fire and rescue control rooms. [207366]

The Minister for Local and Regional Government (Mr. Nick Raynsford): The plan to replace the existing 46 control rooms in England with a network of nine regional control centres is being implemented for reasons of resilience and public safety. The new centres will ensure more effective responses to local, regional or national incidents, while also allowing a more efficient redeployment of resources.

Mr. Robertson: Is the Minister aware of the enormous opposition to that scheme across the country from councils, local people and the fire service itself? Why does he feel that all those people are wrong and that he is right? Will he take into account the circumstances in Gloucestershire, where the fire and rescue service emergency room has recently moved into a new tristar centre? His proposal is not only expensive but wrong.

Mr. Raynsford: Everyone who examines the issue closely realises that the new investment will provide enormous gains through better technology, which will identify where calls come from and automatically mobilise those appliances best placed to respond to them. When people understand the implications, they welcome the investment, which will improve the quality of the service and save lives. As far as Gloucestershire is concerned, his county's current tri-service arrangement involves the expenditure of £112 on each incident, whereas the cost of the regional control centre will be £52 per incident. Halving the cost will allow money to be spent on fire prevention and saving lives.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1. [207344] Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 12 January.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): Before I list my engagements, and in view of my statement to the House on Monday on the tsunami, I shall update the House on the current figures for British losses. The number of confirmed dead remains at 51. The number of category 1 missing—those most likely to be lost—is, including the 51 confirmed dead, now 410, which is down from 453 on Monday. The category 2 figure—those unaccounted for but not in the highly likely category—now stands at 624, which is down from 871 on Monday.

I am sure that all hon. Members will join me in sending our warmest congratulations to the newly elected Palestinian President, Abu Mazen. Let us hope that his victory with a strong majority and strong mandate will give us the chance to move the middle east peace process forward.

This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

Vera Baird: Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating Redcar steelworks, which won a contract in December to export all the steel that it can produce for the next 10 years? The regional development agency supported that process, as it recently supported investment in the Teesside chemicals industry. Unemployment in my constituency is now being slashed. Will my right hon. Friend ensure that RDAs are not cut from future budgets?

The Prime Minister: I congratulate my hon. and learned Friend's constituents on winning the necessary contracts for steel production in Redcar and elsewhere. Under this Government, the RDAs will continue to have the budget that they need to make a difference to thousands of jobs up and down this country. We therefore completely reject the Conservative party's proposals, which are to cut the budgets of the RDAs, to put more people in the dole queue and to place our local economies at risk.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe) (Con): I am grateful to the Prime Minister for his statement on the victims of the tsunami. I wholeheartedly join him in the congratulations that he has expressed to Abu Mazen. I am sure that the whole House hopes that the election will mark a significant step forward in the middle east peace process.

When the Chancellor told the Prime Minister that

"there is nothing that you could ever say to me now that I could ever believe", how did the Prime Minister reply?

The Prime Minister: I am afraid that the question does not arise, since the Chancellor did not say that to me; the claim in the book happens to be wrong.

Let us turn to the issue of substance and policy. Since the right hon. and learned Gentleman has mentioned the Chancellor, let us talk about the economy. Perhaps he will explain why under this Government, since 1997, there are 2 million more jobs, and perhaps he will confirm that when he was Employment Secretary there were 1 million more unemployed. I know that the Conservative party does not want to hear that, but that is what they will be hearing from now until polling day.

Mr. Howard: The Prime Minister denies that the Chancellor said those things, but the Chancellor yesterday had every opportunity to deny them and, as we all know, he pointedly refused to deny them. Perhaps the Prime Minister is the only person who did not notice. What the Chancellor said could not be more damning. He said that "There is nothing that you could ever say to me now that I could ever believe".

Why did the Chancellor not deny that yesterday?

The Prime Minister: Both the Chancellor and I have dismissed what is in books as the tittle-tattle that it is. Let us turn to another policy issue. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said yesterday that it is time that we focused on the people's priorities, so let us focus on one: mortgages. Will he confirm—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister are allowed some leeway during Prime Minister's Question Time.

The Prime Minister: When the right hon. and learned Gentleman was a member of the last Conservative Government, interest rates were at 15 per cent. for a year and at 10 per cent. for four years. Under this Government they have been halved. Is not that what we should focus on?

Mr. Howard: The Chancellor says what we all think: the Prime Minister goes on and on about all these things but no one believes a word he says. The Prime Minister can clear all this up very simply. Did he ever say to the Chancellor that he was going to stand down before the election—yes or no?

The Prime Minister: I have dealt with that on a number of occasions. I have explained why no one does deals over jobs such as this. That has been said constantly.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that no one would believe a word we say. Well, there are 2 million more jobs. Mortgage rates have been half of what they were under the Conservative Government. Mortgages, inflation and unemployment are the lowest that they have been for over 30 years. Which one of those statements is false?

Mr. Howard: The Prime Minister says—[Interruption.] The Prime Minister says that he does not do deals over his job, but he did a deal over his job over dinner at Granita. He did a deal over dinner at Admiralty house. He is the deals on meals Prime Minister. No wonder the Chancellor is not a happy eater.

Now let me tell the Prime Minister why these things matter. The spokesman for senior civil servants has said that "Number Ten and the Treasury ... have ... conflicting and competing agendas for Government".

He said that

"Departments . . . have to try to make sense of this battle".

He also said:

"It's not good Government."

This is something that goes directly to the heart of Government. That is why it is important. So let me ask the Prime Minister again: did he tell the Chancellor that he would stand down? Does he deny it—yes or no?

The Prime Minister: I have already dealt with that on a number of occasions and I have no intention of going back over it again.

I notice that the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not deny a single one of the economic facts that I gave him. Perhaps he will also confirm this: that as well as the economic record on low mortgages, low inflation, low levels of unemployment, and high levels of employment, waiting lists are now down by more than 300,000 on the number that we inherited from him, and primary school results are now up from just over half the kids getting them to almost 75 per cent. Perhaps he will also confirm this: that under this Government, there are 12,000 more police officers. When he was Home Secretary, he cut the numbers of police officers by 1,000—true or false?

Mr. Howard: Crime fell by 18 per cent. when I was Home Secretary—that is all anybody needs to know about my record. The Prime Minister wants to talk about his record, so I will tell him about it. We have more than 1 million children playing truant from schools, we have more people dying from hospital infections than dying on Britain's roads, and there are more than 1 million violent crimes. How can there be discipline in schools when there is no discipline in Government? How can they clean up our hospitals when they cannot clean up their act? How can they fight crime when they are fighting each other?

The Prime Minister: I can tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman very simply. At long last, we have got on to our record, so let us be quite clear what it is: under this Government, we have economic stability and success. When he was a member of the last Government, there were two recessions. People remember the negative equity, the high mortgages and the 3 million unemployed. They remember what happened under the last Conservative Government, and they remember something else that I have not mentioned before—that he was the Minister responsible for introducing the poll tax. [Interruption.] Well, come on—true or false? Did he introduce it? Yes, he did. Therefore, at the next election, whenever it comes, he can stick up whatever he likes on billboards about something in a book, but what the public will concentrate on are the low mortgages, low inflation and low unemployment that we delivered and he failed to.

Mr. Clive Soley (Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush) (Lab): Is not one of the questions that will interest the people of this country for many years to come that of baby bonds, which come into full effect in April? Am I not right in saying that we need to give full publicity to this, because it not only starts people off with a pocket of money but enables others to put money into those accounts to encourage saving and, above all, to help to end poverty when those youngsters reach the age of 18 with a significant sum of money for the future?

The Prime Minister: I agree entirely with what my hon. Friend says about baby bonds—the child trust fund—which will be very popular in the country and will help to encourage saving as well as giving young people some stake in the future of the country. However, there are other areas, such as child care, where we are extending the boundaries and frontiers of the welfare state. That is why it is so important that we continue the investment in such things throughout the next few years, and why the Conservatives' proposals, which would cut public spending in some of these vital areas, would be so disastrous for Britain.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West) (LD): I am sure that the Prime Minister would wish to join me in paying tribute to the emergency personnel across the north of England and the length and breadth of Scotland who are coping with the severity of the atrocious weather of the past few hours. Indeed, Mr. Brian Downie, the principal emergency planning officer of the Highland region, described it to me earlier today as the worst that he has experienced professionally in almost 20 years. I am sure that we are all grateful to these people, who are working tirelessly and in dangerous conditions to restore power and other services to people throughout the communities affected.

Turning to a political issue, does the Prime Minister acknowledge that the Chancellor's proposal for a Marshall plan for Africa can be realised only if the United States, in particular, were to come on board? Does he agree that one of the best ways to convince President Bush of this approach and to support the international finance facility is to ensure that it is based on the principle of good governance within Africa and on the fact that people can be reassured, not least in the States, that the money that is being given is used properly for the purposes for which it was given?

The Prime Minister: On the first point, it is right to pay tribute to all who have been involved in the emergency response to the floods—the fire, ambulance and police services, the local authorities, the Environment Agency, the Scottish Environment Protection Agency, the coastguard, mountain rescue and those involved in the military aspect. We should also thank the voluntary organisations, because they are helping to care for those affected. I offer condolences, I am sure on behalf of the House, to the families of those killed and extend sympathy to those who are experiencing stress and structural damage to their homes. My hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment will respond to an urgent question in the House on that afterwards.

On the Africa plan that we intend to put to the G8 this year, the international finance facility is one way, although not the only way, to extend the amount of aid that will be available to Africa. I also entirely agree that good governance and, for example, conflict resolution must form part of the plan that we intend to present.

Mr. Kennedy: I thank the Prime Minister for both replies. He will know about the interest in recent reports that he may be considering merging the Foreign Office with the Department for International Development, to create a new super-Ministry. Is that proposal under active consideration? If so, does the Prime Minister believe that the Chancellor of the Exchequer might consider that post to be the suitable job promotion that he is looking for?

The Prime Minister: I am sorry to say that that is not under consideration. The creation of a special Department for International Development has been a worthwhile innovation by the Government. There was some nervousness about it in many quarters—possibly even in some parts of the Foreign Office—when it happened. However, one of the most interesting aspects of events in the past seven and a half years has been the establishment of our Department for International Development as probably the most respected such Department in the world. I want to keep it that way.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North) (Lab): In connection with the recent extreme weather conditions in many parts of the United Kingdom, will the Prime Minister join me in expressing special appreciation to the employees of the power companies who have worked so valiantly to keep the power supply going, often in treacherous conditions? Will he also acknowledge that the robustness of the power infrastructure in any part of the country in such circumstances is directly related to ongoing investment and maintenance? We therefore welcome the recent Ofgem price review, which made some progress on that, but will my right hon. Friend ensure that every corner of the country is served by power infrastructure companies that are obliged to make the necessary investment at all times to avoid power cuts when such conditions occur?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend is right. I am happy to pay tribute to the work of the employees of the power companies. I should add that it is also important to maintain the investment in flood defences, which is now approximately £570 million a year, or due to be that amount in the next financial year. I am afraid that that shows the extent of the investment that we have to make to deal with what people increasingly regard as changed weather circumstances that have something of a permanent feature. That is one reason why it is important for the G8 to focus on climate change as well as Africa.

Q2. [207345] Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): In the past three years, I have spent much time interrogating civil servants. On all occasions, I have found them to be frustratingly loyal to Government in presenting Government policy as a seamless robe. How, therefore, does the Prime Minister respond to Mr. Jonathan Baume, the leader of the First Division Association—the mandarins' union—who recently said, not in a book but in a recorded statement, that civil servants were having difficulty in making sense of the competing agendas of No. 10 and the Treasury? If civil servants are loyal to Government, is not loyalty a two-way street?

The Prime Minister: As I told the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard) a moment ago, the Government's agenda is clear on the economy and investment in public services. The most important thing is to point out that, for example, last Friday, we had the waiting list figures for the national health service, compiled on exactly the same basis as they have been compiled for years, and as a result not only of investment but of reform in the NHS, they are at their lowest since records began. Now that is a demonstration of the Government's commitment.

I understand civil servants' anxiety, particularly when we are asking for big job reductions in the civil service, but we can see in the record of this Government the ability not just to run the economy well but to invest in public services. I should like to quote back to the hon. Gentleman something that he said on the "Politics Show" a short time ago:

"What I believe is that if you want to spend more money on the NHS, if you want to spend more money on state education, you are going to vote Labour".

I fully endorse those sentiments.

Q3. [207346] Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): In the run-up to Christmas last year, UK lenders sent out 140 million unsolicited, pre-approved credit card application forms, and a similar number of unsolicited, pre-approved personal loan applications. Does the Prime Minister condemn the tactics used by many credit card companies and banks to encourage families to take on levels of debt that they cannot possibly afford? Will he consider further measures to curb this irresponsible marketing?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right on the general point that he makes about the importance of legislation such as the Consumer Credit Bill, which I understand has its Commons Second Reading tomorrow. That is obviously important. There is also an action plan, which we published last July. In the priorities that it sets out for work by consumer credit companies, banks and others, the access to affordable credit and high-quality, free debt advice is central. I agree that it is important that the powers that these companies have should be exercised responsibly, and we will do our level best to ensure that they are.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge) (Con): In case after case before the courts, local authorities have lost out to Travellers pleading the human rights agenda in defence of unauthorised encampments. Are the Government willing to legislate to stop human rights laws being used to drive a coach and horses through our planning system, as the Leader of the Opposition has pledged a Conservative Government would do?

The Prime Minister: We have the new enforcement notices coming into provision this week—

Mr. Hammond indicated dissent.

The Prime Minister: Before the hon. Gentleman shakes his head, perhaps he will listen to my answer. This is a new power that will allow local authorities to act very quickly indeed. However, let me make it clear that, if the experience of that new power—which local authorities and others say will be both necessary and important in enforcing the law properly—turns out to be inadequate, we will look at this again. I entirely agree that the interests of the ordinary public have to come first, but we want to ascertain, first of all, whether the legislation that we already have is deficient in some way before we look at fresh legislation. We believe that it will not be deficient, and that it will work.

Q4. [207347] Ms Karen Buck (Regent's Park and Kensington, North) (Lab): After years in development, the business case for the revised Paddington health campus has just been submitted to the Department of Health. This is the most prestigious and ambitious hospital development to have been attempted in this country, and the benefits will be huge. It will mean new facilities, and clinical and financial benefits, for international institutions such as the Brompton, Harefield and St. Mary's hospitals. It has been a difficult scheme to develop because it is ambitious and complex, but the cost of failure would be very great. Will my right hon. Friend ensure that it proceeds with all speed, as we are now within reach of one of the finest jewels in the NHS crown?

The Prime Minister: I know that the Minister of State, Department of Health, my right hon. Friend the Member for Barrow and Furness (Mr. Hutton), is attending a meeting next week to discuss this, and I actually know a bit about it myself, having seen the site. It is an extraordinary, imaginative design. My hon. Friend will know that, as a result of the action already taken, in-patient and out-patient waiting lists and the amount of time people have to wait at the accident and emergency department at St. Mary's are already substantially down from 1997. These will be state-of-the-art facilities that will serve not only that part of London but, in some respects, the whole of the country for years to come. Again, it is an example of why it is so important that we keep the investment programme in our national health service going. Under this Government, it will be kept going.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy) (PC): Does the Prime Minister recall promising in 1999 that anybody wishing to access NHS dental provision would be able to do so by the end of 2001? Will he now have the grace to say that that is a broken promise? If, as he says, the Chancellor did not say

"There is nothing that you could ever say to me now that I could ever believe", many of us believe that the Chancellor should have said it.

The Prime Minister: I accept that some people are still not getting access to NHS dentists. Let me tell the hon. Gentleman, however, what we are doing: we are bringing some 1,000 new dentists into the service; and we are working with the British Dental Association to try to make sure that we give people access to NHS care. Long-term issues associated with dentistry, however, must also be considered. I accept that these are difficult issues, but it is impossible for anyone to consider the national health service as a whole today, even with problems such as MRSA and others, and to say that it is not definitively better than it was in 1997. Yesterday, I was discussing with health service professionals things that have happened, such as the accident and emergency changes, and they said that whereas a few years ago we were held up at international symposiums as an example of a system that failed, at the most recent international symposium we were held up as an example of the fastest improving service.

Civil Service Jobs

Q5. [207348] Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Cunninghame, South) (Lab): What the timetable is for the proposed dispersal of civil service jobs; and what plans there are for the relocation of jobs to Ayrshire.

The Prime Minister: In broad terms, the timetable is that more than 4,000 posts will have been relocated out of London and the south-east by March 2005, another 6,000 by March 2008, and a further 10,000 by 2010. As I made clear in a letter to my hon. Friend, we are unable to say at this stage how many civil service jobs will be relocated to Ayrshire. Departments are currently working through detailed implementation planning in consultation with stakeholders, including union staff and local stakeholders.

Mr. Donohoe: I am grateful for that answer. I am sure that my right hon. Friend will be aware that I asked him a similar question on 10 November and got a similar answer. What he will not be aware of is that, in the interim, some 162 jobs have been lost with the transfer out of my constituency of civil service jobs in the Department for Work and Pensions. Consequently, will he agree to meet a small delegation to discuss this issue?

The Prime Minister: I will certainly be pleased to receive representations from my hon. Friend on the possibility of jobs being relocated to Ayrshire, and perhaps we can discuss further the possibility of a meeting.

Sir Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire) (LD): Could I possibly be included in the delegation that comes to see the Prime Minister about this important subject? The hon. Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Donohoe) is absolutely right that the Department for Work and Pensions is engaged in a series of centralisation measures that will reduce the numbers of jobs in many areas, such as Galashiels in south-east Scotland, which will feel it hard. Will he also bear in mind, if he is establishing criteria for the dispersal of civil service jobs in future, the fact that many regions will lose European structural funds after 2006, which should also be considered in respect of applications for relocation in future?

The Prime Minister: Two separate things are happening. First, we are trying to slim down the numbers of people in Government Departments. A lot of pressure comes from both sides of the House to do so. The Department for Work and Pensions, for example, has already announced a reduction in jobs in the region of 30,000. In terms of a global figure, most people support the process, because it makes sure that we spend money more effectively. Secondly, a relocation out of London to other parts of the United Kingdom is taking place. At the moment, I cannot say exactly where those jobs will go. Certainly, I will listen carefully to any representations that Members make, but ultimately, we are trying to balance the need for efficiency in the DWP and elsewhere with relocation out of London. Inevitably, jobs will be displaced from some areas as a result, but that may well be in the interests of the country as a whole.

Engagements

Q6. [207349] Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South) (Lab): A recent NAO survey revealed that women in Aberdeen earn only two thirds of male earnings—the largest pay gap in the whole of Scotland. While I accept that the Government have done quite a lot to address the gender pay gap, not least with the introduction of the minimum wage, what else can they do to end this inequality? Will my right hon. Friend encourage others, such as employers, to take the issue seriously rather than just shrugging their shoulders?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend's point is entirely fair, which is why the Women and Work Commission is considering precisely how we bridge the pay gap that still exists, as she rightly says. It is important to point out that only as a result of measures such as the minimum wage, the introduction of tax credits, enhanced maternity leave and enhanced child benefit have we been able to raise the incomes of women. It is important to keep all those measures in place, but the Women and Work Commission will look at some of the more fundamental issues so we can make sure that the equal-pay promise made by a Labour Government back in the 1970s is translated into action.

Mr. Stephen Dorrell (Charnwood) (Con): We understand that the Prime Minister has said that the manifesto on which he intends to fight the next election will be unremittingly new Labour. What words would he use to describe the manifesto on which the Chancellor plans to fight the next election?

The Prime Minister: Precisely the same. It will be a manifesto that makes sure that we continue the huge economic record, that we continue the investment—[Interruption.] Oh yes—and in particular it will make sure that, unlike the Government of whom the right hon. Gentleman was a member, who put pensioners and children in poverty, we continue with policies that lift pensioners and children out of poverty and create a fairer and stronger country.

Q7. [207350] David Winnick (Walsall, North) (Lab): In view of the Government's excellent work in dealing with antisocial behaviour in recent years, would it not be wise to reconsider the possible implementation of 24-hour drinking by pubs and other licensed premises? Does the Prime Minister not agree that binge drinking is already a very serious problem? What sense is there in allowing pubs to be open day and night?

The Prime Minister: I will tell my hon. Friend exactly what I think about this. Obviously it is important for us to listen to representations made to us about it. There is a problem with so-called binge drinking, and there is a problem in many places such as city centres where there is fighting outside pubs on Friday and Saturday nights, and sometimes on Thursday and Sunday nights. It should be remembered that we are also introducing greater powers for the police to shut down premises where such things happen.

My view is very clear. I believe that the law-abiding majority who want to be able, after going to, say, the cinema or theatre, to have a drink at the time they choose should not be inconvenienced. We should not have to have restrictions that no other city in Europe has just to do something about the tiny minority who abuse alcohol—who go out and fight and cause disturbances.

My view is very, very clear. We should have the same flexibility as other countries have, and then we should come down really hard on those who abuse that freedom and do not show responsibility. But to take away that ability from all the population, even the vast majority who are law-abiding, is not in my view sensible.

Severe Weather

12.32 pm

Pete Wishart (North Tayside) (SNP) (Urgent Question): To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Members are stepping in front of the hon. Gentleman who is addressing the House. That is a discourtesy to him and to the House.

Pete Wishart:— if she will make a statement on the severe weather conditions in Scotland, Northern Ireland and other parts of the United Kingdom. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): Issues relating to severe weather incidents are devolved to the respective Administrations. However, severe storms have hit Northern Ireland and Scotland in the last 24 hours and caused widespread damage, although full assessments have not yet been made. Let me take this opportunity to express sympathy, on behalf of the whole House, to those who have been affected by the storms, particularly in relation to the tragic deaths that have occurred in the borders and Northern Ireland.

Tidal surge and high winds last night caused widespread coastal flooding in the west of Scotland. Considerable damage was reported in the Lochaber area, with flooding in Fort William and Caol. The River Lochy and the Ness remain above flood-warning levels. Tidal flooding at Fort William and Caol last night was the highest in 10 years, with 20 houses evacuated and cars flooded. We expect a surge on the east coast of England later today, but although we expect flood warnings to be issued it is unlikely to cause serious flooding.

I made a statement to the House yesterday on flooding in northern England, which covered many of these issues.

Pete Wishart: I am grateful to the Minister for that thoughtful and helpful reply. I am sure that he agrees with me that the storms that have battered large swathes of Scotland, Northern Ireland and northern England have been particularly devastating and appalling. They have caused unprecedented damage to infrastructure, and many homes throughout those stricken areas remain without electricity or other power. This, of course, is on top of the devastating floods to which the Minister alluded.

I begin by offering my sympathy and condolences to the families of the three people known to have been killed in last evening's storms, including in the fatal incident on the A90 in my constituency. I join the Minister in paying tribute to the tireless work of our emergency and rescue services, which have worked round the clock to ensure that power is reconnected to many stricken communities and damaged infrastructure cleared. It is entirely appropriate to single out the work of the coastguard and the RAF, which as I speak are trying to save a stricken Spanish trawler off the Western Isles.

The Minister will doubtless agree that the priority now is to get Scotland, Northern Ireland and northern England moving again. Can he therefore assure me that he is doing all that he can to work closely with the Scottish Executive and local authorities to ensure that the clear-up work is being properly controlled and co-ordinated? Can he also tell me a little about how the Bellwin formula applies in co-ordination with devolved government? As he knows, the Scottish Executive apply that formula, but can further funds be made available to them to help deal with this problem?

Does the Minister agree that the events of recent days highlight the particular nature of Scotland's infrastructure needs, and will he therefore review the excessive charges now being proposed for electricity generators in the highlands and islands and the north-east of Scotland?

The weather in the past few days has shown that we are becoming increasingly vulnerable to climate change. Can the Minister therefore assure me that this Government will work with the international community to address the emissions problem, and does he agree that it is ironic that the most stricken areas are perhaps those with the greatest renewables potential?

Lastly, can the Minister assure me that he will do all that he can to ensure that the public receive all necessary warnings about future inclement weather, and that public safety is regarded as absolutely paramount?

Mr. Morley: As the hon. Gentleman will know, many of the issues that he raises are the responsibility of the devolved Administration, and the Scottish agencies have been working very hard in this regard. I join him in paying tribute to the emergency services, which have responded magnificently. He will be aware that detailed weather forecasts allowed many public and private sector organisations to take steps to mitigate the storm damage by, for example, cancelling trains and ferries. I understand that flood warnings were given and that the relevant system was activated. He might also be interested to know that as part of that process, the long-range RAF Nimrod planes operating in Scotland moved to Lincolnshire, as the severe winds would have prevented their use. As a result, they are able to do an excellent job in giving support to the fishing boat currently in difficulties to the west of Scotland.

I certainly agree with what the hon. Gentleman says about climate change, which is a reality. The 10 years since the beginning of the 1990s have been the warmest on record, and in the past decade we have had double the normal number of extreme weather incidents. We have to take all necessary steps to reduce the risk to people, bearing in mind that we cannot guarantee that extreme incidents or floods will not occur.

My understanding is that the Scottish Executive have a formula similar to the Bellwin formula, which they themselves operate. They will put it in place, according to the rules of the scheme.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (Lab/Co-op): I congratulate my hon. Friend on reacting so quickly by going to Carlisle immediately after the devastation occurred. I echo what my right hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) said during Prime Minister's questions: we must pay tribute not just to all the emergency services, which reacted so quickly, but to the electricity and other industries that also responded rapidly.

There is a danger—we saw it with the tsunami disaster and we are seeing it here again—of imagining that we can deal with such forces of nature, solve every problem and hold back the consequences in Canute style. There is also a danger, and the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) came close to it, as do his party colleagues, of sitting in the comfort—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman should resume his seat and the Minister will try to answer now.

Mr. Foulkes rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Morley: My right hon. Friend is absolutely right. Quite apart from the emergency services, tremendous commitment has been demonstrated in all the flood and gale-hit areas by people from the engineering and other utilities who have worked around the clock unstintingly to reconnect supplies of power and, in Northumberland, water that had been disrupted. I must also mention the voluntary sector, as people from the local communities have come forward and offered their time and support to help the people affected.

I agree with what my right hon. Friend said about the effects of the flooding and I can assure him that, whenever there is such a major incident, once the emergency is over, there will always be a full evaluation of what went well and consideration given to what might require further investment, organisation or structure. I am confident that the Scottish Executive and Scottish agencies will do that. It is important to note that we share our experience; indeed, the findings of the Bye report, following the Northampton flood of 1998, have helped us to deal with the recent emergencies. Those circumstances were English, but the findings of the report influenced the emergency structures and preparedness in all the Administrations. Those contingency plans worked well, as we have seen effective and efficient responses to the current emergency.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham) (Con): On behalf of Conservative Members, I add our sympathy to the families of those who have died, and to those injured or otherwise affected by the floods and storms, which have caused the loss of houses and property. I also thank and congratulate everyone who has worked so hard to ensure that as much help as possible has been given. That includes the RAF team, and let us hope that the outcome of its search is positive.

This is probably the first disaster that has affected Scotland since the Scottish Executive were set up. Some of the responsibilities are theirs and some are reserved to Westminster, as the Minister acknowledged. People who have lost homes and belongings will need one-off benefit payments and emergency relief. Can the Minister tell us what Whitehall Departments are doing to ensure that those who need such assistance receive it quickly? Telecommunications and power are also the responsibility of Whitehall. Is the Minister co-ordinating Whitehall Departments to ensure that those services are restored as quickly and efficiently as possible? Apart from the companies that are working exceedingly hard to restore services, can those Departments do more to help?

Will the Minister tell us whether the Scotland Office has any responsibility in all of this and whether it has sufficient resources to help those in need? Given that the Scotland Office is now part of the Department for Constitutional Affairs, are there sufficient staff knowledgeable enough about Scotland to be able to deal with the problems created by the terrible flooding? Given that the part-time Secretary of State for Scotland is in his place next to the Minister, perhaps the Minister will tell us why he, rather than the part-time Secretary of State, is answering.

Mr. Morley. It is a great shame that the hon. Lady feels the need to make a partisan point about such a serious problem as these gales. I can tell her that the Department for Work and Pensions will offer crisis loans to help those made destitute as a result of the floods if they have no assets or resources. She will be aware that the Government have no facility to help with insurable risks, but limited support may be offered to people who are in severe difficulty.

Dealing with the follow-on of the gales is a matter for the devolved Administrations, all of whom have the well-established contingency arrangements that I have described. Those tried and tested arrangements also cover the post-flood recovery period. Many of the other points raised by the hon. Lady are matters for the devolved Administrations. This urgent question relates to the whole of the UK, and touches on matters for which I have particular responsibility, such as the Meteorological Office, contingency planning and climate change.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): May I pay tribute to the work done by the fire and water engineers, who are extremely courageous and, frankly, often very brave in these circumstances? However, the unpalatable and awkward truth is that many of the people affected are either underinsured or—heaven help us—not insured at all. Should not the Government hold discussions with the insurance companies about what might be done? Some families face appalling problems because, whether it is their fault or not, they have neglected to arrange insurance. We might think that they should have done that, but they have not.

Mr. Morley: My hon. Friend makes a serious point, and I join him in paying tribute to the utilities engineers. Apart from the commitment that I mentioned earlier, they often work in very difficult circumstances to reconnect services.

Clearly, the insurance problem is a serious one. It is important that people are aware of the need for insurance and that they make sure that their cover is satisfactory. In my experience of these large-scale events, the insurance companies often do their very best to assist people in dealing with problems connected with insurance shortfalls, and with reinstatement. In addition, they advise people about how to rebuild properties in a way that will minimise the risk of flooding in the future and the damage that that might cause.

Sue Doughty (Guildford) (LD): I should also like to express my sympathies to the families and loved ones of those who died or suffered injury as a result of the severe weather. I and my Liberal Democrat colleagues are particularly aware of the difficulties faced by people who are without power and who are living in appalling conditions at present. We are very appreciative of the work being done by the members of the emergency, rescue and voluntary services, as well as by the power engineers.

In the small debate that followed yesterday's urgent question, many concerns were raised about climate change, and we must take a more immediate look at that problem. What assessment have the Government made of the capacity and robustness of the power and water utility companies to restore services as quickly as possible in what are becoming increasingly frequent occurrences? Given the events of the past 24 hours, following the Minister's announcement that the Bellwin scheme would be implemented, has he identified any further assistance that the communities involved may require? What review is he undertaking of the impact of building on floodplains? Not only are those buildings vulnerable themselves, but they cause water to be displaced and affect other properties. Will he be requesting the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to change current planning regulations?

Mr. Morley: I agree that we must take into account the impact of climate change on infrastructure, such as overhead power cables, the whole national grid, and the water supply. The Government have a climate change programme to study that impact, and the hon. Lady should be aware of the work of the foresight programme, which tries to assess future flood risks as a result of climate change. The Government are committed to taking a precautionary approach to the potential impacts of climatic change, as it would be foolish to assume that those impacts would not be severe.

The hon. Lady asked about applications under the Bellwin formula. She will appreciate that the priority for local authorities is to deal with the immediate flood and gale damage. Local authorities have four weeks after such events to indicate that they intend to apply, so it is rather premature to talk about applications that have been made. However, authorities are well aware of the Bellwin formula rules. If they qualify, they will be assisted through the ODPM in the normal way.

The hon. Lady is right about building on floodplains; roads, hard areas and concrete can affect run-off, too. That must be taken into account in planning applications and guidance has been given to planning authorities, through planning policy guidance note 25, to make it clear that in some cases building may be inappropriate while in other cases where development is appropriate, the developer may have to make a contribution, not only to protect the new development but to mitigate against the possible consequences to existing development.

David Cairns (Greenock and Inverclyde) (Lab): I add my appreciation to that of the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) for the work of the coastguards, especially those of Her Majesty's coastguard agency, Clyde, based at Greenock in my constituency.

This is the first significant test for the new provisions under the Civil Contingencies Act 2004, although it may be too early to tell whether they have had an improved impact on the performance of the agencies. As the coastguard modernises, changes and takes on additional responsibilities, is not this a timely reminder that we must not lose sight of its core function, which is to save those whose lives may be in danger at sea? If it takes on other responsibilities, can we ensure that there is still specialised training for volunteers, who often put their own lives at risk to save those in peril on the sea?

Mr. Morley: My hon. Friend is right. The Maritime and Coastguard Agency played an extremely valuable role in the emergency. It is probably a bit too early to see the effects of the civil contingencies provisions, and I repeat the point that all local authorities, whether in England or in the devolved Administrations, have existing contingency plans and we have seen them put into action. I also repeat that, after a large-scale event of this kind, we would expect an evaluation and lessons learned, which will feed through to individual agencies, such as the coastguard, as well as to local authorities and other groups.

Mr. Gregory Campbell (East Londonderry) (DUP): I join the Minister in passing the condolences of the House and of my party to those who died in such extreme weather conditions. We commend all those involved in the emergency services.

My question relates to one of the fatalities in Northern Ireland. The Foyle bridge in Londonderry is normally closed when weather conditions less extreme than those predicted yesterday occur. Will the Minister liaise with the Northern Ireland Office to establish why the bridge was not closed yesterday?

Mr. Morley: The hon. Gentleman makes an important and serious point. As he will appreciate, I cannot give him an answer at the moment, but I assure him that I will contact the Northern Ireland Office to ensure that his point is addressed.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West) (Lab): Although the Minister gave reassuring information about the response of the insurance industry, will he hold discussions with insurers about the future terms and cover that they will offer people living in the affected areas?

Mr. Morley: Yes, I meet the Association of British Insurers, the trade body, regularly, as do my hon. Friends at the Treasury, who have the lead responsibility in dealing with insurance companies. We have a good relationship with the ABI; there is clearly a range of issues of interest, not least the provision of insurance cover, its availability and cost. We want a strong and robust market for insurance cover so that consumers have a range of choices and can thus choose the best price and the best cover for their circumstances.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim) (UUP): My colleagues and I congratulate the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart) on his urgent question, and we welcome the responses that the Minister has given so far. On behalf of my colleagues, I express our condolences to the relatives of those who lost their lives in those extreme weather conditions and pay tribute to all the emergency services.

The Larne to Cairnryan ferry was grounded overnight. Thankfully, there were no injuries or loss of life, as far as I am aware, but it is disappointing that the Minister was not fully briefed about the situation in Northern Ireland—one would have thought that he would have been. Can he confirm that the 19 men on board the missing fishing vessel that had lost contact due to loss of power are safe and likely to be rescued?

Mr. Morley: I can certainly answer the hon. Gentleman's question about the fishing boat. I am glad to say that an RAF Nimrod, which has been operating from RAF Waddington—very close to my constituency—found the fishing vessel. The boat has lost power and although the crew are safe at the moment, the vessel is in danger and in difficulties. I understand that the Nimrod is on standby in the area and has asked for assistance from other vessels to tow the boat to safer waters.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North) (Lab): Does my hon. Friend agree that although we cannot control the forces of nature, episodes such as this demonstrate why it is essential to have a Government who are committed to high levels of investment in the public infrastructure? I have two examples. Largs in my constituency has always been the victim of such flooding; in recent years, there has been a flood investment programme, funded by the Scottish Executive and—touch wood—it appears to have been effective last night. Secondly, I spoke to Scottish Power this morning. In 1998, there was a six-figure number of disconnections—more than 100,000. The number is 6,000 for the current year. Conditions are not identical, but there has been a massive programme of tree lopping, strengthening the infrastructure and raising the wires. All of that makes the difference, when the day comes, between power cuts and continuity of supply.

Mr. Morley: I can certainly confirm to my right hon. Friend that the Scottish Executive have given high priority to their financial commitment to flood defence and to taking the action on infrastructure that he outlined to try to minimise destruction and damage from extreme weather events of this type. In England and Wales, the flood defence budget has been increased from £300 million in 1997 to a projected £570 million for the next financial year. That is a significant commitment by the Government, who are working hard to reduce risk for people in all our countries.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): The Minister will be aware that this morning, by coincidence, the Environment Agency published its report on the devastating flood in Boscastle and surrounding north Cornwall villages. He has already indicated that it is extremely important to learn lessons from every episode, not least, as he has just said, in relation to insurance cover, risk assessment by the Environment Agency and planning. Can he go a step further than the Prime Minister was able to do earlier and indicate how important it is to see the direct linkage between incidents of severe weather impact on the United Kingdom and climate change? As the Government are in a leading position in the G8, what new initiative do they intend to take to raise the priority of dealing with climate change, especially in relation to our American partners and the United States President?

Mr. Morley: The Environment Agency report on Boscastle is significant and useful; it goes into the background to the Boscastle flood in considerable detail. The report is not only useful for the people of Boscastle; it concludes that the flood was one of the most extreme weather events ever recorded in this country, so in terms of risk, it gives some reassurance for the future. Furthermore, the findings of the report on the nature of the flood will be helpful in assessing risk for all communities living in steep-sided valleys, so it is also useful in that sense.

The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the Prime Minister has given an international lead on the priority for climate change. In the G8 presidency, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned, climate change and Africa will be key themes. As part of that, the UK is hosting a major international science conference at the Hadley centre in February, when there will be an opportunity to look at the science of climatic change and address important issues. For example, what is the risk in relation to global warming, and what are the long-term consequences? I agree that climate change is a global issue, and that it is essential that every nation plays its part, particularly industrial nations, including the one that is the biggest single polluter.

John Thurso (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross) (LD): I understand from Highland council this morning that 20,000 homes are without power in the area. Many of those homes are in my constituency, where there is no power from the south Sutherland border on the west coast across to Tongue on the north coast. Will the Minister join me in paying tribute to Highland council and to the valiant efforts by the utilities engineers to restore power as well as other services? What studies are being made of tidal action? I understand from a conversation this morning that we have the highest tides in living memory at Scrabster, and water is washing the bottom of my house in Thurso—I certainly do not remember that happening before. What studies are being made of tidal movement, as opposed to flooding?

Mr. Morley: Again, I appreciate the hon. Gentleman's comments about the utility companies and their staff, who are working hard to reconnect the power. He is quite right about tidal action and the risk of floods. Following the 1953 disaster, this country probably has one of the most sophisticated tidal surge prediction and warning systems in the North sea, which we share with Holland and France. It enables us to predict tidal movements with some accuracy, and we also have warning systems and contingency plans. As I mentioned in my opening remarks, a surge is predicted in the North sea and on the west coast of Scotland. However, because of the nature of the tides at present, significant flooding is not expected.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): Two significant rivers, the Clywedog and the Severn, originate in my constituency. Is the Minister aware of an experiment carried out over the past few years to drop the level of the reservoirs, thereby reducing flooding during periods of severe weather in the Severn valley and elsewhere? Would he look at that successful experiment, and consider rolling it out elsewhere? Does he accept that there is no doubt at all that much of the climate change that we are experiencing is a direct consequence of the polluting activities of human beings?

Mr. Morley: Yes, I am aware of work to lower the level of reservoirs in winter and possible storm periods so that there is capacity for a surge. Although that is useful, the hon. Gentleman will appreciate that in a large-scale storm and extreme weather a reservoir is quickly overwhelmed. Although that practice has some benefit, it will not stop widespread flooding. Nevertheless, that possibility is being looked at. As for climate change, it is a fact and a reality, and there is no doubt that it is caused by the activities of humans.

Points of Order

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann) (UUP): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In his response to the urgent question, the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment made it clear that the issues involved related to England, Scotland and Northern Ireland. It was painfully clear, however—I am sure that it was not through any fault of his own—that he was not briefed to answer questions on Northern Ireland and could not comment on an incident that led to a fatality there. Can you ensure, Mr. Speaker, that in future the Minister's officials supply him with the necessary information?

Mr. Speaker: It is not often that I defend Ministers, but I must defend this Minister. It must be pointed out that it was just before 10.30 am that I received the urgent question from the hon. Member for North Tayside (Pete Wishart). Of course, it was my decision to make sure that a Minister came to the House. There was even a question of which Department would answer the urgent question, because it affected Scotland and, indeed, Northern Ireland. I thank the Minister for coming to the House. Members must realise that briefing depends on the length of time or warning that is given. I feel that the Minister did very well indeed.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Have you had any representations from the Secretary of State for Defence following discussions with the Americans in which opinion was voiced about the possibility, all too serious in Washington, of the use of assassination squads in Iraq, perhaps operating across frontiers?

Mr. Speaker: The answer to that is no.

BILLS PRESENTED

Criminal Law (Amendment) (Householder Protection)

Patrick Mercer, supported by David Davis, Mr. Frank Field, Mr. Roger Gale, Chris Grayling, Mr. Dominic Grieve, Mr. Mike Hancock, Lady Hermon, Mr. Humfrey Malins, Mr. Mark Prisk, Mr. Hugo Swire and Dr. Richard Taylor, presented a Bill to amend section 3 of the Criminal Law Act 1967 in relation to the use of force in the prevention of crime or in the defence of persons or property: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 4 February, and to be printed [Bill 20].

Drugs (Sentencing and Commission of Inquiry)

Mr. Nigel Evans, supported by Mr. Nigel Jones, Jane Griffiths, Mr. Cheryl Gillan, Kate Hoey, Mrs. Angela Browning, Dr. Julian Lewis, Bob Spink, Mr. Robert Syms, Mr. David Amess, Mr. Andrew Rosindell and Mr. Julian Brazier presented a Bill to make provision about sentencing for persons guilty of an offence in connection with the supply or an offer to supply Class A drugs; and to establish a commission of inquiry into the effects and classification of cannabis: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 25 February, and to be printed [Bill 21].

HEALTH AND SAFETY (DIRECTORS' DUTIES)

Mr. Stephen Hepburn, supported by Vera Baird, Tony Baldry, Mr. Nicholas Brown, Mr. Michael Clapham, Mr. Tony Clarke, Ross Cranston, Mr. Frank Dobson, Mrs. Joan Humble, Helen Jackson, Mr. Michael Meacher and Dr. Jenny Tonge, presented aBill to impose duties upon company directors in relation to health and safety; to give powers to the Health and Safety Commission to issue and approve codes of practice in connection with the performance of those duties; to require large companies to appoint a director as health and safety information director; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 4 March, and to be printed [Bill 22].

SMOKING IN PUBLIC PLACES (WALES)

Julie Morgan, supported by Mr. Kevin Barron, Paul Flynn, Dr. Ian Gibson, Mr. Win Griffiths, Mr. David Hinchliffe, Dr. Doug Naysmith, David Taylor, Mrs. Betty Williams, Hywel Williams, Mr. Roger Williams and Sir George Young, presented a Bill to enable the National Assembly for Wales to prohibit or restrict the smoking of tobacco products by any person in a public place in Wales; to enable functions to be transferred to the National Assembly for Wales in that connection; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 18 March, and to be printed [Bill 23].

STAMP DUTY (LOWER RATE FOR ENERGY EFFICIENCY MEASURES)

Mr. Kevin Barron, supported by Mr. Peter Ainsworth, Mr. Richard Allan, Mr. David Amess, Mr. John Battle, Mr. A. J. Beith, Sir Sidney Chapman, Mr. David Chaytor, Mr. David Drew, Mr. Neil Gerrard, Mr. Martin O'Neill and Brian White, presented a Bill to make provision for a lower rate of stamp duty land tax to be charged on residential properties where energy efficiency measures are undertaken by or on behalf of the purchaser: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 8 April, and to be printed [Bill 24].

MOBILE TELEPHONES (RE-PROGRAMMING)

Mr. Kevan Jones, supported by Ms Dari Taylor, Mark Tami, Mr. Liam Byrne, Iain Wright, Jon Cruddas, Helen Jones, Ann McKechin, Mr. George Howarth, Mrs. Joan Humble, Mr. Stephen Pound and Mr. Frank Roy, presented a Bill to amend the Mobile Telephones (Re-programming) Act 2002: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 15 April, and to be printed [Bill 25].

SEXUAL OFFENCES ACT 2003 (AMENDMENT)

Sir Paul Beresford, supported by Vera Baird, Mr. Dominic Grieve, Mr. Humfrey Malins, Mr. John Randall, John Cryer and Mr. Neil Gerrard presented a Bill to amend the Sexual Offences Act 2003 to give the police powers to enter specified premises in order to ascertain whether a person subject to the notification requirements of Part 2 of that Act is residing at or staying on those premises and to search those premises for information relevant to section 67 of the Criminal Justice and Court Services Act 2000, and to create offences in connection with the exercise of those powers: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 4 March, and to be printed [Bill 26].

RENEWABLE HEAT

Mr. Michael Weir, supported by Hywel Williams, Annabelle Ewing, Pete Wishart, Mr. Andrew Stunell, Norman Baker, Paddy Tipping, Mr. David Chaytor, Brian White, Mr. Peter Ainsworth and Mr. Simon Thomas, presented a Bill to make provision to increase the proportion of heating fuel derived from renewable sources; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 4 February, and to be printed [Bill 27].

EMPLOYMENT TRIBUNALS (REPRESENTATION AND ASSISTANCE IN DISCRIMINATION PROCEEDINGS)

Mr. Marsha Singh, supported by Peter Bottomley, Mr. Michael Clapham, Mrs. Ann Cryer, Mr. John Grogan, Mr. Fabian Hamilton, Mr. Mike Hancock, Mr. Eric Illsley, Mrs. Alice Mahon, Mr. Terry Rooney, Brian White and Mrs. Betty Williams, presented a Bill to make provision about representation of and assistance to complainants in discrimination proceedings before employment tribunals and the Employment Appeal Tribunal; to establish and confer functions upon the Tribunal Representation and Assistance Board; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 18 March, and to be printed [Bill 28].

TRESPASSERS ON LAND (LIABILITY FOR DAMAGE AND EVICTION)

Mr. Gerald Howarth, supported by Mr. Philip Hammond, Dr. Julian Lewis, Mr. Mark Todd, Mr. Crispin Blunt, Mr. Nick Hawkins, Mr. Graham Allen, Mr. Humfrey Malins, Mr. James Arbuthnot and Sir George Young, presented a Bill to make a person liable for damage caused to land, or property on that land, on which he is trespassing with the purpose of residing there; to amend the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 in respect of the removal of trespassers from land, the seizure of property of trespassers and payments to occupiers of land in respect of damages arising from trespass; to establish a register of persons whose identity has been given to a constable after the giving of a direction under Part 5 of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 8 April, and to be printed [Bill 29].

TELECOMMUNICATIONS MASTS (PLANNING CONTROL)

Mr. Andrew Stunell, supported by Mr. Richard Spring, Mr. Derek Wyatt, Mr. Phil Willis, Mr. Gary Streeter, Brian White, Mrs. Annette L. Brooke, Mr. John Bercow, Mr. Paul Truswell, Mrs. Patsy Calton, Mr. Mark Oaten and Mr. Paul Burstow, presented a Bill to amend the law relating to planning in connection with telecommunications masts and associated apparatus; to amend the electronic communications code in connection with telecommunications masts and associated apparatus and make further provision about that code; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 18 March, and to be printed [Bill 30].

ARMED FORCES (PARLIAMENTARY APPROVAL FOR PARTICIPATION IN ARMED CONFLICT)

Mr. Neil Gerrard, supported by Tony Wright, Mr. William Hague, Sir Menzies Campbell, Mr. Alex Salmond, Mr. Simon Thomas, Andrew Bennett, Mr. Gordon Prentice, Mr. Douglas Hogg, Mr. Richard Allan, Mr. Kelvin Hopkins and Brian White, presented a Bill to require parliamentary approval for the participation of Her Majesty's armed forces in armed conflict and for a declaration of war; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 4 March, and to be printed [Bill 31].

HUMAN TISSUE ACT 2004 (AMENDMENT)

Mr. Stephen Pound, supported by Dr. Evan Harris, David Cairns, Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody, Mr. Kelvin Hopkins, Mrs. Patsy Calton, Mr. Tam Dalyell, Chris Bryant, Lembit Öpik, Jane Griffiths, Siobhain McDonagh and Mr. Andrew Dismore, presented a Bill to amend the Human Tissue Act 2004 in relation to the removal of organs for the purpose of transplantation from adults who have died: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 22 April, and to be printed [Bill 32].

COUNCIL TAX BENEFIT (ENTITLEMENT INFORMATION)

Tony Baldry, supported by Hugh Bayley, Dr. Hywel Francis, Mr. John Burnett, Dr. Evan Harris, Mr. Robert Jackson and Mr. John Bercow, presented a Bill to require billing authorities and local authorities to contact pensioners who may be entitled to council tax benefit: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 4 February, and to be printed [Bill 33].

HUMBER BRIDGE

Mr. Ian Cawsey, supported by Shona McIsaac, Mr. Austin Mitchell, Mr. Greg Knight, David Davis, Mr. Kevin McNamara, Mr. James Cran, Mr. Edward Leigh, Mr. John Grogan, Mr. Kevin Hughes, Mr. Phil Willis and Kevin Brennan, presented a Bill to amend the Humber Bridge Acts 1959 to 1973; to require the Secretary of State to review the exercise of his power under the Humber Bridge (Debts) Act 1996; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 15 April, and to be printed [Bill 34].

LOCAL SERVICES AND FACILITIES

Mr. Roger Williams, supported by Andrew George, Sue Doughty, Mr. Simon Thomas, Mr. David Drew, Mr. Don Foster, Alan Simpson, Dr. Ian Gibson, Mr. Huw Edwards, Jim Dowd, Mr. David Chaytor and Matthew Green, presented a Bill to require public authorities to undertake a social and environmental impact assessment and to consult persons or bodies affected before closing premises that provide services or ceasing to provide services from particular premises; to amend the Town and Country Planning Act 1990 in relation to material changes in use affecting services to or amenities for the public; to confer powers on local authorities in connection with the proposed closure of leisure and sports facilities; to make provision about local food strategies; to make provision in connection with the delivery of beer to public houses from local breweries; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 25 February, and to be printed [Bill 35].

SUCCESSION TO THE CROWN (NO. 2)

Ann Taylor, supported by Joyce Quin, Paddy Tipping, Sandra Osborne, Mr. Mike Hall, Mr. Gwyn Prosser, Ms Candy Atherton, Tony Wright, Mr. Khalid Mahmood, Mrs. Betty Williams, Kali Mountford and Judy Mallaber, presented a Bill to make provision about succession to the Crown and about Royal marriages: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 4 March, and to be printed [Bill 36].

SCHOOL MEALS AND NUTRITION

Geraint Davies, supported by Ms Debra Shipley, Ms Karen Buck, Ms Julia Drown, Dr. Howard Stoate, Harry Cohen, Ms Oona King, Siobhain McDonagh, Mrs. Janet Dean, John Austin and Julie Morgan, presented a Bill to make further provision about nutritional standards, and other nutritional requirements, for school meals; to regulate food vending machines in schools; to provide for restrictions on the whereabouts of pupils during school hours for the purpose of controlling the supply of food to them; to require the inclusion of information about nutritional standards of food in schools in reports of school inspections; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 25 February, and to be printed [Bill 37].

ESTATE AGENTS (INDEPENDENT REDRESS SCHEME)

Mr. Alan Williams, supported by Mr. Clive Betts, Andrew Bennett, Mr. Adrian Sanders, Mr. Kevin McNamara, Mr. David Clelland, John Barrett, Mr. Jon Owen Jones, and Claire Ward, presented a Bill to amend the Estate Agents Act 1979 to make provision for independent consumer redress in connection with the sale and purchase of residential property: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 4 March, and to be printed [Bill 38].

RIGHT OF REPLY AND PRESS STANDARDS

Peter Bradley, supported by Mr. Clive Soley, Ann Clwyd, Tony Wright, Angela Eagle, Tony Worthington, Sir Sydney Chapman, Mr. Paul Tyler, Mr. Robert Walter, Martin Linton, Dr. Alan Whitehead and Mr. Siôn Simon, presented a Bill to give persons a right of reply to correct factual inaccuracies in the press in specified circumstances; to establish and confer functions upon the Press Standards Board and the Press Standards Adjudicator; to create an offence in connection with non-compliance with an enforcement notice served by the Press Standards Board; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 25 February, and to be printed [Bill 39].

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your guidance on a matter of grave international significance. Right hon. and hon. Members will be aware, as you will be, of the prevalence of press reports that show that the African Union force is failing to prevent the mass murder of civilians in Darfur. In light of that fact and of the spread of violence into the camps for internally displaced persons, is it not important that a statement should be made to the House at the earliest opportunity as to whether the Government intend to press for action on the part of the international community to bring the appalling regime in Sudan to heel, in the name of protecting people whose lives are being lost on a daily basis and upon an horrific scale?

Mr. Speaker: I am deeply saddened to hear this news from the hon. Gentleman. I have no powers on this matter, but Ministers will read Hansard and see what he has said.

Orders of the Day

Child Benefit Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

1.12 pm

The Paymaster General (Dawn Primarolo): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill is a short and straightforward measure consisting of seven clauses. None the less, it is a significant milestone in the Government's commitment to removing the financial barriers to young people staying in education or training after the age of 16, helping them to gain the skills and qualifications that they need to succeed in the modern global economy.

I would like to start by thanking the many organisations that have contributed to our consultation on the Government's review of financial support for 16 to 19-year-olds. Their views and evidence have been invaluable in informing the development of our proposals, including this Bill, which is an important first step. We have also been keen to involve young people and parents directly in the policy making that affects them.

Last September, I took part in a consultation event with young people organised by the National Council for Voluntary Youth Services. I was very impressed by the dedication and insightful comments of the young people whom I met. Their ideas and suggestions are now shaping the future of financial support for 16 to 19-year-olds. Indeed, Centrepoint arranged for me to have a very long meeting with a number of young people, who again demonstrated at every point their sensitivities, understanding and determination to have access to education and training to better their opportunities in adult life.

In short, the Bill will enable the Government to lay regulations extending child benefit to new groups of learners aged 16 and over. The House may find it helpful if I explain briefly the background of the steps leading up to the Bill so that hon. Members are able to understand its purpose in the context of the Government's skills agenda and our overriding commitment to build a strong economy and a fair society in which there are opportunities for all.

The Government's stable macro-economic framework has already contributed to lower levels of unemployment and record levels of employment. However, we know that to continue to thrive in the modern global economy and to deliver social justice to all—becoming both a fairer and more prosperous society—we need to improve the skills and fulfil the potential of all our young people and adults. Skills help our businesses and public services to achieve greater efficiency, innovation and excellence and they help individuals to gain employment opportunities and achieve their ambitions for themselves, their families and their communities.

We all know that skills matter, but we also know that the United Kingdom educational system has unfortunately suffered from historical underachievement. Although we perform strongly in higher education and have a large number of highly skilled workers compared with other countries, the historic failure to invest in training and education until recently has led to major shortfalls in terms of the intermediate skills that we need to secure sustainable employment and opportunities for all. As a result, far too many young people and adults are prevented by their lack of skills from getting secure, well-paid jobs and all the social and personal benefits that go with them.

About 7.8 million working-age people in the United Kingdom do not have the level 2 qualifications—the equivalent of five GCSE A to C grades—that are needed as a foundation for many careers. This failure is particularly apparent when we compare ourselves with our key competitors. Some 33 per cent. of the United Kingdom work force have low skills compared with 19 per cent. in Germany and 15 per cent. in the United States. In fact, we have the highest proportion of unskilled workers in any major European Union country.

In the Chancellor of the Exchequer's pre-Budget report statement, he set out the steps that the Government are taking to close Britain's skills gap. Part of this strategy involves ensuring that every adult who has missed out at school will have the funds and the opportunity through time off work, free training and help from employers to acquire skills, starting with a first level 2 qualification. Our commitment to deliver that was underlined by the announcements to roll out the national employer training programme and a pilot of a new learning allowance for benefit claimants, building on the success of the new deal for skills launched in the Budget of 2004.

The Government know, however, that these measures are not enough on their own. In order to secure greater productivity, flexibility and fairness in the United Kingdom economy in the long term, we know that we must ensure that, in future, all young people reach adulthood equipped with the skills that they need to succeed in the economy. Too many adults fail to reach their potential when young. Despite significant increases in the number of young people participating in education and training after the age of 16, a quarter of 15 to 19-year-olds are still not in formal education.

The United Kingdom compares unfavourably in this regard internationally. We currently lie 25th out of the 30 Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries for participation in education at the age of 17. This situation did not occur overnight—it is the result of years and decades of failure to invest in education—and it cannot be put right overnight. However, the Government are committed to increasing the flow of skills into the labour market by ensuring that all young people can reach the age of 19 ready for skilled employment or higher education. Our long-term ambition is that by 2015, United Kingdom staying-on rates after 16 will move from one of the lowest in the OECD to one of the highest. Since 1997, we have been putting in place the effective strategy to achieve this ambition, taking an holistic approach that brings together three different areas of policy with the aim of setting clear expectations for all young people that they should continue in learning beyond 16—whether in school, college or the workplace.

First, we are reforming the curriculum structure for young people in England to provide more coherence, choice and flexibility, including by raising the quality and profile of the vocational route. Much has already been done to improve the quality and quantity of training places. With the expansion and reform of the apprenticeship programme, we are now able to offer a ladder of opportunity from basic to advanced skill levels.

A record number of young people are currently engaged in Government-supported training, with more than 250,000 in England alone gaining skills, experience and qualifications in thousands of businesses. The Government have welcomed the proposals of the working group on 14 to 19 reform, which was led by Mike Tomlinson and recommended the development of a single curriculum structure with the aim of giving academic and vocational qualifications greater parity. We will shortly set out our detailed response to those proposals in the form of a White Paper.

Our second strand of policy is designed to underpin those curriculum reforms by strengthening the advice, guidance and support offered to young people to ensure that they are able to make informed choices about the range of learning options and opportunities that are now available to them: Connexions partnerships and the devolved careers services are playing a vital role in that area and reducing the number of young people outside work, training and education. I pay tribute to the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, South (Mr. Lewis), for working tirelessly in his Department to bring those benefits to our young people.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Much of what the Paymaster General has said has been unexceptionable and I acknowledge that there is a good deal to be said for the Bill. However, she used the term "missed out" in relation to people who did not get what they should have had, or had hoped to receive, at school, and for whom provision must be made thereafter. I am not making a partisan point, because this a matter of great national concern, but does she know why the proportion of companies in recent business surveys saying that the three R's are not good enough and that we must provide remedial training is going up, not down?

Dawn Primarolo: The hon. Gentleman follows such subjects closely, so he will know that we must also have a strategy on literacy, numeracy and developing skills in our primary schools, as we do. By putting the Bill in such a context, I was trying to demonstrate to the House that we are addressing the problem by raising standards and developing basic skills in primary schools and through curriculum change in secondary schools. The Bill and other proposals are designed to remove financial barriers and distortions that force young people to take options that are perhaps not right for them, but are the only ones available—some have no options at all. Our measures go all the way through to the announcement in the pre-Budget report of an adult skills agenda. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that there is not a single answer. The most important thing that we must engender is the value of education and the opportunities that that can give to young people, so early years provision, primary and secondary schools, training opportunities and higher and further education must all reinforce that.

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): The Paymaster General said that there must be informed choices, and I am genuinely asking for information. Who is responsible for ensuring that youngsters have the information that enables them to make choices? Will there be an opportunity for each pupil to have an interview with Connexions or other people at a specific stage of their school career? There is an understandable tendency for schools to try to persuade everyone to stay on as long as possible because of capitation rates and weighting, so we would benefit from knowing who will ensure that an informed choice is made.

Dawn Primarolo: The hon. Gentleman is right to pinpoint the fact that informed choice is necessary as one of the pressure points. Connexions plays a crucial role, but that must be enhanced and developed. I know that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary is working on that, and the youth Green Paper will need to build on it. The hon. Gentleman rightly points out not only that opportunities must be available, but that young people must know that they are available and be able to decide which are most appropriate so that they can build on their potential.

Judy Mallaber (Amber Valley) (Lab): Following on from the discussion initiated by the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), I can add that Amber Valley has an incredibly positive programme running from early years through to a 16-to-19 programme for those who are not in education, employment, or training at that age. We also have a sports development programme, to re-engage children from an early age right through. How restrictive will the criteria for who will qualify for the different types of training and the courses be? I want to ensure that the 16-to-19 programme, which might not necessarily lead to a formal qualification, but is very successful, will fall within the parameters of the Bill.

Dawn Primarolo: The main criterion must be entry to employment. The hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) talked about doing the basics, and I told him about the primary school programme. Of course, any child who has benefited from the primary school reforms that the Government have already undertaken has not yet left school. We are intervening in the system at every level, especially to address the quality of action.

Judy Mallaber rose—

Dawn Primarolo: Will my hon. Friend allow me to make a little progress because I shall talk about access to training later in my speech? If I do not address her point then, I shall be more than happy to give way again.

Jonathan Shaw (Chatham and Aylesford) (Lab): I would like to follow up the point made by the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry). The learning and skills council, the Connexions service and the local education authority in my area have organised the offer of post-16 education and training as part of the strategic area review. Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is vital that information about that, and the benefits available to all young people, is disseminated? Similar areas have different rates of success, so will she and the Department for Education and Skills examine best practice in increasing in the use of post-16 provision? This is a matter of national importance, so we must keep a microscope on what is happening locally.

Dawn Primarolo: I agree with my hon. Friend, who is a distinguished member of the Education and Skills Committee. The review of financial support for 16 to 19-year-olds that was jointly organised by the Department for Education and Skills, the Department for Work and Pensions and the Treasury examined the quality of advice and support available to young people. Young people whom I met, and those who contributed to the review but whom I was unable to meet, said that that was a high priority, because many had found out that they could have received advice, support or guidance only when it was too late.

The third and final element of our strategy is removing the financial barriers to young people staying in education and training after 16. The Chancellor announced in the 2003 Budget that the Government would review financial support for 16 to 19-year-olds with the aim of delivering an accessible system of support, and incentives to reduce the appeal of a job at the age of 16 compared with that of the route of learning, which pays far more in the long run.

The review sought to build on the success of the education maintenance allowance pilots, which have already demonstrated how important financial incentives are to encourage young people to stay in learning. The evaluations of the pilots found that the education maintenance allowance was projected to have the biggest impact on post-16 participation levels since the introduction of GCSEs in 1987.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Dawn Primarolo: I will give way once more, and then I must make progress. I tried the patience of the House too long in a previous debate by giving way more than I should have done.

Ms Keeble: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the skills shortage in areas such as mine, and the importance of measures to ensure that young people stay on at school and are encouraged to undertake the type of training that will provide the skills necessary to meet that shortage in Northampton? That will relieve the heartache experienced particularly by lone parents who have difficulty in supporting their children.

Dawn Primarolo: I agree with my hon. Friend. My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary will visit her constituency and others in the area early next month and will have detailed discussions on a number of issues, in particular the role of employers in connection with access to quality training and the removal of barriers facing young people, whatever their background. That is crucial.

The Government's decision to roll out the education maintenance allowance nationally from September 2004 is increasing Government funding for 16-to-19 education by 10 per cent., and demonstrates our commitment to realising the potential of all our young people. The EMA is paid direct to the young person who has decided to stay on at school or college, on top of the financial support already available to their parents or carers through child benefit and child tax credit. It is a bold initiative that only pays something for something, making young people aware of their responsibility in committing themselves to learning and development.

The review of financial support for 16 to 19-year-olds sought ways in which these principles could be extended to other young people, including those continuing their learning after 16 outside school or college. We published the resulting report, "Supporting young people to achieve", alongside the Budget last year. The evidence collected during the review clearly indicated that the complexity and anomalies in the current system of financial support create major barriers to learning for many young people, especially—unfortunately—the most vulnerable. To remove those obstacles, the review proposed a long-term vision of a radically simplified model of financial support designed to support young people's post-16 choices and transitions, ensuring decent minimum income levels and improved accessibility.

The vision builds on the successful model of support already in place for the two thirds of 16 to 18-year-olds who stay on in full-time education and live at home. As I explained earlier, that involves a combination of financial support paid to the parents or carers in the form of child benefit and child tax credit, and a financial incentive paid directly to the young person in the form of the education maintenance allowance. Our intention is to extend this model of support and incentives to more marginalised groups of young people in order to encourage them to participate in learning. Our extensive consultation with young people, parents, voluntary sector organisations, businesses and learning providers indicated that there is strong support for this approach.

Jonathan Shaw: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Dawn Primarolo: If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I shall make a little more progress before giving way to him again.

In "Supporting young people to achieve" we set out a package of short-term measures to improve the delivery of benefits to young people, together with some interim steps towards our long-term vision of a single coherent system of financial support for 16 to 19-year-olds. At the centre of those are two proposals to extend child benefit, child tax credit and education maintenance allowance to unwaged trainees, and to extend financial support until young people finish their course, rather than stopping it on their 19th birthday. The Bill is an essential step in implementing those proposals.

The current disparity in the financial support available for full-time education and unwaged training is one of the worst distortions identified by the review. A young person aged 16 to 18 is eligible for child benefit and child tax credit if they stay in full-time education at school or college, but not if they enter one of the unwaged work-based training programmes arranged by the Government to help trainees progress to paid apprenticeships. This differential treatment can distort choices for young people, particularly for the most vulnerable.

Together, child benefit and child tax credit constitute an important stream of income for a young person's family, and the loss of that money may mean that some low-income parents are no longer able to support their child in education. I am sure many hon. Members have received, as I have, letters from constituents who are desperate to keep their son or daughter in training on a course, but who cannot do so because the child benefit and child tax credit have stopped. The young person may have only six months left to complete their NVQ level 2, but everything is destroyed or lost because of the financial pressure on the family. That cannot be right. The Bill provides for arrangements to be put in place to prevent that from happening.

Judy Mallaber: With which institutions, organisations, employers and so on would a trainee placement be eligible for such support? If I give my right hon. Friend the details, will she examine my local sports development programme, which enables some of the participants to access further training—for example, to become sports coaches?

Dawn Primarolo: The schemes eligible will be the formally sponsored Government projects and schemes. I do not recollect whether the one that my hon. Friend mentions is among them, but I am more than happy for her to send me the details and I will certainly consider them.

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): How many of the 80,000 young people who are unwaged trainees will be covered by the welcome new rules extending child benefit and child tax credit?

Dawn Primarolo: I do not have the figure to hand, but I will ensure that it is made available to the hon. Gentleman.

The longer-term vision is for a coherent system of financial support. Other Government measures will need to reflect that. For example, much work is being done to determine whether volunteering as a way of acquiring a skill could be included in the scheme in the long run, although that is not covered by the Bill. As far as I am aware, all 80,000 unwaged trainees mentioned by the hon. Gentleman would be eligible for the scheme. There is no question of some being in and some being out.

Mr. Bercow: Will the right hon. Lady give way?

Dawn Primarolo: Yes, but this really will be the last time. Many hon. Members want to speak, and I do not think that I have been strict enough.

Mr. Bercow: I am grateful; the Paymaster General's generosity is exemplary. The Bill is short, but I hope that she will understand when I say that my brow furrowed when she referred to the regulations that are to come. Will they be subject to the negative procedure of the House, or to its affirmative counterpart?

Dawn Primarolo: The hon. Gentleman may not have had an opportunity to obtain a copy of the draft regulations that were made available at the beginning of the week to assist hon. Members in the debate, and which I am sure will answer many questions that he might have. The regulations will be subject to the negative procedure, as with all other regulations in this category.

Mr. Bercow: I had better go and get a copy.

Dawn Primarolo: That would be an extremely good idea. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman should read the regulations before he makes any further comments.

The Government believe that young people should be able to choose the learning route most appropriate for them, rather than basing their decision on the amount of financial support available. The Child Benefit Bill is therefore important, because it is the first step in removing the distinction between education and unwaged training with regard to child benefit and tax benefits. Corresponding amendments will also be made to income support and other benefits to ensure that unwaged trainees who cannot live in the family home also benefit from the new arrangements. Those changes will strengthen young people's choices between the academic and vocational learning routes, and are very much in line with the proposals of the working group on 14-to-19 curriculum reform. They will bring about additional investment in financial support for unwaged trainees of around £100 million a year, delivering more money for tens of thousands of young learners, especially those from low-income families and those who are unable to live in the family home.

The Bill will also enable us to remove another damaging anomaly in the financial support system identified by the review—the cut-off at the age of 19, to which I have already referred. Child benefit rules are based on the assumption that post-16 participation comprises two years of A-level study at school or college, completed before the young person's 19th birthday. But this model of post-16 education does not match the pathways and experiences of many young people continuing in learning today. Each year thousands of young people reach the age of 19 while still studying for non-advanced qualifications. Most of these young people will be in this situation because their education has been disrupted for some reason, including vulnerable groups such as care leavers, young offenders and those who are homeless and have been estranged from their family.

Under the current rules, child benefit and tax credits cease on the young person's 19th birthday, irrespective of whether they are still studying. Young people from low-income households may be forced to leave their course before achieving their qualification, and that cannot be right. The situation is even worse for young people who cannot live in the family home, as their entitlement to income support may cease and they must instead claim jobseeker's allowance, which by requiring them to be available for work stops them from studying full-time. The loss of income support also triggers the loss of housing benefit, often making it impossible for them to continue on their course without losing their home or running up rent arrears.

The personal testimonies that we received during the review revealed the distress and frustration caused by these rules. The young people affected had overcome previous obstacles to engage in education, but then at 19 faced severe hardship and debt if they wanted to complete their course. There was a real sense among the respondents that although they were seeking extended support in the short term, in the long term they would contribute much more to society if they completed their studies.

It is a wasted investment both for the Government and for the young people if they drop out before achieving their qualifications. This is why we propose to reform the rules for child benefit, child tax credit and income support, so that young people who reach 19 while still studying for non-advanced qualifications are supported until they complete their course. The Government are committed to ensuring that all young people are supported to achieve their potential.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): Will the Paymaster General give way on that point?

Dawn Primarolo: I said that I would not give way again. I have now been speaking for a long time, and the hon. Gentleman is about to make his own speech. I am sure that he will be able to make his point then, and my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary will be able to reply. Forgive me, but I have tried the patience of the House too much again.

Having set out the context and background to the Bill, I want to explain briefly its provisions and how these will be used to achieve the reforms. The Bill will restructure the existing definition of a "child" in child benefit by introducing a new concept of a "qualifying young person". A child will be defined as a person who has not reached the age of 16, which I can reassure hon. Members means that the Bill will have no impact on the payment of child benefit for under-16s. The Bill enables the Government to lay regulations prescribing the circumstances in which someone aged 16 and over is defined as a qualifying young person. That replicates the approach already used in the legislation for the child tax credit, ensuring greater consistency in the criteria for the two streams of support.

As I announced in my written statement to the House, we published draft regulations on 10 January to demonstrate how we intend to use the powers provided by the Bill. In addition to the existing entitlement for 16 to 18-year-olds in full-time education, the regulations show how we propose to extend support to unwaged trainees on specific training programmes arranged by the Government. The regulations also confirm that we will extend support to 19-year-olds until they complete their course, up to an age limit of 20. We intend to implement both the reforms in April 2006, along with the corresponding changes to the child tax credit and income support, which will be made via separate amending regulations.

The April 2006 launch date will represent a major milestone on the way to our long-term vision of a radically simplified system of financial support for young people in learning. It is worth pointing out that one of the benefits of using regulations to define eligibility for child benefit for 16 to 19-year-olds is that it provides us with greater flexibility to respond readily to the long-term curriculum changes and policy developments. This change has been too long in the making. Regulations enable us to respond more speedily. We must ensure that the financial support system reflects the diverse range of learning opportunities available to young people today and in the future.

We know there are innumerable barriers to education and training for all those over 16 years of age. Financial support should not be one of them. The Bill starts the process of ensuring that it is not, and I commend it to the House.

1.48 pm

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester) (Con): I have a couple of quick points to make at the start. First, the Opposition will not oppose the Bill this evening. Secondly, I just want to say how grateful I am for the responses that I have received from a number of organisations to my request for their views on the Bill, in particular, Barnardo's, Connexions, the Foyer Federation and the Prince's Trust. Some of what I will say today reflects points that they have made to me, and no doubt my hon. Friend the Member for Rayleigh (Mr. Francois) will raise others in Committee. The hon. Member for Amber Valley (Judy Mallaber), who is just leaving the Chamber, also raised some of the points that they have made. I did not mean to embarrass her; I meant to compliment her. The eligibility rules point to which she referred features in several of the representations that I have received.

I intend to make three general points. First, with only seven clauses and a couple of schedules, this is a small and relatively straightforward Bill, even taking into account the regulations and changes to the tax credits system that will accompany it. However, it raises a number of detailed and important questions that I shall deal with in a moment. I am afraid that that will probably be the most boring part of my speech for some hon. Members who are not so interested in the detail. [HON. MEMBERS: "No!"] I am pleased to have such a ready audience for such material.

Secondly, the existing system of support is getting incredibly complicated. It is unacceptably complicated and reflects what is going on in the benefits system more widely. I worry that the Government do not have a clear idea of their destination in some of the reforms, despite what the Paymaster General said, and that the Bill will not help us get there anyway. I shall deal with that point in a moment.

The third point derives from the fact that a relatively senior member of the Treasury team is presenting the Bill to the House. Does it really make for good government that the Treasury has become a benefits agency? Is it sensible that gamekeepers have become poachers? How on earth has all that happened? I shall get into that issue at the end of my speech.

We need first to do a bit of detailed analysis of the Bill. The Paymaster General rightly ranged widely in setting out the reasons for the Bill, and I shall not repeat that background. The Bill is part of a much broader reform, and as she said, there will probably be more in the Budget. There will also be a White Paper, as she mentioned. The Bill is designed to make only a couple of simple amendments to the eligibility rules—one affecting unwaged trainees and the other dealing with people over 19 who are on courses.

On the first change, as the Paymaster General said, the idea is to remove the apparent discouragement in the current system for people in training. A number of them choose to stay in full-time education because the financial support is better, even though they may be better suited to training. That is one of the concerns that have been expressed to me. The other aim is to help people stay on after their 19th birthday. At present, payments stop as soon as they reach that point.

The provisions on unwaged trainees look uncomplicated, although it should be remembered that the eligibility criteria for child benefit affect a number of other benefits, so the Bill has had to introduce amendments in respect of the widowed mothers allowance, the widowed parents allowance and the guardians allowance, among other payments. It is claimed that the Bill will remove distortions. I am not convinced that they will all be removed, although I shall perhaps save the detail—I have some of it here—for the Committee stage.

The entitlement of parents and carers to child benefit and the child tax credit currently stops at the 19th birthday, and the Government want people to be able to go on receiving the benefit while they are doing an appropriate course. As I have made clear, the Opposition will not oppose that proposal.

It is important—the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) began to get into this territory a moment ago—that we look at what impact the measures will have. In that regard, we have to rely on the regulatory impact assessments. I use the word "assessments" because we have already had two of them. First, an assessment was published in December. Frankly, it was so thin that I was surprised that the Paymaster General allowed it to get out of the Treasury at all. Secondly, a couple of days ago, we were given an assessment called the "Supplementary Partial Regulatory Impact Assessment". It is pretty partial and thin. It is a welcome supplement, but even when the assessments are taken together, we still have a pretty thin gruel.

Yet again, the Government have introduced a measure in quite a major spending area and we still do not have a proper regulatory impact assessment. The language of regulatory impact assessments is used, but the substance is not delivered. That is extremely worrying, and it probably explains the fact that so much money is being wasted in some areas of the public sector.

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): I have read both the documents to which the hon. Gentleman refers. As he said, the Bill seems a fairly simple measure, even though it will cost £105 million a year. What is he saying is missing from the regulatory impact assessments? Is he saying that he wants more complex assessments when in fact we do not need them?

Mr. Tyrie: If the hon. Gentleman will contain himself for a moment, I shall ask a few questions of the Paymaster General. If he wants to come back with the answers because he already knows them, I shall be delighted to take a second intervention.

At the heart of the matter is the fact that we do not know what the cost or effects of the measures will be. We do not know what the behavioural effects or deadweight costs will be; how many people will be brought into, attracted to or kept in training; or what the consequences would be if the measures were not introduced. The most basic question is: how many extra people will benefit and what is the extra cost over and above the amount that will have to be paid to those who would go into training anyway? We need to compare those two numbers to decide whether to proceed with the measure. That is not an easy question.

Rob Marris: In paragraph 10 of the supplementary partial regulatory impact assessment, which I think was published on Monday, the final words are "£105m a year", referring to costs in relation to the 80,000 young people mentioned in the first line of that paragraph. As I understand it, the benefit is non-means-tested. If double the number of young people went on to unwaged training courses and the figure was 160,000, the costs would presumably be £210 million a year. Surely, that is the hon. Gentleman's answer.

Mr. Tyrie: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for illustrating what I am trying to say. If he reads the paragraph carefully, he will see that it refers to as well as to child tax credit. We need a breakdown between those two aspects and to know what proportion would be spent on people who had not changed their behaviour in any way as a consequence of the measures. There is a deadweight cost. What we need to know in order to make a proper assessment and what the core of any regulatory impact assessment should be is how many extra people will be involved and the extra take-up that will result from the measure. That information is not provided in the document. Indeed, no attempt at all has been made to provide it. How many extra people will be trained? That is what we need to know, and I see that he nods in agreement.

"trainees in all programmes of Government Supported Training",

We are not even absolutely sure about the straight-line cost—the point that I made in the beginning of my response to the hon. Gentleman. On reading carefully paragraphs 8 to 10 of the regulatory impact assessment, I see no breakdown of the £105 million between the cost of child tax credit, child benefit and income support. I may have misread the document, and perhaps he knows that information. I do not have it, and as the Paymaster General is not leaping to her feet to tell me, I fear that she does not know either, even though she is introducing the measure. In order to assess the value of such a measure, it seems absolutely basic that we must know that information, and we do not.

Let us turn to the age 19 cut-off and see how far we get in trying to work out what the regulatory impact assessment has to say about that. The Government have changed their mind on this issue. I thought that they were proposing a cut-off at the 21st birthday, but it seems that that the age has now changed to 20, only one extra year. Incidentally, they say that they are doing so because they have some concerns about behavioural effects, a point made in paragraph 23 of the regulatory impact assessment, but the cost, which is put at £65 million, does not take account of behavioural effects, which seems extraordinary. We have been given a cost estimate, which we have been told by implication immediately to ignore. If we do not ignore the cost estimate, there is little logic in excluding 20-year-olds. We have been told that lifting the age from 19 to 20 will cost £65 million, but raising it to 21 will cost only £10 million more. If the cost tails off that dramatically, why have the Government rejected raising the age limit a little further?

The Paymaster General referred to representations, and a number of relevant organisations have made representations that people will still be caught at the cut-off at 21. She could consider raising the cut-off to 22, bearing it in mind that the cost tails off so quickly. She may want to consider that option, but we have not been provided with the information to assess it. I would be grateful if she told me the Government's estimate, which must be extremely small, of the cost of bringing help to people aged 21?

I realise that the Paymaster General may not have all the answers on the tip of her tongue—I see that reinforcements are now arriving—and she may want to reply in a letter or in Committee, because it is important that those questions are answered. I have no illusions that they are easy, but they are relevant, and I hope that the Paymaster General and the Economic Secretary asked them vigorously of officials before they agreed to go ahead with the proposals.

At one point, the partial regulatory impact assessment states that it relies on anecdotal evidence. If that is the case, the Government should consider conducting a sampling survey. They have held a pilot; why not conduct a sampling survey on the points that I have just raised? Such a survey would not cost much and would enable the Government to answer the crucial question whether we are getting value for money for those proposals. We do not have evidence in front of us showing that we are getting value for money for the £170 million that will be spent as a consequence of the Bill.

I shall say a few words about complexity, which is my second major point, but I shall do my best not to detain hon. Members for too long. At the beginning of my speech, I said that complexity is a serious problem, and the tax credit and benefit system is now so complicated that scarcely anybody fully understands it. I am not suggesting that all the problems began in 1997, when the system was already complicated, but reforms since then have not made the situation any easier. As a result of recent reforms, seven benefits are specifically available to families with children—child benefit, child tax credit, working tax credit, statutory maternity pay, maternity allowance, guardians allowance and education maintenance allowance.

Three separate Departments are responsible for policy: the Treasury rules the roost on child benefit and child tax credit; the Department for Work and Pensions examines most other benefit issues; and the Department for Education and Skills runs the education maintenance allowance. That is not a good way in which to make benefit policy. The Bill originates in a review conducted by all those Departments, called "Supporting young people to achieve: towards a new deal for skills", which was published in March last year.

In truth, support for young people is, of course, horrendously complicated. The Government make that clear on page 16 of the document, which includes a chart that would leave even someone who is well versed in such matters bewildered as to their entitlement. The system is far too difficult to understand: I do not think that there is a family in the country who could successfully navigate its way through the thicket of regulations and rules, and I am not sure how many hon. Members could, either.

I was shocked to learn that the people who are supposed to administer the system and provide expert help do not seem to have a firm grip. Lest hon. Members think that I am exaggerating, I shall quote from the Government's own document, which states:

"several young people who contributed to the Review had received poor and inconsistent advice".

The Paymaster General referred to that point, which is obviously a major concern. To their credit, the Government have acknowledged that there is a crisis as a result of the paucity of advice. The social exclusion unit report, "Bridging the Gap", also makes that point clear.

The Bill does nothing to address those problems. To solve them, we must rely on what "Supporting young people to achieve: towards a new deal for skills" describes as "a radical simplification of financial support", which the Paymaster General referred to earlier and which will occur at some unspecified future date. The detail on how that will be accomplished consists of little more than a table on page 35, which is worthy in itself but is scarcely the stuff of serious policy making. I will believe in the simplification when I see it.

In the meantime, the DFES and the DWP will work in consultation with the voluntary sector to try to ensure that young people at least get better help and advice in understanding their entitlements. That is, of course, welcome, but sophisticated advice centres to explain people's benefit entitlements are not a solution but a reflection of the problem. Young people most need advice not on the benefits system but on what courses to take and on the crucial questions that will affect their lives, as my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) pointed out in his intervention.

I have made it clear that we will not oppose the Bill, but I regret yet further layers of complication being added to child benefit. When child benefit was introduced, its great advantage was that it was simple: it was a universal benefit paid regardless of income, and it had almost 100 per cent. take-up. It could therefore play a role in relieving poverty, particularly at the bottom end, where people often suffer the most by missing out on benefits designed for them. Because it was a universal benefit, it did not have severe disincentive effects.

The tax and benefits system is now being constructed on an ad hoc basis, and it is far more complex. It creates more disincentive effects, often has unacceptably low take-up and often fails to help those who most need it. Anybody who reads the recent National Audit Office report on tax credits will find plenty of evidence for what I have just suggested. The new tax credits, including child tax credit, have not worked as intended, causing problems for claimants, employers and the Government, and they are extremely complicated.

A moment ago, I said that child benefit was originally a simple benefit for a simple purpose; it is now a much less simple benefit for multiple purposes. The Government see it as a tool to encourage more people to choose unwaged, work-based training, if that is their preference, instead of paid work-based training. It is seen as one of the tools needed to tackle the skills shortage and as part of the education system. This Bill, its accompanying regulations and the raft of measures that are likely to be announced shortly are no doubt well intentioned, but will they have the effects intended? I am not sure.

A Dutch economist, Jan Tinbergen, won a Nobel prize by making this simple point: use one social policy for each policy objective. The Government have located a problem, a skills shortage, which is what, "Supporting young people to achieve: towards a new deal for skills" is all about, and they have decided to use multiple policy instruments to tackle it.

My best guess, and my worst fear, is that the law of unintended consequences will apply, although I shall not try to predict how. If the Government were to get the chance to implement more legislation after the election, I would wager that before long they would have to return with yet another raft of measures to tackle the unintended consequences of the last set. There are so many examples of that having already happened with the Government's reforms that I hardly know where to begin. Perhaps, as I have already been speaking for a while, I will confine myself to three.

First, there were the individual learning accounts. Remember those? They were an early attempt by the Government to address the skills agenda, but they had to be abandoned because they generated so much fraud. Then there is the pension credit, a flagship policy introduced as recently as October 2003, but just over a year later we have had a number of press reports suggesting that it is to be scrapped. There are also the new tax credits to which I alluded. Those were presented as a light-touch system, responsive to the needs of families, but the overpayments problem seems to be growing all the time, and we do not yet know the full extent of it.

The plain fact is that this Chancellor cannot resist meddling. He is a spending Minister struggling to get out. He sometimes reminds me of an earnest professor of social engineering, with his incessant tweaking and adjusting of his own creation. We only have to look at the history of tax credits to see that. In the space of four years, this Chancellor has abolished family credit and introduced the working families tax credit.

Rob Marris: Very generous.

Mr. Tyrie: He has introduced the child care tax credit and the disabled person's tax credit.

Rob Marris: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tyrie: He has introduced the employment credit, the children's tax credit and the baby tax credit.

Rob Marris: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tyrie: The Chancellor has abolished—and I do not know whether I will get more "Hear, hears"—the working families tax credit, the disabled person's tax credit, the children's tax credit and the baby tax credit. He has also abolished the employment tax credit and introduced the working tax credit. The results are predictable: low take-up, confusion and complexity. Those are the unintended consequences of a system in which fraud and error are rife and many people do not get the support to which they are entitled and which they deserve.

That brings me to my third and final point, which is about the Treasury as a spending Department. After all, most of what I have just described is a direct consequence of the Treasury's having started to meddle in this area. How on earth can it be that the Prime Minister has allowed a Chancellor to turn the Treasury into a spending Department? How on earth is it that the only gamekeeper that we have in Whitehall is now on the loose as a poacher? The answer comes in one word: Granita.

The truth is that just over a decade ago, in an Islington restaurant, the then Leader of the Opposition, now the Prime Minister, promised his shadow Chancellor that if they won the election he would have a free run of the fairness agenda—social justice, employment opportunities and skills. As a result, we have Treasury measures such as this, and the DWP, which is just about the only repository of wisdom in Whitehall about how to run a benefits system, lost half its remit. It is scarcely any wonder that there has been such chaos in the take-up of benefits. The Inland Revenue was never geared to run a benefits system; its job was to get the tax in. In the long run, neither the making nor the running of policy in this way is sustainable.

Mr. Liam Byrne (Birmingham, Hodge Hill) (Lab): I hate to puncture this entertaining narrative, but has not the effect of the changes introduced by the Chancellor been to end the growth of income inequality which so scarred the country under the last Conservative Administration?

Mr. Tyrie: That is a very broad question, but it is a fact that in the past seven years the number of those at the bottom end who are most in need—the so-called million who miss out on education and training—has increased from a little under a million to well over a million. The indicators point in several directions, and the picture is certainly unclear. What is more, that change took place at a time when the economy has been growing very strongly and unprecedented sums have been thrown at these problems. Never has so much money been spent, with so many good intentions, to so little effect.

As I said a moment ago, that is no way to run a Government. I have noticed that a number of new Labour's keenest, innermost, kitchen cabinet-type supporters have started to say the same. What does John Birt's proposal to extract the spending Departments from the Treasury and place them in the Cabinet Office really mean? It is about recreating something that was lost when the Treasury became a spending Department. It is about recreating a workable system of public expenditure control and review. That is what we desperately need in Whitehall now. Of course, it is also about trying to wrench back some control for the Prime Minister over the empire-building of his neighbour in No. 11.

If one wants to know the real origin of this child benefit proposal and the whole of the Treasury-driven skills agenda, one finds it in Granita. It is not all good and it is not all bad, but it lies there. The Granita deal has a lot to answer for, for the plain truth is that a great deal of Whitehall machinery has been wrenched apart and restructured to placate the ambitions of a thwarted Chancellor. This Bill is just one small part of that decision.

2.16 pm

Rob Marris (Wolverhampton, South-West) (Lab): I shall return in a while to the out-to-lunch remarks about Granita by the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie).

I want to put the Bill, which I very much welcome, into an historical context. Many of my generation, and those of others in the Chamber today, were scarred politically by our communities' experience of the 11-plus and the idea that, at age 11, one was either going to become a manual worker or an academic, A-level type with a higher certificate, as it used to be in England. We worked hard politically to overcome that bifurcation at age 11 with our support for comprehensive education and for encouraging young people into higher education. The pendulum has swung too far and what many of us, including me, overlooked, is that training is necessary for many manual jobs and that we should be looking for people divided off at age 11 into the non-academic stream to be able to get back, as adults, into the academic stream. That is what the Open university, one of the jewels in the crown of Harold Wilson's 1966 to 1970 Labour Government, was about. What has only just started to happen in the other direction is that, in the past three or four years, we have been looking at ways for those who were on the academic track to take a non-academic or less academic route to education and training.

Also part of the historical context is the fact that we have 2 million more people in work and the fact that in certain areas of the country there are huge skills shortages. Some of that is being addressed by imported labour, which in some cases will be temporary—for example, the use of Filipino nurses in the health services. However, the bulk of the problem should and will be solved by training home-grown labour.

The support that we as a society, the previous Government and this Government provided for those entering higher education was entirely worth while, but again the pendulum swung too far. Those who were continuing with training but were not in higher education were second-class citizens when it came to social and Government support for their endeavours. That is true of young people as well as mature students. I very much welcome the 14 to 19 strategy for increased curriculum flexibility that has come from the Tomlinson report. The Bill fits neatly with that as additional financial support for those who, for example, have had disrupted schooling and go on to do at 19 or 20 what some of their peers might have done at 17 or 18. It is very welcome and it is overdue.

You will know, Madam Deputy Speaker, of the huge skills shortages in your area, which is the same as mine—the black country—and of what the Learning and Skills Council and Connexions have been doing. We are starting to change that, but it will take a long time. It is particularly relevant for an industrial area such as the west midlands. Not so much down in the southern part, where you are, Madam Deputy Speaker, but where I am in Wolverhampton, there is a history of people training on the job but not getting formal qualifications. Although that is important, we need to move as a society towards more formal qualifications as well as training on the job that leads to qualifications. The Bill dovetails nicely with that, and it will be of tremendous benefit to our region and sub-region.

The hon. Member for Chichester rightly mentioned the complexity of the Bill. He talked about the various ways in which young people could access not only training but financial support, whether child benefit or education maintenance allowance. He mentioned the "Bridging the Gap" report, which refers to slightly different figures from his but reaches exactly the same end point. It says:

"Money is paid through at least eight different agencies (with a ninth heavily involved) on behalf of two Government Departments."

That was also mentioned by the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) when he talked about how young people would find out about this support, and it is what I found in my preparatory research for the debate. The aims of the Bill are twofold—to provide state support for trainees who are unwaged on training courses and for those who are, to put it in shorthand, at further education colleges and carrying on with courses until the age of 20 or so.

That is a simple and laudable goal; the complexity lies in the delivery mechanism. I caution the hon. Member for Chichester as regards talking about simplicity. Simplicity is one of those things, like cutting red tape, that is terribly attractive to Members all over the House, who hope that it will be attractive to those whose votes they seek to garner. As my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird)—a fellow member of the Work and Pensions Committee who will speak later—and I know, the Child Support Agency is a classic example. Parliament decided to simplify CS1, the first system that was brought in, and introduced CS2—a system based on 15 per cent. for the first child, 20 per cent. for the second child, and 25 per cent. for three or more children in terms of the non-resident parent's obligation to pay. That is a simple formula that is understandable to the man—it usually is a man—in the street, but the complexities of putting it into effect have bedevilled the Department for Work and Pensions and the Child Support Agency. What appeared to be simple on paper became terribly complex when one tried to put it into operation. The reason for that is simple—people lead complex lives. If we as a House try to simplify matters too much, it may well imperil support for children and for young people engaged in education and training who will be covered by the Bill potentially from the ages of 16 to 21.

The Bill is a step forward because it will start to address the skewed choices that some young people have made through force of financial circumstance. Paragraph 28 of the regulatory impact assessment states:

"One possible positive effect is that training providers may find they are on a level playing field with FE colleges because young people's decisions are not being skewed by differentials in financial support between the two learning routes."

It is very important that young people have a more level playing field of choice.

The costs have been adverted to. Government spending is massive. One should never be cavalier with taxpayers' money, but the Bill is a very positive step. As set out in the regulatory impact assessment—there will of course be changed behaviour, as the hon. Member for Chichester said—the cost of the 80,000 unwaged training positions will be £105 million per year. In fact, one hopes that there will be some change in behaviour and that more young people who are not on the training contracts will engage in them, thereby helping to address skills shortages. Relative to Government spending, that cost seems small. If the number of positions were to double from 80,000 to 160,000, and the per capita costs were roughly the same, the figure would rise to £210 million, with tremendous social benefit in terms of those young people's self-respect and dignity. There will be positive benefits for society when those young people come through the pipeline having been trained.

The cost of paying for FE places—again that is shorthand, but they are the main focus—is £65 million a year up to the age of 20 and £75 million up to the age of 21, with some attendant costs that are not mentioned.

Mr. Laws: As a matter of interest, if the Government said that they were not expecting any behavioural effects from these two changes, would the hon. Gentleman still think the measures worthwhile in their own right?

Rob Marris: I certainly would and I thought that I had said so. This training is a social good in terms of respect and dignity for young people who undergo it and receive some form of social recognition through money, which for many people, particularly young people, is a good way of getting recognition. Some young people who do not change their behaviour will be better off as a result. There will be significant advantages if there is changed behaviour in the direction that most of us would expect—that is, more, rather than fewer young people undergoing training.

Before I move on to my final remarks, I want to make some miscellaneous points. I am delighted that the Government published a regulatory impact assessment, and the partial one on top of it, so that we have some figures. They may not be as full as some Members would like, but they were published in time for the debate. I am particularly pleased to see the indicative draft regulations, which I am sure that the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), who ducked out of the Chamber briefly, dashed out to read with his usual thoroughness. They are but two pages, so they are a quick read. Regulation 2 defines "approved training" as:

"in relation to England, arrangements made by the Government known as 'Entry to Employment' or 'Programme Led Pathways into Apprenticeships'".

[Rob Marris]

I confess that I do not know the exact details of those programmes, but I am pleased that in this case the Treasury managed to produce some draft regulations for Second Reading. Would that every Department did that in time for Second Readings of Bills that contain references to regulations that will be made after their passage.

Mr. Bercow: I am in a generous mood. May I tell the hon. Gentleman that, although ordinarily I am struck principally by the opacity of secondary legislation, and by the fact that it tends to raise more questions than it answers, this set of draft regulations is truly a model of clarity and of brevity?

Rob Marris: I certainly agree. That is nothing less than the hon. Gentleman and I would expect from the Treasury.

I have a couple more miscellaneous points with which I think that the hon. Member for Buckingham, who is somewhat pedantic—strangely, I too am sometimes accused of being so—will sympathise. Clause 6(2) starts with a conjunction—"But". That is a horrible piece of journalese, and I hope that the Committee will change it. Conjunctions such as "because" and "although" are acceptable words with which to start a sentence, but "but" is not.

Clause 7 gives the short title of the Bill. It states:

"This Act may be cited as the Child Benefit Act 2005."

I think that that should read: "This Act may be cited as the Child and Qualifying Young Persons Benefit Act 2005." That is not pedantry. There is a problem with the Bill, as I read it, and the approach of the Government, as I read it. The goals are simple, but the ways of getting there are complex, as the hon. Member for Chichester pointed out. I am not sure that the Bill adequately addresses the question of independence for young people. We have to bear it in mind that, since about 1971, the age of majority has been 18. As I understand it, the education maintenance allowance, which was piloted in Wolverhampton, has been successful throughout the country. Year 12 participation increased by 5.9 per cent and year 13 participation by 4.1 per cent. in the EMA pilot areas. It is paid to the student and that is a mark of independence. Many students who are doing A-levels in a traditional sixth form in year 13 will be 18. I understand that they get the money directly, although I am prepared to be corrected because of the complexity of the matter. That gives the individual independence.

Similarly, the minimum training allowance is paid to the trainee. Conversely, child benefit—or child and qualifying young person's benefit—will be paid through the parent or guardian. If so, 18 and 19-year-olds, one and two years into their adulthood, will remain locked in, not only through means-testing but because of who receives the giro—or automated credit transfer, as it probably is nowadays. Who will get the money? Will the young people get it in their own name and right or will it be refracted through their parents or guardians? As I understand the Bill, the latter will apply. That is a step backwards and I shall highlight the point, and the way in which some young people feel, by referring to my experience, albeit not directly of the subject of our debate.

As some hon. Members know, I emigrated to Canada when I was 18. I was born and raised in Wolverhampton and I wanted to see the wider world. I have been back in Wolverhampton for many years and am very happy there, but I emigrated to Canada, where the federal age of majority was 18. Thus, at 18, with a scholarship for university, I could go there so I went and I had a great time. I was at the university of British Columbia, which, as some hon. Members know, is a distinguished institution, and I picked up a couple of degrees there. However, in British Columbia, the age of majority was 19 and a driving licence could be obtained at 16, 17 or 18 only if a parent or guardian co-signed the application form. I had a United Kingdom driving licence, but it had to be transferred to the provincial jurisdiction in Canada. One could not get one's driving licence without parental consent until the age of 19. That was the age of majority in the provincial jurisdiction for road traffic matters, which, under confederation, were in the power of the province. Hon. Members will not be surprised to know that I was darned if, having emigrated at 18 and being totally financially independent of my parents, I would seek their permission to get a driving licence. I therefore had to wait several months until I was 19 to take a driving test.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds) (Con): What has any of that to do with the Bill?

Rob Marris: I am sorry if the hon. Gentleman believes that my comments are irrelevant. I am trying to make a point about young people's feelings by referring to mine at the age of 18 about being perceived as appendages of their parents when they are adults. The Bill appears to perpetuate that and make the position worse. Whereas the minimum training allowance is paid to the individual trainee, the replacement young person's child benefit will be refracted through a parent or guardian, thereby lessening the young person's independence. That is the relevance of my comments. I apologise to the hon. Gentleman if I did not make it entirely clear. I wanted to make a point about the Bill's structure and the way in which the expanded child benefit, which I greatly welcome, will be assessed and paid. I should like the Government to tackle that.

2.33 pm

Mr. David Laws (Yeovil) (LD): We join the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) in welcoming the Bill, especially two specific provisions: first, extending child benefit and the child tax credit to unwaged trainees and, secondly, allowing young people who reach the age of 19 and are on a course to continue on it with the benefits that they received previously. We believe that both changes are sensible and we support the broad thrust of the Government's strategy to try to ensure a coherent, simple and helpful system of support for young people.

The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) mentioned one reason for the Bill: to ensure a fair and level playing field between young people in training and those in formal education. That is sensible and clearly reflects some of the changes that the Department for Education and Skills is currently considering. The Bill has to be viewed against the background of the Government's attempts, for example, through the education maintenance allowance, to encourage young people to develop their skills and to help those young people who would otherwise be under pressure to leave education and training and go straight to work. We welcome the opportunity for those people to continue in education and training.

The hon. Member for Chichester made several points about the Treasury's involvement, on which it is worth commenting at the outset. We welcome the strategic interest that the Treasury has shown since 1997 in economic and social issues. The Red Books have got larger over the years. Although those of us who read them note their increasing cost and length, we also note the broad strategic economic and social set of objectives that the Government present, steered by the Treasury, either because of the Granita dinner or for some other reason. It is important for any Government to have a set of broad economic and social objectives. They should be pursued by some part of Government—the Treasury or perhaps the Cabinet Office in future. The Cabinet Office would have to do a reasonably good job to co-ordinate them and create a sense of coherence in the way that the Treasury has done since 1997.

Those relatively complimentary comments come with a reservation that, although the Treasury has a useful co-ordinating role, I am not sure whether it is sensible for it to be seen to lead on matters that would normally be the domain of individual Departments. No doubt all hon. Members who speak in the debate, including from the Front Benches, will be well briefed, but many of the detailed and substantive provisions in the Bill are matters more for the Departments for Education and Skills and for Work and Pensions. The measure would benefit from not only their involvement but their leading on the issues. It would also benefit from the Treasury playing not only its part in the broad strategic direction of Government policy but a policing role for large amounts of public expenditure. The costs may be clear but the benefits are not.

The Bill is small and uncontentious but important. First, it deals with two substantive matters that affect approximately 160,000 young people. It is a worthwhile measure for that reason. Secondly, it is clearly part of a much broader and longer-term strategy to simplify and rationalise the system of support for children, young people and young adults. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West made the sensible point that having 19, 20 and 21-year-olds on child benefit appears bizarre and eccentric. I suspect that when people outside the House realise the position, they will find it eccentric. It will lead to even more confusion of the sort to which the hon. Member for Chichester referred. That is amplified by the sketch and graph in the paper that the Government issued in March 2004 and that attempts to set out in visual form the existing systems of support for young people. It is extremely challenging. I hope that the Government will take the opportunity in the longer term to rationalise and simplify support for young people. I hope that, in future, we will not have to rely on child benefit as the means of support for young people who have clearly entered their adult years.

Rob Marris: The hon. Gentleman referred to my comment about the independence, or lack thereof, of 18 and 19-year-olds. Given that a qualifying young person's child benefit will apparently be paid through a parent or guardian, does he agree that there is a potential breach of the Human Rights Act 1998, because 18 or 19-year-olds would have to tell their parents that they were in training or education at a further education college? They may not wish to do that, but if they do not, they may not be able to gain access to the money.

Mr. Laws: The hon. Gentleman makes an important point. Where there is already a breakdown in the relationship between the young person and the parent, a different category of benefit entitlement might apply anyway and they would not be covered by the child benefit provisions. However, there will be many marginal cases, and this should be one of the issues that we consider very carefully in Committee.

The final reason why this is an important Bill is that although it is short and seems modest, it involves quite a lot of public expenditure. The total cost, as the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West said, is about £170 million a year, or £6 for every taxpaying household in the country. That is not a huge amount, but it is not a modest amount either, and we should certainly subject that sort of expenditure to a great deal of scrutiny.

I want to touch on four issues today. The first is the cost and benefit calculations that have to be made, and the extent to which they have been made in the regulatory impact assessment. Secondly, I want briefly to look at any problems likely to arise when changes are made to the entitlement of unwaged trainees. Thirdly, I want to look at the way in which the changes will affect young people who are still in education or training at the age of 19. Fourthly, I want to make a couple of brief comments about the Government's future strategy in these areas.

I want to start by joining the hon. Member for Chichester in expressing surprise at the paucity of information in the initial regulatory impact assessment, and to express my relief that a partial supplementary assessment was published recently. There was a wonderful letter at the back of the initial regulatory impact assessment, which was no doubt among the many things on the Paymaster General's desk that she had to sign at the end of a busy day. She had to put her signature beneath this sentence:

"I have read the regulatory impact assessment and I am satisfied that the benefits justify the costs."

I do not know how she came to that conclusion by reading the regulatory impact assessment, because it is extremely brief and extremely unhelpful in terms of assessing both the benefits and the costs.

In fairness to the Treasury, we have had the supplementary partial regulatory impact assessment, which is pretty clear on the costs. Some issues might arise in relation to the costs based on our assumptions about what individuals will do in responding to these changes, but the cost side of the equation is pretty clear, as I am afraid it usually is when any Government introduce a change in policy. We always know what it will cost, and those cost estimates tend to be reasonably reliable.

It is far less clear what kind of benefits we can achieve through these changes. Some might be achieved simply through creating a fairer system and having a more socially acceptable set of benefit entitlements. That was the implication of the comment made by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West when I asked him whether he would still be in favour of the two changes even if there were no economic benefit. It is quite possible that we would be in favour of them for other reasons, although I doubt that that would be the case in relation to educational maintenance allowances. If we had spent additional money on those and there had been no increase in the staying-on rate, I suspect that few of us would think that it had been money well spent. There are, therefore, reasons for us to look very closely at the economic benefits of the proposals.

This area of public expenditure is competing with every other one for a slice of the national cake and for available expenditure, which is likely to be quite scarce after the next election, given the state of the public finances. If we look at the section of the regulatory impact assessment that discusses benefits, which the hon. Member for Chichester was generous enough not to read out earlier, we find that it states:

"The benefits of the Bill are two fold. Firstly it enables implementation of the reforms to the definition of a child to address two key anomalies".

It then sets out the anomalies that are dealt with in the Bill. It goes on:

"Secondly it introduces a degree of flexibility to respond to curriculum changes in England expected to flow from the 14–19 working group, chaired by Mike Tomlinson".

In other words, all that the section on benefits says is that the benefits are what the Bill does, and that it is going to introduce a degree of flexibility in relation to changes that we do not yet know will actually take place, but that are simply expected to take place. On that basis, the Paymaster General has signed a piece of paper stating that she is satisfied that the benefits justify the costs. I am glad that she did not say that the benefits exceeded the costs, because it would be very difficult to establish that from the information that we have. This is an important issue, however.

The hon. Member for Chichester alluded earlier to some of the estimates that we would expect the Treasury to have made in order to come to a reasonable monetary estimate of the benefit of this legislation. The Treasury must have made some sort of assessment of the effect of the extension of child benefit and the child tax credit to unwaged trainees. Presumably, it could have an impact in two ways. First, it could encourage individuals who would otherwise have gone into paid employment to go into unpaid employment. That could have a significant cost to the Exchequer. Secondly, it is quite possible, as the Government have acknowledged, that it might act as an incentive to draw people out of formal education into unwaged training, which could end up being less expensive—in that narrow sense—for the Government.

However, we are left with no sense of the estimate that the Government have made of the effect of these changes. Without that, we have no sense of what the Government would consider to be a success or a failure in terms of the effects of these changes on people's behaviour. If we are to know how successful the provisions have been, and whether the extent of the incentives is sufficient, we need to know what the Government expect. I hope that the Economic Secretary will be able to say more about that later.

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): I am following the hon. Gentleman's argument closely, and I think that we all agree that there is some slight confusion about the Government's figures on the benefits of these changes and exactly how much they are going to cost. This could have been a Department for Work and Pensions Bill, or even, arguably, a Department for Education and Skills Bill, but it is a Treasury Bill. Is there not a delightful irony in the fact that the Treasury, of all Departments, cannot be specific about the figures involved?

Mr. Laws: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point, and it is made stronger by the fact that it is the Treasury that should be acting to exert discipline in these circumstances. However, if the Treasury is seen to be the lead Department, it is much more difficult for it to enforce a degree of rigour in relation to the costs and benefits.

The costs and benefits are also relevant to any incentives that might be created by the changes for people to extend their courses. The Government have expressed their concern that there might be an incentive for people who have turned 19 to carry on their courses for longer. This is not an area in which I claim to have expertise—input from colleagues from the Department for Work and Pensions and the Department for Education and Skills would be useful here. Will there also be an incentive for employers to switch from having young people in training on a waged basis to doing so on an unwaged basis in order to exploit the changes in benefit entitlements? The Government have suggested in some of their comments in the regulatory impact assessment that they are concerned about that, and there are allusions to the need to deal with the issue. However, we are given no sense of how they intend to do so. The effects that the changes will have in regard to child benefit and child tax credit also relate to those people who stay in education beyond the age of 19. We need to know what effect the Government expect that to have.

It would also be helpful if the Economic Secretary could clarify whether the costs of the Bill have been built in to the existing public expenditure estimates, or whether the Chancellor will need to make an additional provision for this expenditure in the next Budget. In other words, is this already in the Treasury's public expenditure plans, or will they have to be increased to take account of these provisions?

We need to consider a number of issues relating to the substantive non-cost issues resulting from the two changes. The first category relates to the changes in regard to unwaged trainees. The Paymaster General said earlier that she believed that all the 80,000 people currently in unwaged training—that was the figure as at September 2004—would receive child benefit and child tax credit under the changes. That is not the impression that I get when I read sections 9 and 10 of the supplementary partial regulatory impact assessment, as it seems that the Government have had to make a judgment about how they extend this entitlement in practice, and how they define and seek to regulate the category of people who are counted as unwaged and in training.

The Government appear to have had two different options: one was to extend those entitlements to all unwaged trainees, and the other was to try to come up with some definition. I think that the definition that the Government have come up with is that those benefits will be extended to "those who do not have a contract of employment on Government Supported Training programmes".

Section 9 of the supplementary regulatory impact assessment goes on to say that the Government

"will do this by naming the relevant programmes of Government Supported Training in the new regulations".

I am therefore dubious—I admit that the Paymaster General said that she would come back to me on this—about whether her comment that all 80,000 individuals on unwaged training would be covered is likely to be realised in practice. I suspect that a small group of people will be missed out, but without the expertise in that area I am unable to speculate on how large that group may be. I hope that the Economic Secretary may be able to comment on that later and tell us whether any groups might otherwise miss out.

Rob Marris: Is not the answer to the hon. Gentleman's question in the final sentence of paragraph 10 of the supplementary partial regulatory impact assessment, which reads:

"The Exchequer cost of extending the same package of support as for full-time education to unwaged trainees in all programmes of Government Supported Training is £105 million"?

Mr. Laws: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that point. That is not how I read it. My reading is that that cost estimate of £105 million is based on the conditions imposed in paragraph 9, which relate specifically to particular Government-supported training programmes that will be spelled out. I think that that is an attempt by the Government to make sure that there is not abuse of those entitlements by employers or others who make bogus claims about people on unwaged training programmes. I fear that some people may be missing out, perhaps understandably, as the Government want to make sure that it is policed effectively, but it would be useful to know a bit more about it.

Mr. Tyrie: The hon. Gentleman is on to a strong point, which I considered making myself. The point was made to me by the Prince's Trust, whose letter I have in front of me. It strongly urged clarification on this point, and specifically wanted to know what is meant by Government-supported schemes, and whether voluntary work, work experience and other more informal forms of training will be ineligible.

Mr. Laws: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for reinforcing that point, which seems to indicate that it may be useful for the Economic Secretary to clarify that issue today.

My other concern is that there may be employer incentives to switch between waged and unwaged training, which I mentioned earlier. The Government seem to share that concern, because in the initial regulatory impact assessment, in paragraphs 20 and 21, they set out that there might be some problems in that area. Paragraph 21 says specifically that devolved organisations, with responsibility for securing the progression of trainees from unwaged to waged status, may have to bring in new accountability arrangements to ensure that no adverse impacts or unintended consequences flow from treating unwaged Government supported training more generously. I would be grateful if the Economic Secretary could comment on what proposals there may be to make sure that there is no abuse or adverse impacts.

Finally, Barnardo's has made some useful representations. It is concerned—including on the issue of unwaged trainees—about whether the proposals will reach the underachieving and hard-to-reach group of young people with whom it must often deal, who do not always fit into the neat packages in terms of behaviour, work patterns and benefit entitlements, that the Government, and all Governments, would like. The Barnardo's briefing, which many of us will have received before today's debate, states:

"The aim of the new financial support package is to encourage more young people into training or education but it is difficult to see how a measure that 'rewards' the family rather than the individual young person will assist training programmes to recruit under achieving or hard to reach young people."

That touches on the argument that the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West also made earlier. I would be grateful if the Economic Secretary could comment on that, too.

On extending the benefit entitlements and child tax credit entitlement to those who reach the age of 19 and over, we support the change, which seems entirely sensible. Clearly, there are risks of wilful or passive abuse, and the Government's initial suggestion that the cut-off would be raised only to 20 rather than higher, seems sensible. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West also pointed out the sheer oddity of potentially extending child benefit to 20 and 21-year-olds and he is absolutely right that we should hope that that is not the long-term mechanism that the Government intend to use to get help to those young people. Fortunately, we understand that the Government are engaged in a much more far-ranging inquiry into support for young people in future, which will be designed to rationalise all that. I do not imagine that the Government will be considering child benefit to support people in those circumstances in future. If the Economic Secretary could clarify that it would be useful, and it might also address the concerns of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West about parents getting involved, even though the young people concerned have become adults under UK law.

Barnardo's also makes a very effective point about hard-to-reach young people and the age 19 cut-off. Its briefing says that

"from our own experience we know that there are young people who, because of their life circumstances, do not access training until later and require a longer period of training before they are fully ready to move into employment . . . If the Child Benefit and Tax Credit extensions are not to apply to them—and we acknowledge the incongruity of "Child" benefits for 21 year olds—then we would wish to see some other sort of continuing financial support for this group of young people."

That reinforces the comments made by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West and the need for us eventually to move beyond reliance on child benefit in this area.

[Mr. Laws]

Those are the issues that are specifically relevant to this Bill, with which I hope the Economic Secretary will deal. It is also worth making a couple of points about the Government's wider strategy, because this Bill is something of a milestone along the way to a new system of support for young people. We ought to be thinking about what we are seeking to achieve in that new system.

There is a degree of ambiguity in the Government's strategy in relation to what they are seeking to achieve. A useful paper came out earlier this year, "Supporting young people to achieve", which was sponsored by the Treasury, the Department for Work and Pensions and the Department for Education and Skills. On page 34, it states:

"As well as providing a stable bridge of income between activities, support paid at the same level irrespective of activities would not distort choices."

The argument is that the Government would put in place a system of support for young people in which choices between different elements of education and training would not be distorted by economic incentives and the way in which young people are supported. That comes back to the level playing field argument and the reasons for extending benefits to unwaged trainees. If we read on, the next paragraph states:

"Financial incentives would influence young people's behaviour in several ways. First the additional weekly amount payable direct to the young person would provide an incentive for them to progress into learning."

There we come to the other part of the Government's agenda, which is not really to have a simple level playing field, but to try to tackle some of the problems to which the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West alluded earlier—the inability of many young people to stay on in education and training at age 16 or 17 because of economic pressures to go into work and earn money. That is causing the Government not to create a level playing field, but to create certain incentives that are deliberately designed to encourage people to stay in education and training. That may be a very good thing, but it is not the same as a level playing field. It also raises a series of problems in terms of Government policy—which brings us back full circle to the issue with which the hon. Member for Chichester began, namely, costs and benefits.

If the Government are going to spend a lot of money, they must be very cautious. They must ensure that spending that scarce money actually does change behaviour, rather than simply leading to the deadweight costs that we spoke of earlier. The incentives that the Government implement may not always achieve that balance between costs and benefits. Moreover, in making these changes the Government may, as Barnardo's suggests, impose conditions that will not be easily met by the most vulnerable in society.

There are a number of concrete issues on which we need reassurance from the Government—not just the issue of the cost-benefit balance, but some of the practicalities involved in the Bill's implementation. There are far bigger issues relating to the Government's strategy, with which we will deal on another occasion.

3.1 pm

Mr. Liam Byrne (Birmingham, Hodge Hill) (Lab): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in this important debate. It is important because it is about young people—the people who will inspire us and take our country, our communities and our economy in new directions during this century. They are the young people who, I hope, will not just reinvent the country but support us in what I trust will be a long and happy retirement.

The fact is, however, that many young people do not receive the credit they deserve. Sometimes our communities blame them for many of society's problems; sometimes, indeed, they are afraid of them. Nevertheless, our young people are not just an equal part of society but—as President Kennedy once put it—the gold reserve of any nation. They are the source of our future wealth and well-being.

I came to understand that vividly last Friday, when I was joined at Shard End community centre by the chief constable of West Midlands police, Paul Scott-Lee—a remarkable public servant in his own right, who has served the west midlands extremely well. He joined me for a cup of coffee and a talk with local residents about antisocial behaviour. It was a feisty meeting, as such meetings often are, but Mr. Scott-Lee made a simple and powerful point: he said that as a community, we must take care never to demonise our young people. It is true that some young people will always cause problems for others, just as many old people will. I have dealt with enough nuisance neighbours in Hodge Hill to know that the middle-aged are sometimes just as big a problem as the young.

I have to say that when I first heard Paul Scott-Lee express his views I was sceptical, but on reflection I realise that he was right. We should remember that young people can be inspirational too. We need only think of the way in which Amir Khan captivated a nation at the Olympics; we need only think of young Ms MacArthur battling her way around the southern oceans at this very moment. Indeed, this country once appointed someone in his early 20s as Prime Minister. Young people in history and today have helped to make the country great, and it is young people of genius and spirit who will power it to a greater future.

Everyone who will work in the labour market of 2020 is now alive, yet that world of 2020 will be very different from the world of today. First, our young people will have to support rather more senior citizens. By 2020, 30 per cent. of the UK population will be over 60, up from 20 per cent. today. Today the over-65s constitute 24 per cent. of the working population; by 2025 that will rise to 33 per cent., and by 2050 it will rise to nearly 40 per cent.

Secondly, it will fall to our young people to rise to the challenge of reinventing the way in which our world works. We can see clearly some of what will happen in the future when we reflect on what has happened over the past 20 years. Today, a throwaway musical birthday card has more computing power than the mainframe computer of a couple of decades ago. In 2020, computers will be 4,000 times as powerful as they are today. Nowadays, an estimated 10 to 20 new medicines resulting from biotechnology are launched every year. By 2015, genetic therapy will treat 30 per cent. of life-threatening diseases with a genetic root. All those new possibilities will change the way our country looks, and will power an economy that by 2020 will be 50 per cent. bigger than it is today. It is our young people who will drive those changes.

We will all have different stories about what that means in our constituencies. I know what it means in Hodge Hill. I recently visited Hodge Hill mixed school, where the head teacher, Marie McMahon, rightly talked proudly of the transformation in the school's results over the past year. She introduced me to some of the school's outstanding graduates. Once upon a time, they would have left school for unemployment—or worse; now, thanks to this Government's reforms over the past seven years, they are ambitious to stay in education, and financially equipped to do so.

All those young people had one thing in common: an ambition to leave school and go on investing in themselves—working hard not just for themselves but for their families and communities. They were, quite frankly, an inspiration. In a way, the Bill is about how we as a country can support people like them as they face the possibilities of tomorrow. That is of particular concern to many of us in Hodge Hill, because we have one of the lowest post-16 participation rates in education, and consequently one of the lowest rates for participation in higher education. Children and young people are now very well served by many of the schools in my constituency, and by many of the local further education institutions—organisations such as City college, blessed by great public servants such as Kate Morris, who retires today after a lifetime of service.

Nevertheless, the country confronts two problems. How can we create an economy that is healthy, but in which each of us has an equal chance to become wealthy? To achieve that goal we must not just improve our national productivity but ensure a more equal distribution of skills. In the past few years, we have made great strides in transforming productivity. We are now as productive as Germany, and we are fast catching up with France. That is due in no small measure to our national investment in skills. In 1981, 7.8 million workers were without qualifications; now 90 per cent. have formal qualifications. Today 28 per cent. of the work force are educated to NVQ level 4 and above, an increase of 133 per cent. in 20 years. Seventy per cent. of those aged between 25 and 64 have had a secondary education, and half those between 16 and 18 are in full-time education or training, compared to just one third in 1985.

That is a pattern that we must sustain and improve if we are to stay ahead as a nation. In the years to come our economy will need reskilling, and reskilling again. In 1980 almost no one predicted the advent of the personal computer, and in 1990 no one predicted the rise of the internet; yet today information technology skills are judged essential by every employer. If we are to accelerate the pace of investment in productivity and create real opportunities for all our young people to share in the wealth of tomorrow, we have a long way to go in terms of investing in skills, as my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General explained so eloquently.

Today, the single most important reason for economic inactivity is a lack of education and training. Our intermediate skills still do not compare well with those of our competitors. Indeed, just over one third of the UK work force have reached NVQ level 3 or equivalent, whereas three quarters of the German work force have done so. That is why the Bill is so welcome to the 7,500 young people in Hodge Hill. It provides nothing short of a 40 per cent. pay rise for those of our young people who seek a training-based option at 16.

Thanks to this Government, students from poor backgrounds who want to stay on at school can now access up to £30 a week in education maintenance allowance—a payment that does nothing to affect access to a range of other benefits. Yet those who take up a training allowance might receive as little as £40 a week, with their access to supplementary benefits disallowed. Given that income support currently stands at £43.25 a week, we can see that any such person, no matter what their ability or ambition to learn, would face a very difficult decision if they were experiencing hard times. We must change that. We must make sure that investing in oneself has a pay-off. We have to ensure that the right benefits are available to our young people, and maximise their chances of living a life off benefits.

Many Members from all parts of the House share a simple ambition for this country: that if we can find a shred of talent or potential in any of our young people, we should nurture it and invest in it, and help it to grow into something of pride and value not just to one family but to a whole community, and not just for a fleeting moment but for a lifetime. That is surely a worthy ambition for this House, which is why the Bill deserves unanimous support.

3.11 pm

Tony Baldry (Banbury) (Con): The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Byrne) has made a thoughtful and interesting speech, and none of us would dissent from anything that he said. Many of us enjoyed walking round his constituency last year; getting to know a part of Birmingham that we had not hitherto known was an interesting experience. In 22 years as a Member of the House, this is the first time that I have taken part in a debate, other than Budget debates, to which Treasury Ministers are replying. Indeed, the Whips suggested to me that participating this afternoon would widen my horizons.

I want to make only three points, and I hope not to bore the House in doing so. The first echoes the comments of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill. I am fortunate enough, in my work with the International Development Committee, to travel the world fairly extensively. We often think of certain places as being poor, but if I were king for a day, I would try to ensure that as many people as possible visited China. There are cities and towns growing up in China of which we have not heard, and which are as large as, if not larger than, cities such as Coventry and Bristol. China's growth and its skills capacity are phenomenal, and it will challenge the competitiveness of Europe and the rest of the developed world in a way that UK and European business has not even begun to grasp. We think of countries such as India as poor, and some parts of it indeed are. However, places such as Bangalore are incredibly successful and high-tech. If we do not ensure that our young people acquire the maximum number of skills, Britain and Europe will fall behind; it is as simple as that. Unskilled and unqualified people will undoubtedly become unemployed.

[Tony Baldry]

My second point echoes the one that I made in an intervention. The Sure Start scheme is excellent, but perhaps we also need a "firm finish" scheme. We need an undertaking from the Department for Education and Skills that every youngster, at some stage in their school education, will have an individual interview with someone from Connexions who can go through all the options available to them. It is human nature for schools to want to encourage the maximum staying-on rate. Given the current capitation formula, the more people who stay on, the more money schools get, so they tend not to explain to youngsters that other opportunities exist, such as attending local colleges and doing NVQs, BTECs, national diplomas and various other training. I simply am not confident that such possibilities are pointed out to them. To be honest, nor am I confident that Connexions is even connected in my part of the world. The learning and skills council is an element of the machinery of government that still needs to be fitted in.

On paper, having a uniform and straightforward maintenance and support system for youngsters is a brilliant idea, but parents have got to be able to understand it. I hope that the Inland Revenue, perhaps with the help of the Plain English Society and others, will produce a booklet explaining to parents how the system works. Library briefing papers and other such documents tend to assume that all parents are rational, and that we sit down and think of all the options. Often, our children tell us what they want to do and we interact with them, and we must also remember that many parents have other dimensions to consider. They may have children with disabilities, they may be divorced or separated, or their children might themselves be carers. Life is not simple, therefore, and I hope that Treasury Ministers will undertake to produce for parents straightforward information that they can understand.

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): I am interested in what the hon. Gentleman is saying, and he is right to emphasise the role of parents. However, many parents are not competent in this regard—they are not fully literate or numerate—so the state has to intervene in such cases to make sure that young people get a good start. Will he not commend the Government for the emphasis that they have placed on teaching basic skills in primary education? That is the first base, which all children must get to.

Tony Baldry: We all want to enhance primary education. If the hon. Gentleman is right in suggesting that some parents have difficulties in that regard, that is all the more reason why we need to be confident that they understand the various choices available to them. Youngsters must not feel under pressure to leave school early because their parents or guardians do not believe that they have the financial resources to support them.

If we do not enhance our skills base, we will simply get left behind. Secondly, I hope that every youngster at some stage during their school career, before they take their GCSEs, can have a personal interview with a Connexions representative, who can go through the various options with them and ensure that they have some form of career and education plan between the ages of 16 and 19.

Thirdly, I hope that we can be confident that parents will be given some straightforward briefing, and I hope that it will be better than that given for the tax credit schemes. What I am about to say might sound rather portentous, but I am not sure that it is possible to say such things without sounding that way. I am fortunate enough to be a lawyer—a barrister—and I spend all my time construing documents, yet when people come to my constituency surgery with information on the various tax credit schemes, I find trying to understand it all harder than dealing with High Court pleadings. How ordinary people can be expected to understand it I do not know.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): Is not the situation even more difficult when constituents appear in our surgeries with 15 different Government documents telling them what their tax credit is? If we as Members of Parliament cannot sort out such things, our constituents certainly cannot.

Tony Baldry: There are also cases of constituents getting different letters, dated the same day, giving different amounts.

This is a non-contentious Bill that commands support throughout the House, but perhaps the icing on the cake would be a really good straightforward booklet for parents, produced with the help of the Plain English Society and others, so that we can ensure maximum take-up of the benefits that the Bill seeks to provide.

3.19 pm

Iain Wright (Hartlepool) (Lab): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry), not least because in his comments—which, like those of the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow), who is no longer in his place, were non-partisan—he tried to address the principal point of the Bill. As he said, we have a skills gap in this country and must deal with it in order to compete globally with the likes of China and India. I contrast the hon. Gentleman's welcome comments with those of the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie). He, too, is no longer in his place, but he tried to make a petty party political point.

The fact remains that since 1997, child benefit has increased from £11.10 to £16.10 for the first child. That is what really matters to parents out there. It amounts to something like a 50 per cent. increase in seven years. Perhaps I should declare an interest, as a father of four whose family receives child benefit. More important than my own personal experience, though, is that of the 8,700 families in Hartlepool who have benefited from the Government's child support schemes such as child benefit and child tax credit.

In my brief contribution I shall concentrate on the skills shortages in my constituency, and how the Bill will substantially improve the skills base for the Hartlepool economy. There is a huge anomaly in the present system, whereby child benefit is paid for 16 to 19-year-olds who stay in full-time education, but not for those who enter work-based training. That severely disadvantages young people who may not wish to go on to further or higher education, but choose to enter the employment market through unwaged training.

At the moment, choosing the route of unwaged training has a huge impact on the household budgets of families in which 17 or 18-year-olds are rightly expected to pay board and lodgings in the parental home. In reality, that prevents young people from exercising real choice, and can push them down a route in life that they may not really wish to follow. That sort of conditioning or soft coercion prevents people from fulfilling their potential. I think that the Bill will help to eliminate that problem, and should therefore be welcomed throughout the House.

One of the true success stories for Hartlepool in the last decade has been the educational attainment of our schoolchildren. Last year, for example, Hartlepool schoolchildren provided the fastest improving set of key stage 2 results in the entire country. More 16-year-olds than ever before are now leaving school in Hartlepool with qualifications. I believe that the figures speak for themselves. In 1996, 12 per cent. of Hartlepool's 16-year-olds left school without any qualifications; in 2004, only 5.1 per cent. did that.

Despite those successes and improvements, significant basic skills deficiencies and vocational skill shortages remain in Hartlepool. There is a recognised difficulty in progressing people from low-level, community-based training and learning to high-level skills and jobs. Some specific groups in the community have real difficulty in accessing training opportunities. I am thinking particularly of young carers, of whom there are substantial numbers in Hartlepool. Many of those are 16 or 17-year-olds caring for a sick relative. Every penny counts in such households, and the Bill's provision to continue financial support for young carers to undertake work-based training will help to ensure that they are not trapped in a benefit rut for the rest of their lives through no fault of their own, because of their wish to care for their relatives. That must surely be welcomed.

Hartlepool was one of the areas that piloted the education maintenance allowance, whereby £30 a week was paid to young people and a bonus payment made at specific points in the year. The effect on the traditionally lowest-achieving and hard-to-reach groups was hugely positive. Not only did the EMA help to increase recruitment of these difficult-to-reach groups, it had a massive impact on retention, with people not only starting training but finishing the course as well. It also improved the attendance and behaviour of individuals. I would suggest that the use of EMAs in Hartlepool has been found to have tremendous benefits for the individual, for his or her family, for the local skills base and for society in general. The experience of my constituency suggests that the Bill will have hugely positive benefits in continuing and extending financial support for young people to continue training that they might otherwise have been unable to do.

Another of the Government's successes has been the reintroduction and encouragement of apprenticeships. In the large employers in my constituency, particularly Corus, the profile of the work force is curious. It includes men and women in their 50s or older who came through apprenticeships in the 1960s or 70s. There is then a wide age gap reflecting a lack of regard for apprenticeships, perhaps in the 1980s and 1990s. There may have been a change in fashion in that respect. Then we have young lads and lasses who have started work in the past five years or so. We need more apprenticeships in Hartlepool if the local economy is to flourish. Anything that encourages training and apprenticeships, or the prospects of entering into apprenticeships, as the Bill does, is to be welcomed.

I believe that the Bill complements and expands on the work done in the past seven years to break the cycle of despair, decline and neglect in run-down neighbourhoods, and to create an environment of hope, opportunity, choice and prosperity. The Bill will stand with such worthwhile achievements as Sure Start and the tax credit system. It will also facilitate the improvement of skills in my constituency and elsewhere, which is so necessary to bring about the sustained economic prosperity that will help the country to compete globally. I fully support it.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds) (Con): I welcome the opportunity to speak in this important debate, for two reasons: first, to highlight the critical importance to this country of training, particularly vocational training, and secondly to highlight the pressing need for greater simplicity in the system of benefit and support for our young people.

The Government's March 2004 consultation paper, "Supporting young people to achieve: towards a new deal for skills" has many merits. The Government announced their long-term intention to create a single, simplified system of financial support for young people. The paper also announced short-term measures, which are largely contained in the Bill, including the extension of child benefit and child tax credit to unwaged trainees between the ages of 16 and 19, and changes to benefit and tax credit rules to ensure that young people who reach 19 before they have finished school or college continue to be eligible for benefits and tax credits until they complete their course.

The skills shortage reveals a lack of real attention on the part of successive Governments to the importance of achieving true parity of esteem for vocational training with academic education up to 19. That is an important issue and the Bill does something to deal with the problem.

There is a shortage of skills in this country, and we all see it in our constituencies. The hon. Member for Hartlepool (Iain Wright) eloquently drew attention to the problem in respect of the urban part of Britain. I represent a rural part of Britain where the problem is equally pressing. The two main towns in my constituency, Bury St. Edmunds and Stowmarket, would probably be described as market towns, and they have extremely low unemployment. There are many companies in all sectors that just cannot secure the necessary skilled labour. That is partly connected with the fact that there is a buoyant jobs market, but is also to do with a lack of ambition that has afflicted parts of the county of Suffolk for many years.

I am delighted to report, however, that there have been some sterling efforts made in my constituency in respect of technology status for schools. Stowmarket high school, under the leadership of an exceptional head, Mr. David Oliver, and his dedicated team of governors, pressed hard for technology status. The school understood that in the area of Stowmarket there was a huge and pressing need to skill up our young people from 14 onwards. There has not been a particularly marked appetite among GCSE pupils in the area to go on to university, but there is an appetite for getting high-quality vocational training. My sense is that all political parties in this country understand that it takes massive skill to be a first-class electrician, plumber, bricklayer or central heating engineer. Those are good and noble careers that require skill, dexterity and training. I could not do them, as I am clueless in practical matters. Governments of all political persuasions must do more to celebrate, support and talk up vocational training.

That should not be necessary. For example, Germany does not have the same problem. Any vibrant economy must have an appropriate mix of education. People who prefer the academic route need to be catered for, as do those who prefer the vocational route. In that context, I also want to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the other schools in my area—King Edward's, St. Benedict's and County upper in Bury St. Edmunds, and Thurston community college and Stowupland high school.

The battle continues to ensure that our economy has the skilled work force that it needs to preserve its record of economic growth, but some rather worrying statistics have been unearthed by the Learning and Skills Council, which recently published the key findings of its survey of the scale of shortages that obtained in February last year. The survey showed that more than one in 10 of the English work force—that is, 2.4 million workers—lacked the skills that they need to do their jobs as well as they should be done. One third of employers had no training plans to plug that skills gap, and one fifth of job vacancies—about 135,000 posts—remained unfilled because of lack of appropriately skilled applicants. The study also found that poor basic skills cost a typical business employing 50 people about £165,000 a year, and that employers in London were the least likely to offer employees adequate training.

The CBI and the TUC recently estimated the cost of the skills crisis to the British economy at a staggering £10 billion a year—that is, about £170 for every man, woman and child in the country. The Government's skills strategy document of June 2003 conceded that our skills gap had remained stubbornly persistent. The problem did not arise over the past seven years, but it has not been adequately addressed in that time. There is not much point in prating on about what happened in the 1980s and 1990s, because the remorseless demand for a greater competitive edge in this country over the past seven years is there for all to see. Global economic forces mean that we live in a more competitive economy than was the case even 20 years ago. I suggest therefore that it is more urgent for this Government even than for any of their predecessors to get a real grip on closing the skills gap with our competitors.

Mr. Hopkins: I am following the hon. Gentleman's speech with interest. We are all concerned about the skills gap, and he has pointed out that, although companies are desperately keen to employ more skilled workers, they are not prepared to train them. Does not that mean that the state must play a much greater role in ensuring that skills are developed, either by offering training itself or by compelling or inducing companies to do that?

Mr. Ruffley: I shall not be tempted down that path. My party is inveterately free-market, which differentiates it from the hon. Gentleman's. We believe in voluntarism and not the heavy hand of the state. Most of the time, when the state gets involved in such matters, it does a pretty lousy job and messes things up. That is especially true when it comes to work force issues.

One of the great successes apparently celebrated by the present Prime Minister and Chancellor of the Exchequer is the supply-side revolution of the 1980s and early 1990s. That success is not in doubt and is not contentious. It has been adopted by the Labour party as part of an economic consensus, although I agree that the social responsibility that employers should display voluntarily is not as evident as it should be.

Mr. Hopkins: Is not it obvious that voluntarism does not work? The most successful economies, even in the capitalist world, are those where the state takes a strong lead in developing skills and investing in them. Taiwan is a good example of what might be called guided capitalism, as opposed to laissez-faire capitalism.

Mr. Ruffley: The hon. Gentleman cites a selective example. The greatest job-creating economy on the planet is the US, which would not adopt a Taiwanese state-interventionist model. The facts support my choice of example, and not his. However, we can agree that some employers are not sufficiently responsible, even though they should understand that giving a work force the proper skills can be to their benefit and economic advantage.

I resolutely stick to a voluntarist model. The results will always be patchy, and we will never attain perfection in this area of human and economic endeavour. I believe that the heavy hand of the state is to be avoided, and that the hon. Gentleman's prescription is not likely to be adopted by Ministers for the time being. The very simple reason for that is that they understand that that approach was tried in the 1960s and 1970s and that it failed, whereas the Tory economic model of the 1980s and 1990s succeeded. That success laid the foundation for the economic growth currently enjoyed by our economy. We call that the golden economic legacy of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke). The current Chancellor has not tried to unwind or reverse that legacy, which is eloquent testimony to its success. The—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The House is enjoying these exchanges, but they are marginal to the content of the Bill. I hope that we can draw a line under them at this point.

Mr. Ruffley: That is not the first time I have been called marginal, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I had no intention of trying your patience, but I was led astray by the interesting—although now apparently irrelevant—interventions by the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Hopkins). Even so, I hope that we have demonstrated that there is some common cause between us.

Recent figures show that output per hour worked in the US and Germany is about 25 per cent. higher than in this country. In France, the figure is more than 30 per cent. higher. The percentage of the British work force qualified to intermediate skills level—that is, apprenticeship, skilled craft and technician level—is low, at 28 per cent., compared with 51 per cent. in France and 65 per cent. in Germany. That is the measure of the skills gap.

The complexity of the current system was outlined by the Paymaster General and by my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie). It is the second aspect of training and the labour market addressed in the Bill, which, in fairness, does something to effect sensible reform. In the 2003 Budget, a wider review of support for 16 to 19-year-olds was announced, including financial incentives to participate in education and training. In March 2004, the Government published "Supporting young people to achieve", and no one can fault the ambitions set out by Ministers in that document.

The Government, we were told,

"is committed to ensuring all young people reach the age of 19 ready for higher education or skilled employment".

We heard about the Government's "ambition for improving skills of young people" and that the "aim of this review is to ensure all young people aged 16–19 have the support . . . they need".

Those all fall into the category of motherhood and apple pie, but did the Government really do enough in the preceding seven years to deliver those ambitions? I suggest that they did not—for one simple reason. No doubt through high-minded intention, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has introduced many versions of in-work benefit and support, starting with the working families tax credit in 1997. With various tweaks and incarnations, the child tax credit and the working tax credit are now the two main in-work benefits. There are education maintenance allowances and a long catalogue, to which reference has already been made, of new initiatives.

The Bill speaks to the position of unwaged trainees, which is especially worthy of note and, in the panoply of changes, one of the more worth while. One of the key changes will be to the current rules, where for child benefit and child tax credit purposes, anyone under the age of 16 is treated as a child, and a young person aged 16 or over but under 19 is treated as a child if they are in full-time, non-advanced education. The Government believe that the current definition of a child in child benefit and child tax credit for 16 to 19-year-olds distorts choice, especially for those who are more likely to take the vocational route. Under the current system, they may be forced to take a course at a college rather than with a training provider, because of the existing differential—the additional financial support that is available. In the Bill, the Government have committed to extend child benefit and child tax credit to the parents and carers of unwaged trainees.

We support the proposals that I have just outlined; we also support the proposals on the age-19 cut-off. I shall not detain the House on those, but the regulations published on 10 January reveal that the Government have decided to use the age of 20 as the initial cut-off point, leaving open the option for a change in future if it is deemed necessary.

I close with some criticisms, which are, I hope, well judged, of the wider welfare and training policy that the Government are offering the country, in the light of the sensible changes in the Bill that I have conceded. In 1997, Labour promised to reform welfare and spend less on wasteful social security while maintaining spending on the sensible parts of what was then the social security budget but is now the budget of the DWP, such as pensions. One would have to be a complete idiot to say that cuts in social security should include the basic state pension and other pension benefits. However, the Opposition believe that, as the James review will make clear in the coming weeks, there is much useless, irrelevant and redundant expenditure in the DWP budget.

Welfare spending has increased by nearly a fifth in real terms since 1997, in clear defiance of the Prime Minister's promise that that would not happen. While spending on welfare and education has risen, recent research from the Library shows that the number of young people aged 16 to 24 who are not in employment or education has risen by 36,000 since May 1997. That may not be a huge increase, but it is not an impressive statistic. The figure would have been going down since 1997 if Labour's promises had been delivered. More than half the young people who are not in education or work—about 670,000—are defined as economically inactive: they are not actively seeking work. Despite the Labour party's rhetoric about prioritising education and skills—we remember that great slogan, "Education, education, education"—the CBI has reported that one in three companies has to provide remedial training for school leavers who have not sufficiently mastered reading, writing and arithmetic. That shames us all, and the Government would be well advised, while making sensible changes in Bills such as the one that we are debating today, to look at the basic skills of reading, writing and arithmetic in primary, middle and upper schools, as those skills precede vocational training. The statistics, however, are worrying.

My hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), the shadow Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, has rightly taken every opportunity to criticise the Government for reneging on their promises to reduce benefit payments. We will say something about that, as I have suggested, in the James review. Forensically and with great numerical distinction, the Conservatives have highlighted the failings of the Government's new deal programme, particularly for young people. My hon. Friend recently commented:

"Despite the billions of pounds that Labour have spent on the New Deal, there are now more than 1.1 million young people who are neither working nor studying nor training. This is the highest figure since Labour came to office. After all of Labour's talk about helping the young unemployed, why are so many young people being left behind?"

I do not dispute the Government's good intentions, and we are not suggesting that Ministers are acting in bad faith. However, they are failing to deliver on the new deal, as on many other things.

It is the policy of Her Majesty's Opposition to tackle the crisis in basic skills initially, although not exclusively, in schools. Pupils should be able to specialise in meaningful skills education as early as 13 if they so wish. Also, they must achieve higher standards of reading and writing at a very early age. Our policy of entrusting school heads and governors with more freedom to improve their schools will deliver genuine improvements, giving schools more freedom over their financial management. In the 1990s, we saw the benefits of that policy in grant-maintained schools, which achieved better results because teachers in local schools knew how the money could best be spent to lever up standards. We will introduce other measures to improve the quality of teaching, including, for example, axing unnecessary paperwork. Since 1997, the average school head has received 12 pages of bumf from the Department for Education and Skills every working day. We would cut that material, and we would also reduce interference from appeals panels if a head wished to exclude an unruly pupil. There is therefore a package of measures at the heart of our efforts to improve training.

We will also reform welfare to give more practical help to unemployed young people. We will scrap the new deal, which has been an expensive failure. Only about a third of people who complete the programme find a sustained job and most of them end up back on benefits, according to the new deal summary statistics issued by the Department for Work and Pensions in December 2004. Statistics show that most people who find work while on the new deal would have found jobs regardless of that Government project. We will replace it with "Work First", a policy that allows private, voluntary and charitable providers to deliver employment advice more effectively. There is clear evidence from home and abroad that contracting out employment services to independent providers—but not in the lily-livered way espoused by members of the new Labour hierarchy—achieves much greater success at lower cost.

In conclusion, the Opposition welcome the sensible parts of the Bill, but we do not welcome the Government's record over the past seven years, as it has let down children and young people. More can be done to help them achieve their ambitions. It is vital to create a highly skilled work force that can adapt to the challenges ahead, including a viciously competitive global economic environment. It is not an option to say, "Stop the world we want to get off." It behoves politicians from all parties to have much greater ambitions for our young people. They are our future.

3.49 pm

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead) (Lab): I apologise for not being here for the opening speeches, but I shall in no way apologise if I repeat some of the themes that those on the Treasury Bench have outlined. Those themes are part of the celebration that we are having today. I wish to make two points in my short contribution. The first is to congratulate the Government, and to celebrate with them, on the achievement that the Bill symbolises. Secondly, as we are now into manifesto time, I want to suggest how some of the money might be even more effectively spent than it is currently.

To turn to the celebration, we need only cast our minds back to the last time a Labour Government introduced a child benefit Bill. They had revolts on their hands, faced chaos and withdrew the Bill. There was a major leak of Cabinet minutes and, under pressure, the then Government reintroduced the Bill and the introduction of child benefit followed. What a difference between then and today. There is now such agreement not only in the House but in the country on the importance of child benefit that, try as they may, even the Opposition do not have a case to make against the Government's proposals.

We therefore celebrate the transformation in parliamentary views on child benefit and the extension of child benefit to an older age group to reflect the important changes that are necessarily occurring in education and therefore its interrelationship with the labour market. We also celebrate the fact that, at long last, society is beginning to realise that raising children is a huge cost that is disproportionately borne by a small minority of the population at any one time. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool (Iain Wright) said, we all have a huge vested interest in making sure that parents do the very best possible job of raising the next generation and the people who will pay our pensions. If we cannot be interested for the right reasons, we can be interested out of self-interest.

Mr. Laws: The right hon. Gentleman will no doubt be aware of the paper that the Government issued last year that talks about a vision for supporting young people. It talks about support being dependent on household income and appears to suggest that there may be a shift from child benefit to a more means-tested system. Does he have any concerns about that?

Mr. Field: Indeed, I have concerns. The only rationale for the tax credit only side is to put it into place and then start dismantling the universal side of the welfare state. Clearly, one needs to be vigilant on this issue, but even though one must be concerned, that is not what is before us today. The Bill is about extending child benefit, so it is a day of celebration.

The hon. Gentleman is right to talk about what might be done in the future and what might be done about support for older children, but I want to consider younger children and our support for mothers. Today, we are also celebrating the influence that the most impressive Back-Bench Member of Parliament ever had on policy. I refer to the influence of Eleanor Rathbone, because when she rose to talk about child benefit, she did not receive a great deal of support from her colleagues. She talked about the importance of endowing motherhood and I fully understand, politically, why she let the campaign move from motherhood to family allowances and the transition to child benefit.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Byrne) made a significant point about the importance of antisocial behaviour in our constituencies. Antisocial behaviour cannot be divorced from the way in which young children are nurtured. Parenting skills have been lost in many families in our constituencies, which is why Sure Start is important and we must redouble our efforts on that front. We first introduced child benefit, or more importantly family allowances, in a world in which mothers did not work, certainly in the early years of a child's life. It is now clear that most mothers must work because of economic pressures, so I wonder whether we have the right balance between support for children in the first 19 years of their lives and that in the first two years.

When I examined the taxpayers' resources that are provided for children, I was surprised. If we add child benefit, the child tax allowances and the extension to 19 under the Bill, we are talking about a budget of £100,000 per child, which shows that a revolution has taken place in my lifetime from the support that existed. Given that we are in manifesto time and many, if not most, young mothers must go back to work, against their natural instincts, to keep their family finances together, might there not be a better way of spending some of that £100,000?

I hope to engage the services of the Clerks so that I can table an amendment on Report to provide that mothers could opt to take a quarter of that money tax-free during the first two years of their children's lives. That would mean that, if they did not want to work, they would not have to. Such a measure would be important for the welfare of our society because it would raise the financial position of mothers to a level that most women in my constituency could not command in the labour market. We would thus say that motherhood is financially more important than any other job that they could get, and I guess that they would opt for the payment. The scheme would not only interest women who have only the option of low-wage jobs, because it would allow women on higher pay to choose to return to the labour market later than at present. That might greatly influence increasing the importance of the nurturing of children, which is starting to be lost in our society.

Mr. Hopkins: Does my right hon. Friend have any statistics to show the number of women with young children who would wish to stay at home and look after them if they were financially able to do so?

Mr. Field: No, but given that the Government are rightly into choice, we would not have to worry about numbers. We would make the scheme an option and find out how many people went for a tax-free income of £25,000 during the first two years of their children's lives and how many were not interested and wanted to receive their child benefit and tax payments over the first 19 years of their children's lives. We are normally out of tune with what the voters want, so we might be surprised by the response.

I repeat that this is a day for real celebrations, certainly on the Labour Benches and hopefully among Opposition Members. It marks a transformation of the way in which taxpayers are called upon to support the minority who care for and nurture our children. However, the Bill will rightly increase the sums involved by covering all those with children up to the age of 19. When I asked the House of Commons Library about our investment in children up to the age of 19, I did not believe that it would be anywhere near £100,000. The fact that we are now discussing big money—thank goodness—opens up options for the first time. Do we want everyone, in a ration-book way, to have to draw money equally over each year of their children's lives, or should we use the Bill to offer real consumer choice to people who wish to draw down some of the money in the earlier part of their children's lives so that they can stay at home during that time and go to work when their children are involved in Sure Start, at nurseries or safely at school? This is a moment for real celebration.

I end as I began. Consider the change in opinion over time. The last time a Labour Government introduced a child benefit Bill, a huge, rocketing political debate took place in the country about whether we could have it, whether we should have it and whether it was an awful Bill transferring money from men's pockets to women's purses. Under pressure, the Government withdrew the Bill for a while. Fortunately, once the Cabinet minutes were published, the Government got back their courage and we got child benefit. Back in 1976, who would have thought that we would have another Labour Government introducing another Child Benefit Bill? Child benefit is now so accepted in the country as a necessary part of family support that most hon. Members are hard put to find serious reasons to disagree with what the Government are doing.

4 pm

Mr. Mark Francois (Rayleigh) (Con): I am pleased to sum up for the Opposition after an interesting debate. It is a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) who, as the whole House acknowledges, always speaks with great authority on these matters. I am glad that he joined us in the debate today and look forward to referring in detail to his remarks.

I confess to a sense of déjà vu. Just before Christmas, my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) and I faced the same two Ministers across the Dispatch Box to debate Second Reading of the Commissioners for Revenue and Customs Bill. Here we are, just after the return from the recess, debating further Treasury legislation, this time on the subject of child benefit. Before I come to the details of the Bill, I shall say a few words about the contributions to the debate.

The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) spoke with his usual sense of humour and mentioned the history of some of the issues in his constituency. He advanced an argument about the problems of simplification and took as an example the Child Support Agency. I shall correct him gently, if I may. The problem with the change from CS1 to CS2 was not that the change was wrong in principle—it was right—but that the computer system purchased to deal with the change was deficient. The Government are trying to rectify the situation. An IT failure, rather than simplification itself, lay at the heart of the problem. He made a number of detailed suggestions for amendments to the Bill, which I saw the Whip on duty at the time noting feverishly. Knowing a little about how this place works, I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on volunteering for the Committee next week.

The hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws), who spoke for the Liberal Democrats, supported the Bill in principle. He pointed out that it could affect 160,000 young people. He agreed with us about the lack of clarity in the Government's figures relating to the cost of the measure and how they will measure the benefits that it produces. As I said in an intervention in his speech, it is ironic that a Treasury Bill, of all things, lacks accuracy on financial matters. It used to be said in some quarters that the traditional spending Departments were often bursting to bring in spending Bills and the role of the Treasury was to attempt to restrain them. It now seems that the boot is somewhat on the other foot and that the Treasury often introduces spending Bills of its own. I simply ask as a rhetorical question who now guards the guards.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Byrne) made a thoughtful speech about his constituency, and spoke about skills—a common theme in the debate—particularly, in his case, in relation to science and technology. My hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) also stressed the importance of skills in a 21st-century economy and argued for clarity in the implementation of the new measures. He referred to his horizons being widened by participating in the debate, but I think that he helped to widen ours as well.

We then heard from the hon. Member for Hartlepool (Iain Wright), the newest addition to the House, who spoke mainly about his own constituency and how the Bill might affect it. It was the first time that I had heard him speak in the Chamber, but I hope that he will not mind me saying that, having heard him today, I now look forward to hearing him again.

We also heard from my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley). He too stressed the importance of skills in a modern economy and particularly praised the valuable work under way in a number of schools and colleges in his constituency to help to foster that. I very much agreed with him that a key to all of this is to get the fundamentals of education in our schools right, because young people will be playing catch-up for the rest of their careers if they have not been adequately educated by the time that they leave school in the first place. I hope that there will be agreement on both sides of the House about the importance in principle of doing that, even if we disagree about the precise methods for implementing it.

I also very much agreed with the intervention of the right hon. Member for Birkenhead on tax credits. That is something that the Ministers here today have debated before, but he gave some relevant examples of where there are problems in the system. To be fair to the Paymaster General, I think that she acknowledged that from a sedentary position, so I hope that it will be possible to bring about changes in due course. The right hon. Gentleman also hinted at introducing an amendment on Report, which we all picked up on, and we should look forward to debating that in due course.

Rob Marris: Put him on the Committee.

Mr. Francois: I suspect that that may yet happen too.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chichester has already explained to the House that the Opposition do not oppose the Bill in principle and that we do not intend to seek to divide the House on it tonight. However, we will have some specific questions to ask in Committee about particular aspects and the attendant draft regulations, some of which I should like to touch on.

The Bill's genesis goes back several years, arguably to a report by the social exclusion unit in 1999. That then evolved over time into the Government's more recent consultation document, "Supporting young people to achieve", which was published last year alongside the 2004 Budget. Following on from the results of that consultation, the Bill extends the scope for those qualifying for child benefit in essentially two respects: first, by making it available to the families of unwaged trainees on named programmes of Government-supported training; and, secondly, by making it available to the families of 19-year-olds completing a course of full-time education or unwaged Government-supported training that was started before their 19th birthday—in other words, by extending the cut-off that currently operates at 19.

In themselves, those are not particularly contentious measures, but the Bill is not without fault. To begin with, it does little to reduce the overall complexity in the benefits system, which was laid out in some detail by my hon. Friend. The Government's social exclusion unit, in its 1999 report, "Bridging the Gap: New Opportunities for 16–18 Year Olds not in Education, Employment or Training", had already made the point that the system of financial support for young people was extremely complex, so the Government themselves have admitted that for some years.

If we then come forward to today, the Bill's wonderfully entitled "Supplementary partial regulatory impact assessment", published alongside the draft regulations just this week, effectively reiterated the complexity of the current system and then in paragraph 20 stated:

"Evidence presented to the Review showed that vulnerable young people lacked understanding of their entitlement".

We are therefore faced with a system that is already so complex that very few people understand it in detail and, in particular, there is a lack of understanding among those people to whom the system is directly meant to apply. I am not sure that the Bill helps to rectify that as best it might.

Moreover, the Government's consultation document described the proposed changes in the Bill as "interim measures", in lieu of a more fundamental review of the system of financial support for young people. The outcome of the review, as predicted by the House of Commons Library briefing note that accompanies the Bill, will be set out in the 2005 Budget. That is the Library's assumption, but could the Minister in his reply confirm that it is still the Government's intention to reveal their longer-term strategy on the whole issue in the 2005 Budget? We have some elements of the package, but we do not have the package in toto, and it would be helpful to know when we might receive it. I am not asking him to betray the date of the Budget, although that would be nice. As a planning assumption, the Budget announcement will be about two months today, and the Government therefore appear to be proposing to introduce an interim measure today that, according to their own draft regulations, would not come into force until at least April 2006, but which they are effectively planning will be superseded in two months' time in any event.

Rob Marris: The hon. Gentleman cited the Library brief, but with due respect, I think that he slightly mis-cited it. Page 16 states:

"It is expected that the Government will announce further details of its long-term vision of financial support for 16–19 year olds in the 2005 Budget."

I draw his attention to the words "further details". The Library does not say that it is expected that the Government will announce their long-term vision, but refers to further details.

Mr. Francois: I have two things to say to the hon. Gentleman. First, the Government's approach has been very disparate—we have had the information very incrementally. The Economic Secretary will appreciate that we are asking for the final package and I am seeking to tease out of him whether we are likely to receive that in the 2005 Budget. Perhaps he can throw some light on that point. Secondly, as the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West chose to intervene on me, I hope that he will not think me uncharitable in saying that he was rather pushing the envelope in making his remarks about driving licences. I say to him charitably that we debated the Road Safety Bill yesterday, not today.

For the record, I appreciate that part of what the Government are seeking to do is to correct an anomaly in the already very complex system whereby parents of those aged 16 to 19 in full-time non-advanced education receive child benefit, while parents of those in the same age group who are unwaged training do not receive it. We can see what the Government are seeking to achieve, but is there not at least a practical argument for cutting to the chase and simply waiting two months for the overall answer and the entire package, if the Government are likely to come up with it, and to move forward from that stage?

The Opposition also have concerns about the timings for dealing with the Bill. This may be a relatively small Bill, but it is nevertheless an important one, not least to those who stand to receive the expanded benefit. That being the case, the Bill has many of the hallmarks of a rush job. First, it is largely dependent on a set of subsequent regulations that were issued only on Monday, along with the now famous regulatory impact assessment, and which did not allow much time for consultation with interested parties, at least on the regulations themselves, which form the heart of the Bill. Secondly, the Bill is now to be hurried into Standing Committee as early as Tuesday next week.

Why that headlong rush, not least for a measure that is not scheduled to be implemented for more than a year in any event? The conclusion has to be at least in part that this is an electioneering measure that the Government are desperate to get on to the statute book prior to an expected election in May 2005.

In addition, I ask the Economic Secretary what the Bill will do for the so-called missing million among our young people—the more than 1 million people mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds who are not in employment, education or training. The latest figures, from the quarter August to October 2004, which were published by National Statistics as recently as December, show that the number of under-25s unemployed and not in education or training rose by 36,000 on the previous quarter, while the number economically inactive and not in education rose by 5,000—an increase of some 41,000 to give a new overall total of 1.118 million which is well over a million. That represents a sixth of our young people under 25, and has been described by the shadow Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, my hon. Friend the Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts), as a lost generation. It is not clear what this Bill, which is a relatively minor measure, will do to seek to address a problem that now exists on that scale and is a definite blot on the Government's record.

In reality, the Bill is yet another element in the Brownite agenda. It is not unworthy in its own right, but it has become just a very small part of a much larger game—the struggle between the Chancellor and the other spending Departments, including the Department for Work and Pensions, for control of the Government's social policy agenda in the run-up to the election. It is meant to be part of Brown's Britain, as opposed to Blair's Britain, Milburn's Britain or even Johnson's Britain. Unfortunately, the Bill that is being introduced today by this now obviously divided Government is a benefit Bill, but it is for the Chancellor's benefit rather than anybody else's.

4.14 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): We have had a good debate this afternoon. Although the Bill is short and straightforward, it paves the way for significant improvements in the support that we provide for young people who continue in learning beyond the age of 16. The Government are determined to offer that support to allow all our young people to realise their potential, regardless of their financial circumstances. I am glad that the Bill has received a widespread welcome from organisations that take an interest in the field and, as I understand it, from both major Opposition parties, which have decided not to oppose it this afternoon.

As my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General has explained, the Government are committed to ensuring that all young people reach the age of 19 ready for higher education or skilled employment. Skills are important for the life chances, employment prospects and earning potential of individuals, but they are also important for the flexibility, productivity and competitiveness of our British economy. The Government are interested in all those matters. Intensifying international competition, accelerating technological change and changing patterns of consumer demand are all likely to increase the demand for higher level skills. By 2010, it is forecast that 80 per cent. of new jobs will require high or intermediate levels of skills and that 95 per cent. of them will require at least a level 2 qualification.

That is why young people moving into the work force must have a firm, strong skills foundation on which they can continue to build throughout their working lives. The Government have already taken steps to broaden the opportunities available to young people, and that is why we are reforming the curriculum and range of learning in England. To support that strategy, we must remove the financial barriers to young people staying in education and training after the age of 16, which is why the Chancellor announced the review of financial support for 16 to 19-year-olds in the Budget 2003, which was followed by the publication of the report "Supporting young people to achieve: towards a new deal for skills" alongside the Budget 2004.

Before I had the privilege of serving in the Treasury, I served as Minister with responsibility for adult skills in the Department for Education and Skills. In February

[John Healey]

2002, I visited the excellent further education college in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Watts), where I met him, the principal and the student support officer. My hon. Friend was the first to raise with me the issues addressed by the Bill. He pointed out that families in St. Helens at that time were refusing to allow their children to enrol on work-based training schemes. Such families would lose benefits if their children enrolled, and the rules often led to family disputes over money. He also made it clear that young people refused to accept work-based schemes, even if such schemes were the best options. Many hon. Members have subsequently raised similar points, but the process started with my hon. Friend.

In his contribution, my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Rob Marris) underlined the historical and future importance of vocational skills in his region and recognised the value that the changes in the Bill will provide for young people in the west midlands who want to pursue training that is, at least initially, unwaged.

My hon. Friends the Members for Wolverhampton, South-West, for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Byrne) and for Hartlepool (Iain Wright) described the skewed educational choices that young people are sometimes forced to make because of their family's financial circumstances. All hon. Members who have examined the issue closely or who have discussed the matter with local training providers will recognise the present problem. In my home town, Rotherham, we have a good learning provider called Morthyng. Last year, it supported some 1,500 people back into learning, 369 of whom were between the ages of 16 and 21. The company tells me that, last year, 55 young people rejected, at age 16, offers of work-based training places precisely because of the family loss of child benefit and tax credits, and in preference tried to take up college places because of the support that they would receive. The chief executive, Chris MacCormac, told me that, with the new Bill, the company estimates that it can support a further 55 to 90 young people a year in entering learning—learning that suits their needs, that will reduce drop-out, improve achievement and reduce the numbers of those not in employment, education or training locally by 10 per cent. year on year.

The story is the same for the excellent further education college in my constituency, Dearne Valley college, which draws students from Barnsley, Doncaster and Rotherham local authority areas. Barnsley and Doncaster were education maintenance allowance pilot areas; Rotherham was not. The college principal, Sue Ransom, reports that the impact of the EMA pilot in the Dearne area was significant. During 2002–03, it resulted in a 15 per cent. increase in the retention of EMA pilot students compared with non-pilot area students, and an increase of 26 per cent. in the achievement of the EMA pilot level 1 students over non- pilot students. My hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool made similar points about his constituency.

That, in part, is the answer to the question asked by the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) about the likely behavioural effects of these measures—whether they will encourage people to stay on in education or take up unwaged training options.

Mr. Laws: Will the Minister give way?

John Healey: I will give way on that point, and then I should like to turn to the other contributions to the debate.

Mr. Laws: It may be that the Economic Secretary is coming to this point. Will he clarify how many of the 80,000 unwaged trainees' families will receive child benefit and the child tax credit, and how many may not receive it because of the way that the Government have defined the entitlement?

John Healey: I am indeed coming to the general point made by the hon. Gentleman and by the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) about what they see as the weakness in the available information that we have been able to set out in the regulatory impact assessment.

I am happy to follow the hon. Member for Rayleigh (Mr. François). He made a mostly measured and serious winding-up speech, which I welcome. He noted some of the detailed matters that he intends to develop in Committee, and we look forward to that. I also welcome the declaration by the hon. Member for Chichester that the Conservatives will not oppose the Bill. The Paymaster General and I are rather accustomed to his style of debate. His speeches tend to be a series of detailed questions and narrow debating points. We hear nothing from him about what his party would do or how it might pay for its policies. Perhaps he has not recently had a conversation with his boss, the shadow Chancellor, who has made it clear that his party, in government, would spend and invest less of the national income in public services, that it would cut £35 billion from the spending plans that we have laid out up to 2008, and that it would offer no protection for learning and skills activities. Learners and learning providers will face cuts, and that includes the areas covered by the Bill.

The hon. Member for Chichester also mentioned age limits, a point raised by several other Members. I understand the concerns of hon. Members and organisations cited this afternoon about financial support for young people aged over 19. However, from the Government's point of view it is necessary to decide on a sensible point at which it is no longer appropriate to pay support to a young adult through the parents. We have separate arrangements to support adults in gaining skills and qualifications. The Government's view is that someone aged over 20 should come under the adult arrangements, but we will keep that under review and consider it in light of the initial reforms that we are setting out today.

I come to the information that is available and the confidence that we can have about any cost-benefit and behavioural effects—a point that was stressed by the hon. Members for Chichester and for Yeovil. I have to tell them that we all share the problem that there is a sparsity of information available about unwaged trainees—the group of people we are most concerned with in this context. They are generally in small groups and are not easy to pick up in generalised surveys. Moreover, no one has specific responsibility for collecting data on them and there is no common source of data. Consequently, the RIA is a reflection of the best information that we have. As we improve the information we will certainly share it with members of the Committee and other Members.

I am pleased that the hon. Member for Yeovil gave a general welcome to the Bill. He said that it would be of benefit if the Department for Education and Skills was leading on it. I could ask him why he, rather than the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis), is speaking for his party. On his main serious point of principle, I can assure him that we will, in the long term, rationalise the system of support for young people. That is precisely what was set out in the joint Treasury-DFES report alongside the 2004 Budget. As he says, the Bill is something of a milestone towards that.

Mr. Laws rose—

John Healey: I had better press on, if the hon. Gentleman does not mind. I have already taken one intervention from him and I am keen to deal with the contributions of other Members.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill clearly explained the decisions faced by young people in his constituency and how they may be penalised for taking up the option of unwaged training, as well as setting out the vision and imperative to raise skills levels in the economy and the danger to us as a nation if we do not.

I am glad that the hon. Member for Banbury (Tony Baldry) joined the debate. He cited China as a cautionary tale for us all, and eloquently made the point that increasingly in future those without skills will find that they are less securely employed and have their job and income prospects reduced. As for information, advice and guidance, the Department for Education and Skills has been looking closely at that issue and he can expect some indication of its thinking in the forthcoming youth Green Paper.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hartlepool spoke up clearly and strongly for his constituency. He recognised the increases in child benefit under this Government since 1997. I have to tell him that in April they go up again to £17 for the first child and £11.40 for any subsequent children. He also mentioned the expansion of modern apprenticeships. He is right—the number of young people in modern apprenticeships has more than tripled since this Government came into office.

The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Ruffley), who is again in his more accustomed place on the Front Bench, offered us a wide-ranging speech from which I took a couple of specific points. I congratulate Mr. Oliver and his staff at Stowmarket high school on their status as a new technology college. They are clearly making great strides under the Government's education policies, and I welcome that. He argued that the seriousness of the skills gap means that there is a role for the state in helping to fill it and a role for employers in making a greater contribution and being more socially responsible.

Mr. Laws rose—

John Healey: I will give way one last time.

Mr. Laws: I am grateful to the Economic Secretary for giving way in these last few minutes. I appreciate that he is trying to be helpful, but there is major uncertainty over one of the big issues in the Bill. The Government are saying that 80,000 young people are in unwaged training, but that only those on Government supported training schemes will get assistance through child benefit. How many of the 80,000 will have access to the additional benefits?

John Healey: There are 80,000 young people on unwaged Government-supported training schemes, and that is the number of young people who are potentially eligible for the measures that we are considering.

Let me deal with the comments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General and I look forward to hearing the advice that he receives about possible amendments on Report. He was right to celebrate not only the extension of child benefit for which the Bill provides but, as he put it, the transformation of parliamentary opinion on child benefit. He knows as well as anyone that part of the ambition and purpose of a progressive Government is to develop not only progressive policy but a consensus that will support that policy and render its dismantling more difficult in any future change of Government. I hope that he will perceive the support for the Bill from hon. Members of all parties as a further small step towards that.

Mr. Tyrie: I sometimes wonder whether the Opposition are the only people who read regulatory impact assessments—

Rob Marris: Excuse me!

Mr. Tyrie: And one or two more attentive Labour Back Benchers. Throughout the debate, I have asked for the Government's estimate of the total number of people who will be brought into training as a consequence of the measure. I still have not received an answer. That is the most basic information that we need if we are to spend more money on training. What is the answer?

John Healey: I explained earlier the precise problems that we experienced in getting accurate information to assess the behavioural effects with any confidence.

We expect to debate the more detailed points that were made this afternoon in Committee. However, I hope that the debate has made it clear that the Bill is modest but important. It reinforces our commitment to vocational education as equal in status to academic education. It removes barriers that may restrict or distort the choices of education and training that young people make. It encourages young people to choose learning that is best suited to their interests, aspirations and aptitudes, rather than basing the decision on the amount of financial support available. It increases the support that we offer to 16 to 19-year-olds as a step towards achieving our ambition for all young people to stay on in education and training until the age of 19.

I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

CHILD BENEFIT BILL (PROGRAMME)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 83A(6),

That the following provisions shall apply to the Child Benefit Bill.

Committal

1. The Bill shall be committed to a Standing Committee.

Proceedings in Standing Committee

2. Proceedings in the Standing Committee shall be brought to a conclusion on Thursday 20th January 2005.

3. The Standing Committee shall have leave to sit twice on that day.

Consideration and Third Reading

4. Proceedings on consideration (so far as not previously concluded) shall be brought to a conclusion two and a half hours after their commencement.

5. Proceedings on Third Reading (so far as not previously concluded) shall be brought to a conclusion half an hour after their commencement.

Programming Committee

6. Standing Order No. 83B (Programming committees) shall not apply to proceedings on consideration and Third Reading.

Other proceedings

7. Any other proceedings on the Bill (including any proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments or on any further messages from the Lords) may be programmed.—[Margaret Moran.]

Tellers for the Noes:
Gregory Barker and Mr. Mark Prisk

Question accordingly agreed to.

CHILD BENEFIT BILL [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52 (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with Bills),

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Child Benefit Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any increase attributable to the Act in the sums which under any other Act are payable out of money so provided.—[Jim Fitzpatrick.]

Question agreed to.

PETITIONS

Radio Mast (Caersws)

4.47 pm

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): This petition comes from residents of Caersws, Llanwnog and the surrounding area. It

Declares total opposition to the 15.0 m radio mast located by Manthrig Lane in Caersws, whether it be used for TETRA, for which the application for Planning Permission was originally made on behalf of mmO_2 . . . or for any other communications purpose . . . which the Petitioners understand may be the intention of the mast owners (Crown Castle UK Ltd). It is the Petitioners' belief that all such technology poses a serious health risk to public safety, and that studies into this have been insufficient. The Petitioners further declare that there is an existing mobile phone mast on the corner of Manthrig Lane, thirty yards from the aforementioned 15.0 m mast, and that the latter is adjacent to both a Doctor's surgery, and a home for patients with learning difficulties.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Government to demand the dismantlement and removal of the Caersws mast for the reasons aforesaid.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Public Halls (Castle Point)

4.49 pm

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): This is a most important petition. At a time when the Government are forcing a ridiculous 4,000 additional houses on our already overdeveloped borough, we need more, not less, investment in infrastructure and public facilities. Our public halls belong to the people of Castle Point, not to the council, and must continue to be made available to all user groups—from Eddie Stacey's caring Phoenix club for the disabled to the spectacularly successful Rock-Ola rock 'n' roll club; from Richmond Hall mothers and babies group to George Hogbin's club for the blind. There are many worthy and hard-working councillors who are doing all they can to ensure that our access to our halls is guaranteed to all groups who use them, at no increased cost. I thank and congratulate each and every petitioner.

The petition states:

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled

The Humble Petition of Mr. and Mrs. Gibbs and others of like disposition sheweth

That the closure of public halls in the borough of Castle Point would create difficulty for many groups that currently use them as meeting places, and would take the heart from the community.

The Petitioners are particularly concerned for older people's groups and the blood transfusion service.

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House shall urge the Government to enjoin Castle Point borough council to abandon any policy involving the closure of the borough's public halls.

And your Petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

To lie upon the Table.

EU Objective 1 Regions

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Jim Murphy.]

4.51 pm

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): I am delighted to have a good amount of time in which to explore the future of EU objective 1 regions. This issue is of concern to many Members, particularly those representing constituencies on Merseyside and in South Yorkshire, in West Wales and the Valleys, and in the Isles of Scilly and in Cornwall, where my own constituency lies. Indeed, I hope that the Minister will take on board the concerns of people living in Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly, a region whose needs I particularly want to emphasise. Unlike other existing UK objective 1 regions, it would clearly be eligible for a further round of objective 1 funding under the next programme. I hope that the Minister recognises that fact and will reflect it in her response.

The purpose of this debate is to explore the UK Government's negotiations with other EU member states and the Commission concerning plans for the future of EU objective 1 regions in Europe as a whole, and in particular how those plans will impinge on the UK's existing objective 1 regions. The Minister is well aware of my concern, which is shared by all existing UK objective 1 regions and other regions that might be eligible for transitional relief under the next programme, after 2006. Under the Government's existing proposals, there is no certainty about the duration of the funding regime or the extent of funds available under future regimes.

It will help the House if we remind ourselves of the EU's proposals following publication of the third cohesion report last July. Full objective 1 status—to be called convergence status—is proposed for regions that fall below 75 per cent. of the average gross domestic product of the EU 25. Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly, which has a GDP of 65.3 per cent., looks set to qualify as it is well below that level. Significantly, no other existing objective 1 region falls below that level. However, within convergence there will also be a lesser package for regions affected by the so-called "statistical effect". It will perhaps be worth about two thirds of the value of current programmes. As I understand it, West Wales and the Valleys, Merseyside, the Highlands and Islands, and Tees Valley and Durham would qualify for that, according to currently available figures. However, Merseyside and Tees Valley and Durham could, with just small increases in their GDP, fall outside the scheme.

As the Minister knows, there is also a smaller transitional package within objective 2, to be called competitiveness, for national growth regions. It is perhaps worth about half of the current programme value: South Yorkshire is currently eligible and Merseyside may become eligible in future. There is also the money via national Governments for all other parts of the UK in respect of national employment policy.

The Government, of course, want to engage themselves in the question of the EU budget as a whole. The EU proposals are based on a budget of 1.14 per cent. of the member state's gross national income, but the UK and five other large contributors want a budget of just 1 per cent. I know that the Minister and her colleagues are pressing for that. It would leave a hole in the EU budget of about €115 billion. As the Minister knows, if the EU budget is reduced, structural funds are likely to be in the firing line.

Mr. Kelvin Hopkins (Luton, North) (Lab): A simple way to reduce the budget would be to have a substantial cut in agricultural support under the common agricultural policy.

Andrew George: I have a great deal of sympathy with that. I believe that many aspects of the common agricultural policy are unjustifiable and I certainly hope that Ministers, as well as considering the structural funds, are looking into renegotiating the overall CAP budget. As I understand it, negotiations are carrying on in their usual form, so I presume that the whole budget is in the air. The previous agreement on the future of the CAP was hard fought and hard won two years ago, but I agree with the hon. Gentleman that the CAP should be brought into the negotiations again now.

Ms Candy Atherton (Falmouth and Camborne) (Lab): Are the Liberal Democrat Front Benchers making a pledge to match the Commission's proposals in the next manifesto?

Andrew George: The hon. Lady knows perfectly well that the Liberal Democrat shadow Chancellor has made a commitment to honour the eligibility of existing EU objective 1 regions in any future programme. That commitment was made only a few weeks ago, as I am sure the hon. Lady is aware. I am grateful to her for allowing me the opportunity to make that clear.

The Government have made alternative proposals, which the hon. Lady supports. She is on record as agreeing with the proposition that the UK should take back the currently available money—

Ms Atherton: I will always work to secure the best deal for Cornwall, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that. If the best deal comes from the British Government, I will fight for it. If it comes from the European Commission, I will fight for it on that basis, but we do not know where the best deal will come from. At the moment, however, the best deal on the table is coming from the British Government.

Andrew George: Unfortunately, the hon. Lady did not speak long enough for me to look up what she said in a debate on 15 June last year. As she knows, she supported the Government's proposals to repatriate funds to the UK. It is all very well her saying that she supports that proposal—but I can now quote what she said in the House on 15 June:

> "I ask Ministers to think creatively over the next few months. I will be supportive of their plans to, so to speak, get our money back."—[Official Report, 15 June 2004; Vol. 422, c. 730.]

She cannot retract those words, which are on the record.

The problem that I want to explore in this debate is that the promises and so-called guarantees that the Government have offered since the proposals were first put forward in September 2003—the relevant consultation document was issued in June that year—do not contain anything that provides the equivalent of the present funding extended to objective 1 regions. Moreover, they do not undertake to provide the funding over seven years, plus the two-year transitional period, that the EU makes available to the same regions.

The hon. Lady supports the withdrawal of support. We need cast-iron guarantees that future funding extended to Cornwall will be equivalent to what is available under existing EU objective 1 programmes, and that that money will be available for the same seven-plus-two year period. In addition, the Government must assure us that Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly can continue the successful partnership that has been established. We must make the Government understand that Cornwall desperately needs and deserves that.

Matthew Taylor (Truro and St. Austell) (LD): When the Minister discussed these matters in one of the Committee Rooms, it turned out that there were no guarantees to be had, even though the Government had used that word previously. There were no guarantees that the funding would last as long as the EU money, or be equivalent in amount—or, crucially, that it would be dedicated to expenditure in the area. The Government are unable to give such guarantees because they do not operate on a Budget time scale of seven years or nine years, whereas the EU can give a commitment for that length of time. Therefore, is it not clear that neither the Minister nor the hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Ms Atherton) supports a deal of the same value or strength as the one that Cornwall currently enjoys? That is reflected in the fact that Labour local authorities around the country, and other Labour Members, have been far more critical of the Government on this matter.

Andrew George: I could not get to the meeting to which my hon. Friend refers because of the debate on hunting, but I have checked all the relevant correspondence, and what he says is true. For example, on 16 December I asked the Economic Secretary to commit himself to guarantee that places such as Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly would get the same level of funding over seven years as was available to them from the EU. In response, he promised that

"UK nations and regions will not lose out as a result of those reforms in Europe."—[Official Report, 16 December 2004; Vol. 428, c. 1193.]

What does the phrase "UK nations and regions" mean? The hon. Member for Falmouth and Camborne knows well—and my hon. Friend knows it even better—that Cornwall is a region for the purposes of Europe, but not for the Government's purposes. It is subsumed in the south-west Government zone. It may be called a region, but it is not treated as such. It has no integrity, and there is no community of interest. It represents bureaucratic convenience, and that is why I call it a "zone". I fear that the expression means only that the money will go to Government quangos operating in Cornwall, and will not get to those who richly need and deserve it. All the partnership work that has succeeded so well over the past five years will be lost if the money is not given to the people on the ground in the objective 1 regions.

These are matters of deep concern to many people. The Minister for Trade and Investment wrote to me on 15 November last year, and said that the Government's commitment to the UK's nations and regions meant that "we guarantee that if our proposal were adopted, we would increase domestic spending on regional policy so that they did not lose out from our proposals. In all cases, the Government have committed that this will be additional to expenditure already planned."

That is helpful and reassuring, but there is no commitment on the seven-year time frame. Of course there will be more money for regional aid as a result of the repatriation of funds, and it is reassuring that the money will, I hope, be disbursed in that way, but there is concern that the funds will not be used effectively in the areas that would be eligible for regional aid during the seven years from 2006.

Matthew Taylor: A further point is that European objective 1 funding is awarded on the basis of match funding from Government, so it has a value far beyond the amount to which the EU commits. However, there are no guarantees that the Government will provide the equivalent match funding, let alone that they will ring-fence it, for objective 1 areas such as Cornwall. Not only could the money be spent elsewhere in the region, it may actually not be spent at all. Technically, objective 1 might be matched—although there is no guarantee—but even if it is, there is no guarantee that the rest of the funding that it should bring will be provided. The Government are making a very different proposal, with none of the guarantees that the Minister likes to suggest.

Andrew George: I strongly endorse my hon. Friend's comments. The Government promise that countries and regions of the UK will not lose out, but there are serious concerns about the so-called guarantee. That "not losing out" is against an imaginary comparator, and there may in fact be a net reduction of between 55 and 65 per cent. in the current receipts. The guarantee is general, calculated across the UK; there is nothing specific to any area. It is not aimed at Cornwall, West Wales, South Yorkshire or anywhere else.

As my hon. Friend said, there is no mention of how match funding will be handled. In the current objective 1 programmes for the UK, match funding doubles the value of EU structural funds. In Wales and Scotland, the extra money would go to the devolved Administrations—rightly so—but they are not required to spend it in a particular area, or even necessarily on regeneration.

In England, distribution would probably be through the regional development agencies, and there is no guarantee that they would spend the money in the neediest areas or in those that currently have objective 1 status, nor that they would recognise the needs of those regions. The Government have not yet sufficiently explained how their plans for, or commitment to, a seven-year lifespan will be delivered.

Let us consider the figures for the EU as a whole, and for the areas in the 10 accession countries that could have objective 1 status. Some regions of the Czech Republic, Poland, Bratislava in Slovakia, Slovenia, Malta and Cyprus will all receive objective 1 funds, yet their gross domestic products not only exceed that of Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly but exceed it to a large extent. That is an obvious injustice. The Government appear not merely to be signing up to, but to be the main protagonists for, a system whereby Cornwall would not receive objective 1 aid, yet regions in accession countries that are not as poor as Cornwall would benefit from such aid. That is wrong.

If the Government want to stick to the 1 per cent. proposal—and one can understand why—they could adopt the negotiating position that objective 1 regions will be determined purely on their merits, irrespective of whether they are in accession states. If the Government accepted that alternative, there would be a greater likelihood of equity in the system.

When we have debates on the subject there is always a scramble to claim credit for achieving objective 1 status, and no doubt the notes that the Minister will read out later will say that it was all thanks to the Labour Government. I am grateful to the Government, who were among the large number of contributors to Cornwall's success in achieving objective 1 status. The then MEP, Robin Teverson, and the local authorities worked hard. The people of Cornwall marched and campaigned, and the quiet statisticians of Eurostat, Cornwall county council and elsewhere made the arguments for achieving technical change, particularly the statistical separation of Cornwall and its relatively wealthy neighbour, Devon. All those people made a significant contribution to getting the objective 1 status that Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly richly deserved.

Ms Atherton rose—

Andrew George: Here is someone else who made a contribution.

Ms Atherton: It was kind of the hon. Gentleman to remember that. He is right that there was broad coalition of people who campaigned to achieve objective 1 status for Cornwall. However, does he not agree that the critical thing in making it happen was the political push by the Government, and in particular the Prime Minister?

Andrew George: I was told by the regional chamber—a quango—that it was all thanks to them. Everyone's contribution was critical. The Prime Minister's support was important, but there was a partnership and no single contribution was more important than any of the others. Cornwall was clearly eligible as the poorest region in the UK, so it was a question of whether anyone was going to stand in the way of something to which it was richly entitled.

Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent) (Lab): Is the hon. Gentleman therefore saying that the introduction of objective 1 happened to coincide with the election of a Labour Government?

Andrew George: It did not entirely coincide. I agree that the prospect of success was greater with the change of Government, but I was involved in the objective 1 campaign before the 1997 election. Cornwall needed to achieve statistical separation to make its case for objective 1 status. Under the previous programme, we were entitled to objective 1 status, but we did not achieve the statistical separation for Cornwall to be considered as a NUTS 2 region.

Mr. Peter Kilfoyle (Liverpool, Walton) (Lab): While we are in the business of giving credit where it is due, as the hon. Gentleman knows, Merseyside was the first English region to secure objective 1 status. Credit ought to be given to the then European Commissioner, Bruce Millan, and his chef de cabinet, Graham Meadows, who is still a member of a Brussels directorate, as they drove through the original idea of objective 1 for the English regions.

Andrew George: I entirely agree, and had dealings with both men, especially Graham Meadows, as I was involved with the 5b programme in Cornwall before we achieved objective 1 status. We should not forget the members of the European Commission who made a significant contribution to the process. Whoever claims credit for objective 1 status, we are entitled to ask questions. The poverty of Cornish people was the primary driver for objective 1 status, and it was for them that it was won. We should be concerned primarily with serving them, and I want to ensure that that is the case after 2006, as that is what the Cornish people richly deserve.

Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North) (Lab): I agree with the hon. Gentleman, but does he not agree that when objective 1 was created in Merseyside—the first area to enjoy that status—the major problem was that the then Government would not provide the match resources, so what we had was substitution? Half the resources being spent in the programmes in Cornwall and everywhere else are being doubled up by the UK Government's regional policy. That is to the credit of this Administration.

Andrew George: I agree that objective 1 does not exist unless there is public match funding. If a Government, having signed up to objective 1 programmes in certain regions, did not match the funding, that would be a failure. The fact that this Government have largely honoured the promise that they made to match the funds is very much appreciated. I am sure that it is appreciated in Liberal Democrat Merseyside just as it is other regions.

The objective 1 programme in Cornwall has been a significant success. When we compare Cornwall with—dare I say it in the presence of those representing these regions—other objective 1 regions, we see that it has met its targets for commitment and spend. Significant projects have been funded in Cornwall as a result of objective 1. For example, there has been the rolling out of broadband and the Combined Universities in Cornwall has its hub and rim around the county. Objective 1 has also made a contribution to the Eden project.

There have been many other significant contributions to projects around Cornwall, but the full effect of objective 1 and the investments made through the programme are not yet being fully felt. Clearly the gross domestic product of Cornwall has not yet reached anywhere close to the 75 per cent. level of the EU 25 average, so there is still more work to be done.

[Andrew George]

On overall funding, and as a slight interlude, I should point out that problems still exist with the programme, and the partnership in Cornwall has been working heroically to overcome them. They are partly the result of the complexity of the system, but also of the way in which it dovetails into the many other area-based initiatives that the Government are offering. We are grateful for them.

For example, in Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly, among the many initiatives, we have objective 1 integrated area plans, the much-appreciated neighbourhood renewal programmes and health action zones, the healthy towns initiatives, healthy living initiatives, market town initiatives, coastal town initiatives, vital villages, Sure Start, the Cornwall action team for jobs—[HON. MEMBERS: "Labour."] We also have neighbourhood nursery schemes, the parish paths partnership, partnership development funds, the skills development fund, the rural key fund, rural renaissance initiatives, the community champions fund, community chest, the community empowerment fund and the safer communities initiatives. [HON. MEMBERS: "Labour."] I have named just a few, and if Labour is claming credit for all of them, it should provide a strategy in which to deliver them.

Unfortunately, we have initiative fatigue in many areas, because so many bodies, visions, missions and committees have to be set up with the same people sitting on the same committees to manage little pots of money. I am not saying that we are not grateful, but it would be far better simply to devolve the pots of money and allow local communities to determine how best to revive themselves.

Mr. Kilfoyle: I am not going to claim credit for Labour, because its record speaks for itself in Cornwall and in other areas. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the Eden project, so could he enlighten us on what proportion of the costs of that major and, as I understand it, very successful project was met out of objective 1 funding? Could he give us an indication of the other public funding streams that were used to supplement it?

Andrew George: I am grateful for that question. Actually, the project is not in my constituency but in that of my hon. Friend the Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor), who was in the Chamber a moment ago but had to leave to chair a meeting. The total project costs of the Eden enhancements were £38.5 million, and I understand that the public sector contribution was in the region of £15.5 million. However, those figures relate to the second phase of the Eden project development.

The Government's regional co-ordination unit in the Cabinet Office has identified that more than 100 partnerships are operating in places such as Cornwall under area-based initiatives such as those that I described. I estimate that if we take into account all the money available through objective 1 and the various initiatives funds—all of them, whether through economic, social or infrastructure development are designed to address social exclusion—we are looking at a budget of £650 million over the next five years, which is made up of EU money, largely, and also match funding. Such funding is the equivalent of giving each of the 500,000 inhabitants of Cornwall £1,300, or of giving more than £100,000, or £20,000 a year, to each of the most deprived 5 per cent. of Cornwall's families.

Problems arise when projects, especially smaller ones, try to interface with the objective 1 programme. The difficulties are due not to the programme officers but to the obstacles involved in accessing the programme and the tests that must be met. The gathering of match money so that a project can get off the ground is especially difficult. If the figures that I cited are the amounts available to people who are socially excluded in Cornwall, we could ask them whether they would prefer to receive funding in the form of vouchers to the value that I described, or a labyrinthine system that is difficult to access. The programme teams are working heroically to overcome the bureaucratic challenges that the Government and Europe have set them, but it is a fact that a lot of the aid is being spent on bureaucracy, consultants and facilitation, although I accept that facilitation is necessary to overcome the hurdles that have been set up.

Ms Atherton: The hon. Gentleman makes important points about bureaucracy, which none of us want, so does he welcome the fact that the UK Treasury is meeting key partners from Cornwall to find ways to ensure that match funding and core objective 1 money—whatever it is called and however it arrives—get to the parts of Cornwall that we want them to reach?

Andrew George: Absolutely. I have been taking up my worries about area-based initiatives and the complexities that have been created for some time, which is why I was keen for the Cabinet Office regional co-ordination unit to acknowledge that there were problems with the bureaucracy surrounding the system. I suppose that the situation is in a way caused by the successful creation of many development programmes and area-based initiatives, but the complexities and problems that I have tried to describe have come with that. If the Treasury and the Government intend to introduce an initiative to try to iron out the problems of bureaucracy and delivery and to devolve responsibility so that people on the ground can make decisions, I will say, "Alleluia," and strongly support it.

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): Government Members are keen to trumpet the success of Labour, but I feel moved to remind my hon. Friend and the House of the enormous problems that the Labour Administration in Wales had not so long ago, when they seemed unable to deliver proper commitments from Westminster Labour Ministers to secure funding. Does he agree that one of the biggest problems that we have in Wales is the fact that to this day there has been no statement from the Government giving us an assurance of the same kind of long-term funding security as is necessarily present in the arrangements that come directly from Europe?

Andrew George: I entirely agree. There have been acknowledgements, and in the consultation document circulated by the Treasury following the pre-Budget report in December there is a proposal to examine the delivery mechanisms, but even in that document there is no commitment to address issues of delivery of Government funds beyond 2008.

Mr. Kilfoyle: On delivery mechanisms, perhaps the hon. Gentleman and I should have a conversation outside this place about the failure of the Liberal Democrat council in Liverpool to deliver anything meaningful under objective 1. The money has been made available by national Government and by the European Commission, but there has been a catalogue of total and abysmal failure by the Liberal Democrats on Merseyside to deliver a single flagship project.

Andrew George: I shall be happy to have a discussion with the hon. Gentleman outside this place, if he wishes—a discussion, I say. He needs to reflect on the fact that the Liberal Democrats cannot be doing too badly, as they keep getting re-elected in larger and larger numbers.

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman just concurred with the Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) on what he called the failure of the Westminster Government to give match funding to Wales. May I point out what actually happened? The Opposition in Wales were deliberately trying to stir the political pot ahead of the comprehensive spending review to get the Chancellor to reserve funding for Wales, which he was not prepared to do. After the CSR, hundreds of millions of pounds of match funding were made available to Wales. We delivered on objective 1 and we delivered the match funding in Wales.

Andrew George: Labour also delivered a change in the First Minister in Wales. I am happy to let hon. Members settle their political scores in their regions if that is what they wish to do, but I think scores are better settled, as I will do with the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle), outside the Chamber. The hon. Member for Vale of Clwyd (Chris Ruane) should see my hon. Friend the Member for Montgomeryshire outside the Chamber to settle scores.

Lembit Öpik: I accept the challenge to settle the matter outside, perhaps in the Strangers Bar. However, I remind the House that a large number of Labour Assembly Members called for the resignation of the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Alun Michael) when he was First Minister on exactly the basis under discussion. It was not the other parties alone. It was Labour Assembly Members who said that because he had failed to secure assurances from Westminster, he should go—so the blame cannot be pinned solely on the Opposition.

Andrew George: My hon. Friend supports my point. I hope Labour Members will reflect on that.

Let us consider the successes in Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly. If the Minister accepts that all the partners in Cornwall and most of the politicians in Cornwall wish to retain objective 1 status beyond 2006, she can be reassured that in return for the guarantees that we seek from the Government, there will be a guarantee from Cornwall that we can deliver on our programme, just as we are doing now, but it is important that she should understand that we need to target economic regeneration resources at Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly. We need to own our own numbers, as it were. We need to have territorial visibility. We need to have structures that, as now, actually work. It will not help Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly to have a programme that is operated from an office in Bristol, Taunton or anywhere else, because that will not help its delivery in the place that most needs it. There is an important distinction to be made between a genuine region such as Cornwall and a Government zone such as the south-west. The delivery programmes that might be operated in each are necessarily very different.

There is also support for the role of the partnership, and one of the points made by those operating the programme in Cornwall is that we now have something that has not happened successfully enough in the past—public, private and voluntary sectors working together, not only in the preparation of the programme but in its delivery. The private sector now articulates very directly to the public sector what it requires on training, for example, and in other spheres as well. An integrated programme is operating in an area where it is deliverable, and it would be unfortunate if the Government threw out the opportunity to maintain that and allow Cornwall to continue the economic regeneration and success that it has achieved in recent years and carry it forward beyond 2006.

Mr. Watts: I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern, but does he not acknowledge that he has held meetings with Ministers who have made it clear that although the decision has not been taken on whether to have a nationalised or a European programme, there will be a programme for Cornwall in the future? On the same management point, does he further acknowledge that on a number of occasions the Minister has made it clear that she would like to discuss these issues in more depth to ensure that there is as much flexibility as possible, but there must be local, national and European accountability, so there will have to be structures there. I should have thought, though, that the hon. Gentleman could take some comfort from the fact that, since 1997, the Government have delivered on all those programmes and put a tremendous amount of new resources into helping areas such as Cornwall and Merseyside.

Andrew George: The hon. Gentleman must also recognise that, just as we had the discussion earlier about claiming credit—I can assure him that the South West regional assembly which is not an elected or accountable body, still claims credit for having achieved objective 1 status for Cornwall—in exactly the same way, Cornwall has had to fight all the way to achieve what it has achieved so far, and to achieve what it has achieved within the programme. The commitments made, which he will have heard me enunciate earlier, if he was in the Chamber, when I quoted letters and statements made by Ministers, are not sufficiently specific, on time scale, geographical coverage or the programme levels. There are clearly encouraging statements, but they do not amount to the kind of cast iron guarantees that exist in the third cohesion report. One can either see in that report a clear commitment for a seven-year period, plus two, and know that, depending on the negotiations, there will be a budget, or there will simply be promises of an intention to deliver, which we do not know will be achieved.

Mr. Kilfoyle: Just to reinforce the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Watts), I have come out of meetings with the Paymaster General with the clear understanding that there was an undertaking that whether the funding was repatriated or not, there would be no loss to the objective 1 areas. That is the only thing that matters. We want to see a smooth transition into the future: a proper taper that ensures that we can carry on with the development work in Cornwall, Wales and South Yorkshire, as well as on Merseyside. I was under no doubt whatever. I was completely satisfied coming out of those meetings.

Andrew George: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman is more easily satisfied than me. He says that the money will be there, but we are told that it will be there in the regions generally, not in objective 1 regions. It will be available in an area that is 10 times the size, and it will be siphoned off into other activities. If he has had an agreement for the delivery programme on Merseyside, good for him, but we have certainly not had such an agreement for Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly. That is what we are looking for: a clear contract, a budget, clear geographical coverage of a genuine region, not a Government zone, and a commitment for seven years plus two. We do not have that.

Mr. Kilfoyle: Surely, the hon. Gentleman understands that government is an organic process and that, as things improve, we expect it to adapt to changing circumstances. The figures and statistics for Cornwall have long been depressed, as have those for Merseyside and other areas, but one hopes that the success of the programme will be measured by those areas' ability to come out of it. I do not want Merseyside to qualify for objective 1 criteria for ever and a day. I want it to move over the 75 per cent. threshold, so that we can stand alone and fight our own battles in the wider world. Surely to God, he cannot look for some kind of guaranteed commitment to provide a specific kind of funding for ever and a day. The arrangement is bound to change according to circumstances.

Andrew George: I am asking for a commitment not for ever and a day but for seven years. In the light of Cornwall's 65.3 per cent. GDP figure, it is highly unlikely even with the best possible prospects that it will jump over the threshold—as I hope Merseyside will, as well as Cornwall. We must be realistic: Cornwall will not burst its way through the 75 per cent. threshold tomorrow, and it is not likely to do so before 2006. We know that it is bound to be eligible for objective 1 status beyond 2006. The point that I am making is that we want a commitment for seven years plus two, not for ever and a day. Hon. Members do not appear to be able to hear what I am saying.

Mr. Watts: While many of us can claim credit for campaigning for objective 1 funding over many years, the decisions are made by the Council of Ministers. It will be British Ministers—Labour Ministers—who will negotiate on our behalf in the Council of Ministers. Obviously, the sort of guarantees that the hon. Gentleman is seeking cannot be given until those discussions have taken place and there is general agreement about whether there will be a nationalised policy or a European programme, and about the size of the initiative, the amount of resources, and how long it will last. He should take some comfort from the Government's regular statements that Cornwall's status will be maintained either Europewide or in the UK and that resources will come into Cornwall to compensate it if it has a UK-based scheme rather than a European one.

Andrew George: I cannot say that I take comfort from what the hon. Gentleman says. It is encouraging, but I am not reassured. We are playing with words, and we are in a grey area with regard to how satisfied we are with the settlement.

Even if the Government wish to promote the argument of achieving a 1 per cent. level for the EU budget, I do not understand the logic that says that the UK is therefore arguing that only accession states that are eligible for objective 1 funds should be in receipt of them. If we are entitled to objective 1 funds, as Cornwall will be—they could be, say, £300 million over seven years—why not have that money, which will help to supplement the UK's own contributions to its own regional economic development? I cannot see the logic of completely cutting ourselves off from access to European regional structural funds, and I hope that the Minister will take that point on board.

I have spoken for a reasonable length of time, but a certain amount of time remains. The Government have made some encouraging statements, but future statements must include nailed-down commitments on areas that are currently eligible for objective 1 status.

I hope that the Minister understands that the matter is one of genuine concern and not simply the result of politicians' campaigning. Apolitical and non-political people in Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly are genuinely concerned: they have engaged with the programme by examining the third cohesion report and statements made by Ministers, and they say, "We want to keep objective 1 status, thank you very much." I hope that the Minister will take that point on board and consider whether she can strengthen some of the Government's commitments, and in particular those on geographical coverage, length of commitment and available budget.

It is vital that we have a programme that includes a contract with those areas. Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly is a region that genuinely works and that people recognise, unlike the Government's south-west zone, which was clearly created for bureaucratic convenience and is not the basis on which to deliver the kind of aid that we have discussed.

5.41 pm

Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent) (Lab): Before I became a Member of Parliament, I spent 10 years as a Member of the European Parliament. Throughout those 10 years, I and other Labour MEPs campaigned for objective 1 or a scheme that could deliver similar investment not only in Wales, but throughout the United Kingdom. Like those Labour MEPs, I would like to claim credit for delivering objective 1, but in my more modest moments, I admit that its successful introduction was because of the election of the Labour Government, without which objective 1 money would not have come into communities in my area, south Wales.

I remember when nationalists in Wales argued that it would be impossible to introduce objective 1 into Wales because of the absence of a Welsh Parliament and the lack of independence for Wales. The Labour Government showed that independence and a Welsh Parliament were irrelevant and that, given energy and ideas, it was possible to deliver objective 1. They delivered objective 1, from which communities such as mine have benefited for a number of years.

Objective 1 can play a major role in helping to revive communities. In Blaenau Gwent, for example, we have some of the highest levels of unemployment in Wales, some of the lowest wages in the United Kingdom and some of the worst health problems, which involve heart disease, respiratory disease and lung cancer. We are near the top of the list for problems relating to mental health, we have low levels of car ownership and our housing stock is very poor. Those problems have not gone away as a result of objective 1, but objective 1 can play a major role in particular communities.

We should not try to convince ourselves that the problems have gone away. In Blaenau Gwent, for example, we still have a major unemployment problem, which involves not only the number of people who are unemployed but the kind of jobs that we have lost in our communities. We have lost a big part of our manufacturing base. In the 1980s, we lost the coal industry, which was a major supplier of jobs in our particular community. More recently, we have lost the steel industry and other major manufacturing companies such as Bosal and Faurecia. Just before Christmas, Yuasa Battery announced that it was to make between 200 and 300 people redundant and the work was to go to another country.

Just last week, I met the work force of Merton Packaging, which has been functioning in my community for the past 20 years. The work force are very skilled, highly motivated and loyal—so loyal that they have not had a wage increase for four or five years. On returning to work after the Christmas holidays, they found that the doors were locked and were told that the company was going into liquidation. That is the kind of behaviour that one would expect of a 19th-century employer, but this is a present-day employer, operating in my community.

It is not only the number of jobs that is important, but the kind of jobs. We have attracted jobs to Blaenau Gwent, but far too many of them have been low-paid, part-time, non-union, soul-destroying jobs. It is interesting that we, like other parts of the country, are losing jobs to other countries, but our jobs are being lost from a community that has some of the lowest wage levels in the United Kingdom. If we cannot reclaim those jobs, there are obviously problems in other parts of the UK.

On tackling low wages, the minimum wage has obviously been an important policy development for my community, but it is still much too low. It needs to be dramatically increased if people are to have the dignified lives that they deserve for their labours.

In Wales, we have an additional problem in that much of the investment, which is the responsibility of the National Assembly for Wales, has been directed not to some of the poorest and most deprived areas but to some of the richest communities in Wales. There is a shortage of money in many areas, including Blaenau Gwent, but investment is going to places such as Cardiff bay. We saw an example of that just before Christmas, with the opening of the Wales Millennium Centre, a glorified opera house, which cost over £100 million and has been guaranteed by Rhodri Morgan a permanent subsidy of £2 million a year. Just imagine what some of the deprived communities in Wales could do if they received the kind of money going to the richest areas. We need to continue and increase the investment going to those deprived communities. With the amount of money going to Cardiff bay, Blaenau Gwent could revolutionise life in our community. Objective 1, with all its limitations, must continue in one form or another.

If we are to attract jobs to Blaenau Gwent, we are told that we must concentrate on high-skilled jobs. I agree to a certain extent, but we have problems because the amount of investment in further education in Gwent is decided by the quango Coleg Gwent. Midway through last year, it decided to close the engineering and catering departments in my constituency, which is probably the most deprived area in Wales. The new principal of Coleg Gwent and the deputy director of ELWa said, "Not to worry—your constituents can still study engineering but they can do it in Nash, which is in the outer part of Newport." I do not have a PhD in geography, but I understand the difficulty of travelling from my constituency to Nash in Newport. Indeed, if a student from Blaenau Gwent wished to study engineering in Nash, it would take a round trip of five hours. If he or she decided to spend five hours on public transport, they still would not arrive in Nash in time for the commencement of the course each day. How can communities such as ours concentrate on trying to attract high-skilled jobs when the people responsible for further education are closing the very departments that can deliver the training and education necessary for those jobs?

Other people in authority have said, "We've got to concentrate on attracting tourism to Blaenau Gwent, because it is a beautiful part of the world." No one doubts that. Yet the people who control Gwent's further education decided to close the catering department. How can we boost tourism in Blaenau Gwent by closing the catering department, which plays an integral part in the training required for a buoyant tourist industry?

The problem with objective 1 is not a shortage of money, but priorities. In the years when I was in the European Parliament, the priority was to concentrate on directing moneys towards the agricultural sector through the common agricultural policy. Every year, at budget time, the Commissioner would make a statement in which he told us, "Things are not well with the common agricultural policy, but not to worry—tomorrow all these things will be changed, the problems will be rectified and the amounts directed to agriculture will decrease." In other words, areas such as mine would benefit. That has not happened over the past decade or so, and I suggest that it will not happen in any big way in the months and years to come.

If the European Union and the European Parliament are to be seen as relevant by the people outside, they must be seen to be responding to the problems that people have in communities such as mine. Until now, leaving aside noble exceptions such as the objective 1 programme, they have failed in a big way to do that. We must not forget that we are still paying more into the European Union than we are receiving back, even allowing for the rebate. That injustice should be rectified.

My final point concerns who takes the decisions. The hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) spoke about the role of quangos, which has been a contentious subject in Wales. We were told that, if we elected a Welsh Assembly, it would bring about a bonfire of the quangos, but that has not happened—it has been very much a damp squib. Too many decisions in Wales are taken by people who are not elected, not accountable and cannot be removed. That is surely wrong. We want decisions to be taken by people who are elected, are accountable and can be removed if people see that they are not responding to their problems.

We were promised not only a bonfire of the quangos, but that many of their powers would be transferred to democratically elected bodies such as local authorities. That has not happened in Wales. People in Wales know now, if they did not at the time of the referendum for the National Assembly, that they were conned in a big way. Many people went along with it, even though some of us argued and predicted the result.

There are big problems, not only in my community but in communities throughout the United Kingdom, that still suffer from unemployment, the loss of good jobs, low wages and all the deprivation that goes with that. We need some sort of scheme to continue after 2006 if our problems are to be rectified.

I want to end as I began. I would like to claim credit for objective 1 funding, and I am sure that other former MEPs would too, but we would admit in our humbler moments that it is due to the election of a Labour Government. I say that as someone who has been somewhat critical of the Government on one, two or perhaps three occasions.

3.55 pm

Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire) (LD): I agree with the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Andrew George). Many of them apply to Wales. I was also interested in the suggestion of the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Llew Smith) that he personally, not the Labour party, was responsible for European funding.

Llew Smith rose—

Chris Ruane: My hon. Friend did not say that.

Lembit Öpik: I know. I shall give way but I understand that the hon. Gentleman did not really say that.

Llew Smith: Either the hon. Gentleman suffers from major problems with his hearing or I have a major communications problem. On this occasion, I shall be polite and say that the hon. Gentleman has a problem with his hearing. On two or three occasions, I said that I should like to claim credit for the introduction of objective 1 but that I knew that the achievement was due to the election of a Labour Government. I repeat, "a Labour Government."

Lembit Öpik: I shall simply say that there has been a sense of humour breakdown rather than a communications breakdown. To avoid doubt and so that the hon. Gentleman does not get into trouble with the Prime Minister, I stress that I fully understand that he is not, at least on this occasion, taking on his party leadership. Nevertheless, he spoke about the benefits of objective 1 to his constituency.

There is no question but that objective 1 has been enormously helpful to Wales, although unfortunately not to Montgomeryshire, which just missed out. By any measure today, it would qualify for objective 1, but it just missed out at the time. That was a disappointment to my constituents. We got limited funding but not on the basis of objective 1. One of my minor criticisms of the objective 1 system is that the inflexibility of its criteria mean that many regions in the United Kingdom, including mid-Wales, have missed out.

The third report on economics and social cohesion, which the European Commission published on 24 February 2004, charts the way for structural funding in Wales for 2007 to 2013. I am tempted to discuss the success of objective 1, but that has been covered widely in interventions. The debate, which is about the way in which the needs of Wales and the United Kingdom should be met through structural funds in future, is most important.

The cohesion report states that the UK is the most divided state in Europe, even including the 10 accession states, for apportioning funding. The figures in the cohesion report clearly show the poverty of aspiration of successive UK Governments in regional development policy. European structural programmes offer an opportunity for regions such as Wales, but also parts of England, Scotland and Northern Ireland, to escape from the straitjacket of rules and funding that UK Governments impose. I stress that such restrictions and the lack of joined-up thinking in dealing with the enormous disparity of wealth in the UK make several of us suspicious of future funding strategies if they are to be primarily in the hands of the UK Government.

The Welsh Liberal Democrats favour a continued link with European funding for economic development projects in Wales. What is likely to be on offer from the UK Treasury would probably be limited to three years, whereas European funding would be solid for up to eight years. Indeed, during the debate in the Assembly on Wales in Europe on 18 June 2003, my colleague Mike German, AM, highlighted the dilemma. He asked a question about the repatriation and future of structural funds in Wales, and inquired

"whether the European Union, as well as the United Kingdom, has a clear role to play in addressing the problem of lagging regions. The regional policy ministerial meeting held recently in Chalkidiki and the subsequent statement in Plenary confirmed that we are heading for an unprecedented widening of regional disparities across Europe."

That is why I would be concerned if the United Kingdom Government were to decide that they should hold the primary reins of distribution for such funding across the United Kingdom.

Mr. Watts: As I understand it, the only way in which the Community could continue its objective 1 and 2 programme would be through a massive increase in funds. The UK Government would therefore have to make a contribution to the European Community for that programme to continue. How can the hon. Gentleman be sure that the resources that would come from the UK would be spent in objective 1 and 2 areas here?

Lembit Öpik: There are two elements to the hon. Gentleman's question. First, he is right to say that there is no question but that the funds have to be available. We need to have a transparent debate on the relative cost to the wealthier nations such as the United Kingdom of ensuring that the funding is there. He did not say—but I will—that other parts of Europe, including the 10 accession countries, will also be making similar claims. I know for a fact that Estonia is likely to do so, so there is a funding issue involved. The action to take in that regard is for us to have a longer debate on the financial implications of UK expenditure in that system and on what the likely return would be.

The second part of the hon. Gentleman's question can be answered as follows. The Liberal Democrats' strategic interest in speaking in favour of maintaining something like the existing system stems from our faith in the fact that the funding is long-term. It could last until 2013 or even 2014. Our concern about the alternative system is that there could be no guarantee of funding over such a long period, during which there will necessarily be a number of general elections. Government policies might change and the promises made by the Chancellor of today might not be honoured by the Chancellor of tomorrow. That is the difficulty. We therefore have a strategic concern about the solidity of that long-term funding arrangement, which could change depending on who was in office in the Exchequer and who was in government.

Mr. Watts: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the long-term regeneration of areas such as mid-Wales, Yorkshire and Cornwall depends on the Government themselves making resources available? At the end of the day, whether an area has an objective 1 or objective 2 programme, the amount of resources that will be made available depends on the whim of the UK Government of the day. Does it not give him confidence that, since 1997, this Government have shown that they have vastly increased those resources? Is not the best way to ensure that those resources are available to objective 1 and 2 areas to tell people to keep on voting Labour?

Lembit Öpik: If the hon. Gentleman looks at the history of this issue in Wales, he will see that one of the great frictions in Welsh politics was caused by the fact that the then First Minister, the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Alun Michael), could not deliver what a number of Labour Welsh Assembly Members themselves demanded. In other words, the friction did not come from the Opposition parties alone. It came from within the Labour party, which, on the basis of this very issue, demanded the resignation of the right hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth from his role as First Minister and replaced him with Rhodri Morgan. I understand the political point that that the hon. Gentleman makes, but the equally political response is that it was not good enough for Labour in Wales. It would have been instructive for him to have seen the frictions that this very issue caused in that nation.

Chris Ruane: Would a Liberal Democrat Chancellor of the Exchequer, should there ever be one, guarantee sums of £400 million for one region, and £600 million for another, in the middle of a comprehensive spending review? Would that be right?

Lembit Öpik: Of course not, and that is the point that we are discussing. My hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives suggested that the hon. Gentleman and I should settle this score outside the Chamber. I have just been reading a book about the great fight between George Foreman and Muhammad Ali, and I fear that it would be less "The Rumble in the Jungle" than "Danger down in Strangers". I am sure that we can accept one common issue: the frictions that seem to arise in this debate about the certainty of long-term funding are shared, regardless of the colour of the Government. Long-term certainty is therefore what those in business engaged in long-term investment crave, as they can then make long-term plans. That is very important for industry.

Mr. Kilfoyle: The hon. Gentleman mentioned how Montgomeryshire had missed out on objective 1, so I understand his disappointment in relation to his emphasis on the normal give and take of argument about the processes and mechanics of how objective 1 ought to be applied. Will he give credit to the Minister for Sport and Tourism, the then Minister for the Regions, Regeneration and Planning, who went to great lengths to ensure, with a lot of support from different elements in his party and from others in the House, that the most needy parts of Wales, as well as Cornwall and South Yorkshire, shared in the benefits of objective 1, which he had seen for himself on Merseyside?

Lembit Öpik: I would. My point is not primarily partisan, although others may have sought to make this a partisan debate. Where others speak the language of war, I sow the seeds of peace and hope that we harvest collectively the benefits of European funding. In that context, I recognise that this Government have done far more than a Conservative Government would have done in achieving the benefits of European funding.

What we are discussing is the way in which funding mechanisms would be best structured. It is a simple debate for me. I and the Liberal Democrats believe, as my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives explained, that the long-term stability of funding is best secured by an objective 1 system that rests primarily on the shoulders of the European Union. To respond to one part of the earlier comments, that would create political pressure, as we have seen in Wales, for the United Kingdom Government, or the Welsh Assembly Government, to respond in kind. Clearly, others in the House think that we should leave it more in the hands of the UK Government. We are saying that that is a relatively unreliable way to maintain long-term funding. Each of us must draw our own conclusions, but that is one reason why this is an interesting debate.

While, as the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle) highlighted, many deprived areas of Wales have benefited, some parts of my constituency have not, even though, by the normal measures, they suffer substantial deprivation. I want a more flexible approach, with more localised support than under the current broad-brush regional assessment of poverty.

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): The hon. Gentleman is beginning to touch on an important point, albeit at the end of his contribution. Leaving to one side the issue of funding, does he agree that it would be better for the European principle of subsidiarity to apply, for Brussels to have less say about how funds are spent in Wales and to have more localised and regional determination about how money is spent, addressing real needs?

Lembit Öpik: The hon. Gentleman is right that subsidiarity and flexibility are important. I believe that they can best be achieved through a more guidelines-based approach to how funds are spent and clarity about the outcomes required from the expenditure. A Europewide debate about that in the months ahead would be constructive. The hon. Gentleman's constituents, and mine, would benefit from the localisation of some investment, rather than money being invested in wealthy areas that do not need it so badly.

I am pleased that the Government have shown more commitment to this funding programme than I think would have been shown by a Conservative Government, although I am sad that they have not shown as much commitment as the Liberal Democrats will after the next general election, when we form the Government. Let me end on a positive note. The foundations laid by Labour will certainly be built on by the Liberal Democrat Government in a few years, and I thank the Government for the work they have done, but I make them a promise: they ain't seen nothing yet.

6.10 pm

Ms Candy Atherton (Falmouth and Camborne) (Lab): I welcome the opportunity to speak. As many Members on both sides of the House know, I have taken a particular interest in objective 1. I was delighted when the debate before this finished early, because it meant that this debate could continue for longer. It is a critical debate—although whenever we have such debates I experience a sense of déjà vu. The doom and gloom mongers always emerge and say, "It is never going to happen; we will never get what we need."

I well remember when Cornwall first set out to achieve objective 1 status. I entirely accept that many people were involved in the campaign—the Liberal Democrats, the Labour MP, the Liberal Democrat MEP of the day, the county council and the community. We all stood together and we all argued the case, but the fact that we were statistically linked with our colleagues and friends in Devon constituted a barrier preventing us from obtaining stand-alone regional status in the European Union and receiving the money. The critical moment occurred when the Prime Minister instructed senior civil servants and fellow Ministers to make the case for decoupling us from Devon.

I remember the Liberal Democrats saying, "It will not happen." There was much beating of breasts. They said, "We must go to Berlin to make sure that this Labour Prime Minister does not forget Cornwall. It will be forgotten among the great mass of other issues." But the Prime Minister delivered for Cornwall. Then what did the Liberal Democrats say? They said, "We will never have the match funding."

The hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) smiles, because he knows that that is absolutely true. Every time we have done anything involving objective 1, the Liberal Democrats in Cornwall have said, "It will not happen." Four years ago, almost to the day, the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor)—who is not present—accompanied me to the launch of Combined Universities in Cornwall, which was also attended by the regional development agency, the higher education partners and all the people who had worked so hard on the project. Having been briefed on it, he told the media that the British Government would not come up with the match funding. And what has happened? The buildings have been built, the staff are in post, the students are there, and we have a fantastic icon for Cornwall.

I applaud what the hon. Member for St. Ives says about ensuring that we secure the best possible deal for Cornwall. I will stand up for that and fight for it. We must look at the history, however, and the history is that this Government and only this Government have really invested in Cornwall. Ten years ago, unemployment was soaring. A journalist to whom I was talking the other day said, "We could not wait for the unemployment figures 10 years ago, Candy. We used to snatch them off the fax machine. It was always a great story for us because the figures were so awful. We do not even report them now."

The challenge for phase 2 of objective 1—or son or daughter of objective 1—is to ensure that we raise wages in the county and do not have to fight for more money in the future because the economy is vibrant and dynamic and we are standing alone. The hon. Gentleman mentioned that earlier.

Andrew George: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Atherton: I am in some flow, but I will.

Andrew George: I wanted the hon. Lady to hesitate at least for a while, although I appreciate that she was, in fact, in full flow. I think that she has rather overstepped the mark. Not only have many who were involved in the achievement of objective 1 status been airbrushed out of history, but there has been a certain amount of rewriting. She claims, among other things, that it was all doom and gloom and we said that we would never receive match funding. She must understand the distinction between saying that that would never happen and saying, as my hon. Friends and I did, that we needed to campaign for the match funds and the projects. We realised that we had to campaign hard to achieve those things.

Ms Atherton: I realise that there is a difference between a press release in Cornwall and what is said in the Chamber. However, as history shows—and as even this week's press releases show—such comments constituted a lot more than simply the raising of issues; they were a lot more certain in tone than that.

Chris Ruane: What is my hon. Friend's assessment of the effect of such doom-mongering on morale and enthusiasm in the business, voluntary and public sectors? [Interruption.]

Ms Atherton: Opposition Members laugh, but that is not what the people of Cornwall do when such comments have their impact. Anything that causes uncertainty and hesitancy, and places a question mark over future investment, has a real impact on the business community. Many people in the business and public sectors have come to me and said that such comments have a bad effect. I am not saying that only the Liberal Democrats are to blame. There is a regional—

Linda Gilroy (Plymouth, Sutton) (Lab/Co-op): Does my hon. Friend think that it does us any good when these negative press releases appear in the Western Morning News, which then lands on the desks of potential inward investors?

Ms Atherton: Speaking as a journalist, I take my hat off to any campaigning newspaper. However, I know that one or two potential investors in the wider west country—not necessarily in Cornwall—hesitated and decided not to invest as a result of such press releases. They thought that some parts of the media in the south-west were not to their taste. That is very regrettable and I hope that they will think again.

I return to the central issue and challenge, which is where we go with objective 1. The Commission has come up with its plans, but they are neither agreed nor funded. Having another tranche of objective 1 for seven years, plus objective 2, sounds very nice in theory, and it might seem as if everything will be rosy at the end of that process. However, we do not have that certainty. The Commission has put its plans on the table, but it does not have the money. It is the Council of Ministers, representing 25 countries, that must come up with a deal, so unanimity is going to be very difficult to achieve.

As a Labour Member of Parliament for a Cornwall constituency, I felt it my job to make sure that Ministers know that ours is the only area that stands to get objective 1. I am very pleased that the Chancellor pledged, during a meeting with me, to ensure that Cornwall will not lose out and, critically, that it will do better than under the EU proposals. That is a very fine pledge, which I have never heard from the Conservatives or, I fear, from the Liberal Democrats. When I last debated this issue in the House and I challenged the Liberal Democrat spokesman, he refused to commit to funding objective 1, as the Labour Government have pledged to do.

Mr. David: On the critical issue of funding, does my hon. Friend agree that although it is very easy for the European Commission to make all sorts of wild promises about how much money it would like to give out, in reality it has no money to allocate? Everything depends on the Council of Ministers, so any commitments given by the Commission are purely hypothetical.

Ms Atherton: That is the point, which is why I approached the Chancellor and various Ministers, including my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry and the Regions, and told them that Cornwall is the only region in the UK that stands to get the full tranche of objective 1. Although many of my colleagues representing other regions will rightly argue their case—some of them are here this evening—I am very concerned that the special nature of Cornwall be recognised, and I am delighted that this Labour Government have made that pledge.

Mr. Watts: Does my hon. Friend, who has championed this issue on Cornwall's behalf for many years, agree that it is very easy to get carried away with objective 1 and 2 funds? Frankly, Cornwall's ability to regenerate will be determined not by whether it has an objective 1 fund, but by whether the Government of the day provide the resources that this Government have provided since 1997. Such funding, although a helpful contribution, is a fraction of what is needed; it is not the main factor.

Ms Atherton: I entirely agree. There is probably more unanimity around the Chamber than is reflected in our debates—we all want the best for our constituencies. From my personal viewpoint, I am going for a win-win. I am going to debate with the Government, meet the Chancellor and other Ministers and argue the case. If we get more money via the UK Government, that is great, but I will want commitments on the time scales and match funding. I am pleased that Treasury Ministers and officials are meeting partners in Cornwall to make it work better. It is in everyone's interest to make the money work in the different parts of our regions that need it.

Andrew George: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Atherton: No, this is important.

On the question whether the money is to come from Europe, we need an answer soon. We need a commitment from the Government that they will continue to put money into a county that still needs their support. We have made huge strides and I am so proud of the way in which the county has risen to take up the challenge of objective 1 and made it work so well—for example, with the university, broadband, the urban regeneration company in my constituency and so forth. Much is going on, but there is a lot more to do. I look forward to receiving the Government's support in the future.

6.21 pm

Chris Ruane (Vale of Clwyd) (Lab): I congratulate the hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) on securing the debate. I know that he has been active in the all-party objective 1 group. We have made progress over the years on this issue and we are now at a critical point in securing the funding that objective 1 areas need.

Members who have already spoken have given a flavour of their own areas, constituencies and regions, and I should like to give a flavour of my area. The counties of Denbighshire and Conwy were not included in the original objective 1 bid for Wales, which was for 13 of the 22 counties. The Cardiff business school came up with some statistics, however, to prove that Denbighshire and Conwy did indeed have a low gross domestic product. That information was passed to the head of economics and economic development in Denbighshire, Gareth Evans, who forwarded them to me as the principal MP for the county. I then passed the statistics on to the research department of the House of Commons. When they were rejigged according to EUROSTAT standards, Denbighshire and Conwy came out even worse. Conwy had the lowest GDP in the whole of Wales—at 58 per cent., lower even than Cornwall. We were joint bottom with Bridgend, if I recall correctly.

I and my colleagues—my hon. Friends the Members for Clwyd, West (Gareth Thomas) and for Conwy (Mrs. Williams) and, indeed, the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Llwyd)—were able to lobby the then junior Minister with responsibility for objective 1 in Wales, my right hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain), to consider the new statistics and allow Denbighshire and Conwy to become part of the objective 1 bid for Wales. To his credit, my right hon. Friend did that. Had he failed to do so, we would have been looking at a rejuvenated Flintshire and Wrexham to the east, an objective 1 area in the north-west of Wales and an objective 1 area in Merseyside. That would have left us hanging in the middle like a black hole for ever.

I am therefore very pleased that that junior Minister, now the Secretary of State for Wales and my boss, took that decision in the teeth of opposition from some senior nationalist politicians, not to mention some Labour politicians down in the south. The opponents believed that looking into that case at such a late stage would upset the applecart, result in EUROSTAT crawling all over us and jeopardising the entire objective 1 bid for Wales.

I hope that that gives the flavour of the history of objective 1 in my area. I like to feel, as do others, that I played a full part in securing objective 1 status for my region. I pay tribute to the House of Commons research department for supplying me with the statistics that proved critical in convincing the then junior Minister to accept Denbighshire and Conwy.

It is worth comparing the Labour record with the previous Conservative Government's record. They took away assisted area status from my area of north Wales, despite the fact that we had lost about 21,000 jobs as a result of the closure of the Shotton steelworks only 10 years before assisted area status was taken away from poor areas in north-west Wales. It is to the Labour Government's credit that Denbighshire and Conwy, and West Wales and the Valleys have objective 1 status.

We have made good use of the money that we have had over the past four years. We will have it for another two years, and it is important that we have a lengthy tailback—seven years, plus two—to make sure that we finish the job that we have started. The decline has gone on for 40 years in seaside towns such as Rhyl, Kinmel Bay, Colwyn Bay and Llandudno.

Mr. Watts: And Talacre.

Chris Ruane: And Talacre as well. We cannot reverse 40 years of decline in six years, which means that we must secure the funds for seven to nine years, to make sure that we can finish the job.

Mr. David: Does my hon. Friend agree that the fact that central Government have given allocations to Wales over and above the Barnett formula has been crucial to the success of the objective 1 scheme in West Wales and the valleys? That has allowed match funding to take place.

Chris Ruane: I agree, and will deal with that point shortly.

What type of jobs have been created? The traditional industries in my part of north Wales are coal, agriculture and the work that goes on in seaside towns. They have been in slow decline over the past 30 years and the structural funds will allow us to change the structure of the north Wales economy.

That is happening in my constituency. An example is the St. Asaph business park, which was built by the previous Conservative Government at a cost of £11 million. The connecting flyover alone cost £2.5 million. The park was empty for seven years, with only 100 jobs in all. Since the Labour Government took office in 1997 and objective 1 status was granted, the number of jobs has risen to 2,500.

Those high-quality jobs could not have been secured without objective 1 funding. For example, the OpTIC project cost £15 million, of which £6 million came from objective 1 funding. It is an incubation and research centre, with 24 individual units. It will co-operate with the 35 existing electro-optic equipment companies in north Wales, which employ 2,500 workers. If one of those workers has a good idea, further research can be performed at the centre to assess its value. Successful ideas will be given a unit and allowed to grow. These companies will have an 80 per cent. survival rate over a five year period. That is an example of how high-quality jobs will replace the jobs in farming, mining and seaside towns. Every two years, 24 new high-tech companies start up in my area of north Wales. They will provide the sustainable jobs that we need for the 21st century.

The momentum created in the St. Asaph business park has attracted other firms. The Japanese firm TRB was the first ever foreign company to make inward investment in my constituency. The Austrian company Pachem has established an objective 1 factory in Rhyl's south-west ward. I was brought up in that ward, and it is in the top 5 per cent. of the poorest areas in Wales. That foreign investment will raise our profile around the world, because of objective 1.

Mr. Watts: Does my hon. Friend agree that state aid is as important as European structural funds to the future economic development of his area and mine?

Does he share my view that the Government must ensure, in the Council of Ministers negotiations, that we continue to have state aid in areas like ours?

Chris Ruane: Yes. We have raised the question of state aid in relation to Denbigh high street and I have asked Glenys Kinnock to look into the matter with a view to getting the state aid rules revised and clarified.

There is more to this than putting up large sheds for Japanese, Austrian or even native companies. We must be able to provide the skills that those companies need. Objective 1 status in my area has helped Llandrillo college, which is situated some 20 miles away, to establish colleges in some of the poorest communities in Wales. For example, the west ward in Rhyl is the poorest of all the 865 wards in Wales. A college has been set up there for the first time in the town's history, only 100 yd away from that ward's boundary. The philosophy of the college is to reach into those poor communities and raise the skills of their people so that they can access the high quality jobs that are being created at the St. Asaph business park and in other places in north Wales.

I give credit to the principal of Llandrillo college, Huw Evans, for having the foresight to establish Rhyl college, headed by Irene Norman, and Denbigh college, headed by Julia Hughes. They are doing fantastic work in those towns and are also establishing links with smaller communities such as Bodelwyddan and Meliden, through their philosophy of taking learning into the community. Building on such work we will be able to raise the skills level so that people can get higher-paid and better jobs in the future.

The hon. Member for St. Ives tried to make the point that there was initiative overload by referring to between 20 and 30 Labour initiatives, but those initiatives are targeted and specific. They are not in competition with objective 1; they can co-operate with it. The Labour Government changed the rules on town heritage initiative grants. Under the previous Conservative Government, the fund for the Churchill diaries was awarded £12 million to prevent the diaries being sent to America, and £5 million was given for the playing fields of Eton. We said, "No more of that." Under a Labour Government, THI money goes where there is poverty and where there is architecture.

We changed the rules. The initiatives can be complementary—in towns such as Denbigh and Rhyl in objective 1 areas, THI money is coupled with objective 1 money to revitalise town centres that were neglected for so long under the Conservative Government. Those initiatives can result in additional funding for poorer communities.

We need to put the matter in perspective. In Wales, objective 1 funding, with UK, EU and private money, amounts to £3.2 billion. The Welsh block grant was £6.5 billion in 1997, but it is now about £12.5 billion a year, so we need to keep things in proportion. We have been giving credit to ourselves and to others, but we should also give credit for the macro-economic management of this country since 1997.

Lembit Öpik: Before we hear the eulogy to the Chancellor that will tell us the hon. Gentleman's side of the camp, I suggest that, given his reference to an additional payment above the Barnett formula, the Barnett formula needs to be revised. Would not it make sense to throw out a formula that even its inventor thinks outdated and replace it with something that better fits the needs of Wales and the funding requirements for objective 1?

Chris Ruane: I do not share the hon. Gentleman's view that we need to revise Barnett; it could be revised upwards as well as downwards and our English colleagues in London and the north-east may have their own perspective on that.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Wales has a population of 2.9 million, almost the same as that of the three east midlands English counties of Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire and Leicestershire, which have a similar socio-economic profile. Can my hon. Friend tell east midlands MPs, such as me, how we could share in the largesse that the Barnett formula gives Wales and, a fortiori, Scotland?

Mr. David: Become part of Wales.

Chris Ruane: Indeed. That is one avenue that might be explored.

The macro-economic position has helped West Wales, the Valleys and my constituency, as well as the constituencies of many Members. Objective 1 would not deliver on jobs if we did not have the lowest interest rates for 30 years or our current employment levels. People are employed—they have money in their pockets and can buy the goods and services that we are creating in Wales. The macro-economic policies have been fantastic since 1997. They have not just dropped from the sky and are not, as the Opposition say, the golden legacy of the Conservative era. They are the result of deliberately targeted policies such as the new deals for lone parents and for young people, child care provision and Sure Start, which allows young mothers and families to get back to work in the knowledge that their children are being looked after properly. Also helpful was the decision, opposed by the Conservatives—I do not know about the Liberal Democrats—to give control of interest rates back to the Bank of England.

Andrew George: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising the issue of where the Liberal Democrats stood. In fact, giving control of interest rates to the Bank of England was Liberal Democrat policy before the 1997 election, although it was not Labour policy then. It was one of the first policies that they unceremoniously nicked.

Chris Ruane: I would disagree.

Other colleagues wish to contribute, so I shall conclude. I sing the praises of West Wales and the Valleys and of Andrew Davies, the Minister for Economic Development and Transport in the Welsh Assembly, as he is an unsung hero who does not receive enough credit. I have given credit to the Chancellor and the Prime Minister for their initiatives, but I pay credit to Andrew Davies who has overseen objective 1 implementation in Wales and done a fantastic job. I pay tribute to the work of Chris Farrow, the head of the Welsh Development Agency in north Wales. We have the best record of economic development in Wales, and a great deal of that is down to Chris Farrow. All in all, Labour has done a good job.

[Chris Ruane]

6.37 pm

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North and Sefton, East) (Lab): I apologise to the hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George), as I was not in the Chamber when he opened this Adjournment debate. Unfortunately, I had responsibilities elsewhere in the House, but I did manage to catch most of his speech. I congratulate him on raising this subject, as it provides a timely opportunity for many of us to contribute.

I shall make some general observations about objective 1 and its future, followed by some specific observations about Merseyside. I am grateful, as are other Merseyside MPs, for the dialogue that we have been able to develop with our right hon. Friend the Paymaster General about the future of objective 1. We had a meeting in her office, and the door is still open. She paid us a visit a couple of months ago, and productive discussions about our approach in future are under way between Members of Parliament and Ministers, and between officials from local government on Merseyside and officials in the Treasury and the Department of Trade and Industry. The hon. Member for St. Ives painted a gloomy picture, but there is hope that the process of changing to a new system will be managed in a beneficial and helpful way.

I take issue, however, with people who argue that the Commission's proposals are the answer to the problem. The issue needs to be reviewed, as the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) suggested, because the membership of the new accession states means that there will be a statistical shift in the average GDP, thus affecting the 75 per cent. cut-off. Areas such as Merseyside, although we are not yet prosperous by any means, will find it more difficult to qualify for objective 1 funding. The same may be true of Cornwall, but I am not in a position to say. Cornwall will still qualify, and it could be under that formula. That is more doubtful in Merseyside's case, partly because of the dramatic improvement that has taken place in our economy since the advent of a Labour Government.

If we were to go along with the Commission's proposals as they now stand, I understand that—my right hon. Friend the Minister will correct me if I am wrong—for every £14 the Government put into the fund, objective 1 areas will get the benefit of £1. I know that the Liberal Democrats are generally pretty profligate with taxpayers' money—in theory, at least—but it is a really poor deal to raise £14 to get £1 back in return. If the hon. Member for St. Ives will forgive me, I do not think that the Commission's proposals are the most sensible way of conducting these matters.

I would like to make one more general point. I do not wish to appear ungrateful, but we now have a number of different funding streams for areas, such as mine and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle), that still have economic and social problems. The neighbourhood renewal fund, the new deal for communities, which touches on part of my constituency, and the single regeneration budget all provide additional resources and are very welcome, but there is a difficulty in that too many funding streams come into areas such as ours. There is some duplication, and certainly confusion. It would be sensible from the Government's point of view—and this is probably the intention—for them to bring all the funds together, package them so that the same imaginative range of measures as are being carried out already can continue, but focus them more sharply on the areas that really need the most attention. I hope that out of the productive discussions that are going on, we can achieve that.

I now wish to make some Merseyside-specific points. I will be brief, because I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton will add to them. My constituency and Merseyside have benefited enormously from objective 1 funding. The local college, Knowsley community college, has sites in Knowsley, South and in Kirkby, in my constituency, and it has received enormous assistance from objective 1 for courses and other developments. We have transport improvements, and investments in industry and in the North Mersey business park, which my right hon. Friend the Paymaster General visited recently. That has enabled many small businesses to take off in a sheltered and helpful atmosphere. An awful lot is being achieved already, particularly in Knowsley and in parts of Sefton. I pay tribute to the contribution that local government has made towards that, because it has been enormously helpful in those areas in particular.

The hon. Member for St. Ives referred earlier to Liberal Democrat Merseyside, but I have to tell him that only part of Merseyside is Liberal Democrat, and in terms of objective 1, it is the worst performing part. My hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton will probably bring more examples to bear if he is fortunate enough to catch your eye, Mr. Speaker, but I shall name three projects that have received support from objective 1. As a result of the actions of the Liberal Democrats in Liverpool, two of them will never see the light of day.

The first is the prestigious Kings Dock waterfront development, which might have brought a football club to the area. It would certainly have provided a stadium for concerts, a facility sadly lacking on Merseyside. There was a great deal of attention in the media, and a great deal of spinning on the part of the Liberal Democrats in Liverpool, but where is that project now? There will be a development on the Kings Dock, but it is much scaled down. The Liberal Democrats squandered the opportunity.

The fourth grace was supposed to be a prestigious piece of architecture to go alongside the Three Graces on the waterfront on Merseyside, which have a worldwide reputation. Much money was spent and there was a great deal of objective 1 involvement. A design competition was held and an imaginative futuristic design was selected. It might not have been to everyone's taste, but it was an important venture. Where is it now? Scrapped. No fourth grace. A lot of money was spent and there was a great deal of European commitment to it—but Liverpool city council, Lib Dem-controlled, failed to deliver.

The project that affects me the most is the tram scheme. Labour-controlled Merseytravel has a proposal, which will still be implemented, to link

Liverpool city centre with Kirkby in my constituency—a hugely important development, not only in terms of transport but in terms of economic development. Every area that it goes through is a Pathways area, which under objective 1 is designated as the areas under most stress. The scheme is brilliantly designed. Who nearly wrecked it? The Liberal Democrats on Liverpool city council, by arguing, among other things, about whether the stanchions to the tramline in William Brown street should be black or grey.

The scheme, which had objective 1 money from Europe, was nearly wrecked. I believe the Liberal Democrats in Liverpool wanted to wreck it because they wanted it to go along a different route. They did not want it to go through the poorest areas, but through the leafiest suburbs, where they are gathering votes. Although we are grateful for the work that the Government are doing and for all the assistance that we have had through objective 1, I hope that the Minister will keep a careful eye on the capacity of the Liberal Democrats in Liverpool to squander those benefits and make the whole region a laughing stock.

6.47 pm

Mr. Peter Kilfoyle (Liverpool, Walton) (Lab): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) on securing the debate. As has been evidenced this evening, hon. Members from around the country have a great interest in the outcome of the conversations about objective 1 taking place in Government and in the European Union. However, the hon. Gentleman did himself and objective 1 a disservice when he spoke about it in the terms that he used. Let me remind him of the background, from the perspective of an area that had objective 1 status long before Cornwall.

Twenty-three years ago, a journalist called Stanley Reynolds wrote an article entitled "The Museum of the Horrifying Example". It was a caricature, in my view, but an unhealthily realistic one, of Liverpool at that time as a stereotypical city in post-industrial decline. The city laboured for another 10 years under that image of itself, due mainly to Sir Geoffrey Howe's report, "The Managed Decline of Liverpool", which would have consigned the city to oblivion. It was a difficult time to live in the city and to champion it, not least because of the problems there.

Along came objective 1. I mentioned in an earlier intervention the two key levers in Merseyside's case—Bruce Millan and Graham Meadows. I appreciate what was done by MEPs and other interests, but those two men made the moves that enabled Merseyside to get objective 1 funding. That was unique. The Highlands and Islands of Scotland and Northern Ireland got it, but they had Government offices that could act as the interlocutors in all that needed to be done between the Commission and the recipients of the funding. We did not have that.

The Tories set up a monitoring committee, which was a total and abject failure to begin with. I would argue that in some ways it did not improve a lot over time. It consisted entirely of public servants and quangocrats to begin with. The private sector was the first to renege on it. I was told that I could not meet anyone without the express written permission of the Minister concerned, because there was no locus for mere Back Benchers, particularly Opposition Back Benchers, anywhere in objective 1. Nevertheless, we struggled through and obtained objective 1.

We are unique in another sense in that, as far as I am aware, we are the only objective 1 area to get a second tranche of objective 1 support. The reason was simple. It was said that we had not made that 75 per cent. GDP cut-off point, which, at least as far as the statisticians in Europe were concerned, would enable people on Merseyside to stand on their own feet. We were more than grateful to receive it a second time round.

The hon. Gentleman implied, to put it no stronger than that, that we were naive in our optimism following discussions with the Paymaster General. The last thing that the hon. Gentleman can say about me, and about my colleagues on Merseyside, with our long and bitter experience, is that we are naive about these matters. I still have my reservations about the outcome of the negotiations, as we were all right to do. We should be critically constructive in what we want out of those negotiations. But at the end of the day it is the outcome that counts, and whether that form of aid is repatriated does not matter one jot to people in his constituency, my constituency or anybody else's constituency. What they want to see is their material lot improved, in whatever form it takes, and this is a damn good form. I trust the Paymaster General and accept that she was acting in good faith when she assured us that there would be no loss within those regions—that the regions would be supported on the basis of their need.

Other things have happened in the recent past that emphasise how the Government are refining their way of defining need. Now we do not do it on a ward basis, as the hon. Gentleman knows. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister produces lists of specific output areas to define deprivation. I am keen on objective 1 and on continuing to get a good deal, because the No. 1 SOA for deprivation is in my constituency, as is the No. 10. In fact, the whole of my constituency is in the top 1 per cent. of every one of the deprivation indicators. So I have more than a vested interest in ensuring that whatever funding is coming in remains, in order to benefit those people.

But I do have a problem, and it is one that I discussed with the Chancellor just before Christmas. The main delivery agency is a Lib Dem council, which fails to deliver in an impartial way in the areas of most need. It was difficult before for Government Departments to pinpoint what was happening, but now we can pinpoint that we have a council that is not doing what it ought to be doing in terms of social justice. The figures will pan out in a macro way across Liverpool and Merseyside as a whole, but it will only be by concentrating those in need in specific areas, for the purpose of political gerrymandering, in my opinion. I hope that the Government will address that.

I sincerely believe that the Government will address the need for a long taper that will ensure that the many good projects that are going through, across Merseyside as a whole and in my own city of Liverpool—and, I am sure, in Cornwall, South Yorkshire and Wales—will continue.

Andrew George: I too have no doubt that there are local matters that need to be sorted out locally. I cannot possibly second-guess what is going on within and between councils in the Merseyside region. The hon. Gentleman said that I was accusing him and some of his colleagues of being naive, but I can reassure him that while I was encouraged by the statements made by a variety of Ministers, they do not provide the cast-iron guarantee, which I think is already on the table with regard to the EU. I am not accusing the hon. Gentleman or his colleagues of being supine. Many accusations have been made against me, but I have not made extravagant accusations against him and his colleagues in quite the same way.

Mr. Kilfoyle: I take on board what the hon. Gentleman says. In a grown-up world we all have to recognise that circumstances change. I recall that in an intervention I was making the point to him that government is an organic process. It is not preserved in aspic from one year to the next, as it has to cater for changing circumstances. The object of objective 1 is to enable some areas, whether in Cornwall, Merseyside or South Yorkshire, to compete on the same basis as others. Previously, those disadvantaged areas have not been able even to get into the same ring as the others.

In the case of Merseyside, given that the taper will come in across the country as a whole, I sincerely hope that our share will enable us to carry on with the resurgence that is taking place, together with the other funding streams—I echo the comments of my hon. Friends—which are just as important, and are coming into the area of the hon. Member for St. Ives as much as into mine. If there is real good will in objective 1 areas and a willingness to act objectively in the interests of people there, along with meaningful dialogue in the Council of Ministers, I do not believe that, even given the augmentation of the European Union with 10 accession states, there will be a problem down the line.

We are all big and bold enough to recognise that there will be areas, perhaps like Cornwall, that will need to qualify for some time to come. Some of us, however, are hoping that the programme will be successful in achieving its aim. That is why we are positive about it; it is a damn good scheme. I ask the hon. Gentleman to bear it in mind that the scheme, which was brought in under the Tories against their wishes—they did not want objective 1, and tried to frustrate it—has achieved effects that are undeniable in terms of regenerating areas and uplifting the aspirations and hopes of citizens within them.

6.56 pm

The Minister for Industry and the Regions (Jacqui Smith): I congratulate the hon. Member for St. Ives (Andrew George) on gaining this debate. It has perhaps been longer than some of us might have expected, but it has been a very useful opportunity for many hon. Members across the House, although only on the Labour and Liberal Democrat Benches, to represent their constituencies passionately and to articulate clearly the significance of ongoing support for the parts of our country, as well as countries that are parts of our nation, on which we need to focus attention to ensure that we can achieve the sort of economic growth and prosperity that all those who have spoken want to see for their constituencies.

At the heart of the debate is a call for a positive approach to regional policy and the argument about the best route for funding that regional policy. One of the reasons why the argument has moved on is that, during the time when my hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent (Llew Smith) was arguing the need for objective 1 in the European Parliament, regional policy in this country was a dirty word. We had a Government who did not believe in investing in ensuring that we closed the disparity in growth rates between different regions in our country and did not believe, as this Government passionately do, in investing in things that will make a difference to productivity in areas that most need them, whether that includes skills, infrastructure, enterprise or new technology. The different context now is that we have a Government who are passionately committed to a strong regional policy and have been willing to invest money behind that commitment.

As the hon. Member for St. Ives gained this debate, let us take Cornwall as an example. The Government are making a major contribution to key regeneration schemes in Cornwall. He listed a range of ways in which the Government are contributing to Cornwall, partly to make a point about the streamlining of funding, to which I shall return later. He also demonstrated precisely the commitment that a UK domestically funded regional and social policy is making to Cornwall and, I suspect, to the constituencies of many other hon. Members who are present.

Let us think about the investment in Cornwall. The Government are providing massive levels of match funding for Cornwall's current objective 1 structural funds programme. We have already provided some £28 million for the first phase of the Combined Universities in Cornwall, which is, as my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne (Ms Atherton) rightly pointed out, a dynamic partnership of higher and further education institutions.

It being Seven o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Watson.]

Jacqui Smith: We are currently considering proposals for funding a further phase.

We are supporting the work of the Urban Regeneration Company in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne, which is a multi-million-pound investment programme for Camborne, Redruth and Pool. Ambitious plans exist to regenerate the centre of St. Austell. We have recently announced the dualling of the A30, which will constitute a major improvement to Cornwall's road infrastructure.

At the same time, the Government are operating and contributing to a large number of domestic programmes in the peninsula. We are providing £46 million to offer development opportunities for young people in Devon and Cornwall under the Connexions scheme. Cornwall received some £8 million under rounds 4 to 6 of the single regeneration budget. We are providing annual funding of some £750,000 per year for each of seven Sure Start projects in Cornwall. Those are just a few examples of the Government funding that goes into Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly.

As a Trade and Industry Minister, I am particularly proud of the regional grants from my Department, such as £2.9 million for the renovation of the Pendennis shipyard in Falmouth and £2.5 million for the development of the Tripos pharmaceutical research centre in Bude. Those two projects alone have created or safeguarded more than 400 jobs in the Cornish economy.

We can now boast a dynamic regional policy for Cornwall and for the whole of the UK. My hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Watts) is an important proponent of regional policy in all its forms. He made the point that it is essential to understand that three quarters of public spending on regional development in the UK already comes from domestic sources. We must recognise that, under any scenario, that proportion is set to increase further in the near future. The enlargement of the EU and the entry of 10 poorer countries means that EU regional funding will inevitably—and rightly—shift to the new member states. Richer countries, such as the UK, will increasingly depend on national resources to fund their regional development.

Andrew George: I am grateful to the Government for the investment that the Minister has listed. Will she acknowledge that Cornwall's GDP, which is about 65 per cent. of the EU average, is less than that of a significant number of regions within the accession countries that will get objective 1 status?

Jacqui Smith: I certainly recognise the particular issues in relation to Cornwall, but I disagree with the assumption that the future measurement and definition of future objective 1 regions is cut and dried, and I shall go on to explain why. However, I am not attempting to argue that Cornwall does not have particular needs that must be addressed. Through our regional policy, this Government are better equipped than the Government were 10 or 20 years ago to address those points. The new situation requires a fundamental reappraisal of EU regional policy. We are determined to push for the effective reform of the structural and cohesion funds to deliver a good result for the UK and its nations and regions as well as for other EU member states.

Mr. Watts: Although many of us, including myself, believe that the structural funds have been helpful, they have in-built problems—for example, the rigid criteria used to determine how much can be spent per head. Merseyside would, on occasion, have expected to receive more for transport schemes than is given to major schemes such as Liverpool airport. I know that the Robin Hood airport in Yorkshire is looking for resources. I would hope that our scheme or the European scheme allowed far more flexibility locally for deciding priorities. Will that be an aim?

Jacqui Smith: My hon. Friend makes an important point. I shall come on later to the fundamental reappraisal that I mentioned.

We set down our objectives for the reform of structural funds at the beginning of the process. The UK has five main objectives. We want to develop an EU regional policy that fully supports, and adds value to, the ambitious devolution, decentralisation and regional development agenda that we are already pursuing and are committed to domestically. We want to ensure that the structural funds throughout the EU actively support the EU's agenda set at Lisbon, Gothenberg and elsewhere for higher productivity, employment and sustainable development. We want to concentrate the EU's limited financial and administrative resources on the poorest member states, which are most in need of assistance. We want to develop simpler and more flexible implementation and monitoring arrangements for structural funds programmes which are proportionate to the amount of funding available and in which the bureaucracy does not outweigh the potential benefits. Finally, we are determined to secure a fair budgetary deal for the UK taxpayer and a total EC budget of no more than 1 per cent. of EU gross national income.

Andrew George: I need to ask this question of the Minister one more time. She acknowledges that Cornwall's GDP is about 65 per cent. of the average in EU member states and therefore lower than that of many regions in accession states that will benefit from objective 1 status. Does not she agree that those funds should be directed at the poorest regions in the 25 member states, rather than accession states being favoured?

Jacqui Smith: I believe that wherever in the EU regional policy funds come from, they should be directed where the need is greatest, but we do not necessarily need the recycling of resources that means that the richest member states send money to Brussels in order for it to be allocated back to them. The most efficient way is for those countries that have the necessary administrative and financial resources to use domestic resources for their regional policy, supporting regions such as Cornwall. I have no compunction in saying that the county needs support. At EU level, however, we should be focusing on what adds value and ensuring that we focus resources on the poorest member states.

Andrew George: Will the Minister give way?

Jacqui Smith: May I make a little progress first?

That is why we have made detailed proposals for reform as a means of securing those objectives. We propose that in future the richer member states should fund regional programmes from domestic sources and that the EU's limited resources should be focused on the poorest member states where, as I said, that intervention is likely to have the greatest impact and the greatest added value. Interestingly, that would foster genuine EU solidarity and help to ensure that the enlargement of the EU to 25 member states is a success.

At the same time, however—I hope this responds to the hon. Gentleman's concerns—we remain fully aware of the challenges faced by regions in the UK, and particularly those with current objective 1 status, and we are determined to support their continued economic development. It is for that reason that we have made an unprecedented guarantee, if our reform proposals are accepted, to increase domestic funding for regional policy in the UK. If our proposals are accepted, we will increase domestic funding for regional policy by the amount that our regions would have received under a no-reform scenario in an enlarged EU, and focus those additional resources on areas of high unemployment and low GDP, as typically seen in regions with current objective 1 status and in the constituencies of hon. Members who have contributed to the debate.

Andrew George rose—

Jacqui Smith: The hon: Gentleman asked me for more detail about the guarantee, and I am about to come to that. Does he still want to intervene?

Andrew George: I do. The Minister has repeatedly used the term "region". Will she clarify whether these funds would go to the Government regional development agency zones or to the EU regions where programmes exist because of the special problems in those areas?

Jacqui Smith: As I said, we have not decided on the detail of the delivery arrangements for the additional money. My hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle) made an important point about our ability to be much clearer about where we are able to focus resources. If it will reassure the hon. Member for St. Ives and my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne, I repeat that I am not trying to argue that Cornwall is not a needy area of the UK—it is, and I would expect any future arrangements to be able to focus resources on it because of its particular needs.

I want to return to the guarantee. The hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Matthew Taylor), who paid a short visit to the debate to pour scorn on the Government's guarantee, is not here to hear what I hope will be my reassuring comments about it. The Government set out the detailed methodology for applying the guarantee in their written statement to Parliament of 11 December 2003. I have already spelled out in broad terms what that would be. It is not possible at this stage to calculate the exact value of the guarantee, just as it is not possible to calculate the exact value of future structural funds receipts under the different reform scenarios that are being proposed by the Commission, because structural funds are allocated by reference to statistics on regional economic performance across the EU in the most recent three years for which data are available prior to the programming period. We are probably unlikely to have those data until the end of 2005 or the beginning of 2006. Frankly, anybody working on the basis of those figures at the moment is using data that, at the very best, will be outdated.

Hon. Members expressed concern about the duration of the guarantee. I stress that the Government have made it clear that the guarantee would apply for the full period of the next cycle of the structural funds programme. We fully recognise the benefits of long-term budgeting and planning. It should not be forgotten that we introduced three-year spending review plans, which have become the accepted basis of public spending, or that in some areas we have made spending assumptions over an even longer period than that. This guarantee is one of those examples of an area where the Government have made a long-term spending commitment for more than three years. That reflects our very strong commitment to regional development.

I was asked whether this is new or additional money. The guarantee would be subject to the same additionality requirements as current structural funds allocations to ensure that the new money does not replace pre-existing structural expenditure. So that means that the guarantee would be entirely additional to the Government's current domestic expenditure on regional development, including the domestic resources that are used to co-finance structural funds programmes in our regions.

Andrew George: I am grateful for the clarity with which the Minister is responding to specific questions. That is extremely helpful. However, a Labour Member made the point that the political cycle in the UK can be no longer than five years. How can the Minister guarantee funding for the same length of time as the EU, which can fund a seven to nine-year programme, when the political cycle in this country is only five years?

Jacqui Smith: First, the EU cannot guarantee—and has not yet guaranteed—funding for the period that the hon. Gentleman mentions. I shall say more about that shortly. Secondly, of course we are all subject to changes of Government. Given that the hon. Member for Montgomeryshire (Lembit Öpik) suggested that the only two alternatives are a Labour Government or a Liberal Democrat Government, we have nothing to worry about if we can believe Liberal Democrat pledges. However, it would be difficult, given the strength of the commitment that we have made in the guarantee and its multi-year nature, for any Government—although I do not expect a different Government—to go back on it.

Hon. Members asked about the way in which we deliver the guarantee. As I said, we have not worked through the details of the administrative arrangements, but we have made it clear that we want to build on the positive aspects of current structural funds programmes, including devolved delivery, the sort of partnership working to which the hon. Member for St. Ives referred and multi-annual funding. I shall have to depend on the efforts of my hon. Friends the Members for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth) and for Liverpool, Walton to deal with the difficulties of Liberal Democrat Liverpool council, but I have every faith that they will do that.

Mr. George Howarth: My right hon. Friend, like several other Ministers, is welcome to join us in that little enterprise.

Jacqui Smith: If my hon. Friend examines my constituency majority, he will realise that I have other fish to fry. However, if I have any spare time I shall be up there to help. I hope that I have given some reassurances about the guarantee.

Mr. Watts: Will my right hon. Friend clarify exactly what the guarantee reflects? Many Labour Members believe that the poorer areas should be no worse off than they would have been had enlargement not taken place. We accept that resources need to go to the new areas, but we do not believe that the poorest regions should pay for enlargement. Will she give us some assurance about that?

Jacqui Smith: I think that I have spelled out what the guarantee would mean. It would maintain the same criteria, but in a post-enlargement environment. Of course, that relates to only a quarter of resources that come into regions from structural funds. My hon. Friend and other hon. Members who represent similar areas will continue to argue for increased investment in our regions. I simply point to the Government's record, which has been of continuous increased investment in the sorts of constituencies that hon. Members who are present represent.

It is also important that the process engages stakeholders. We are holding an ongoing dialogue on that. As my hon. Friend the Member for Falmouth and Camborne said, and following the strong representations that she and other Cornwall Members of Parliament—I have to say that she, in particular, is on my back—have made, my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary has worked with key Cornish stakeholders, including Cornwall county council, Cornwall Enterprise and the South West of England Regional Development Agency, to discuss future arrangements and how to ensure the most effective funding deal for Cornwall. We have especially considered different funding streams and how we can use them as flexibly as possible to ensure that, as my hon. Friend rightly says, the funding gets to the areas of Cornwall where it is needed, that it is maximised most effectively and that the best use is made of it.

Let me turn now to the Commission's proposals for reform of the funds. I can understand why hon. Members want to compare the Government's proposals with what they believe to be on offer from the Commission. The Commission's proposals were set out in its third cohesion report of February 2004 and in a package of draft structural and cohesion funds regulations for the next financial perspective, which was published in July 2004.

The Government welcomed aspects of the Commission's approach, including its proposals to strengthen the strategic focus of EU regional policy on the Lisbon and Gothenburg agendas. However, we have serious concerns regarding aspects of the Commission's approach. First, that approach is—in our view, and in the view of the majority of contributors to the budget—dependent on an unaffordable expansion in the EC budget. The Commission is advocating a major 33 per cent. real-terms increase in the structural funds budget for the next EC financial perspective. We oppose that considerable increase, but the hon. Member for St. Ives gave the impression—I do not know whether he meant to—that what we were proposing in our financial perspective negotiations was somehow a cut in the available funds. That is not the case. A 1 per cent. of EU gross national income budget in Europe is still an increase on the current financial perspective—an increase, in fact, of 6.5 per cent. in real terms. So, yes, we are arguing that we need resources to go into that project. We are also arguing, however, that they should be spent in a way that adds the most value.

Secondly, the Commission's proposals fail to focus the EU's limited resources on key priorities such as the economic development of the poorest member states. This is where the proposals fail the test of whether they are focusing in the right area because, at European level, that should be where those resources are focused. Thirdly, the Commission's proposals do not go far enough to simplify the bureaucratic arrangements for implementing programmes or to give member states, their nations and their regions greater flexibility to deliver programmes that genuinely reflect local needs.

The hon. Members for St. Ives and for Montgomeryshire, and my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East rightly mentioned the range of Government programmes and initiatives, but argued that in some cases they were too fragmented and bureaucratic. I have some sympathy with that argument, and the Government are currently working on ways of ensuring that those many different funding streams can be more coherently brought together in the regions.

However, when we talk about bureaucracy and difficulty, it is usually the EU structural funds programmes that are the villains of the piece. In 2003, the Government commissioned an independent study by Ecotec Consulting on the added value of structural funds programmes in the UK, which reported that the administrative processes for delivering structural funds programmes were widely described as a burden and as more resource-intensive than domestic programmes. Of course, one of the things that causes fragmentation in objective 1 regions is the distinction between whether the money is coming through a structural funds route—with all the administration that that involves—or through a domestic route. The domestic route might also involve administration and bureaucracy, but what we have set up by sending the money through both the European and domestic routes is an additional fragmentation, and our proposals would help to overcome that in relation to the delivery of programmes and funding.

Andrew George: Does the Minister accept that a large number of EU member states that enjoy objective 1 status bring together both nation state and EU funding programmes in the form of a one-stop shop, involving one place of entry and one application form? They bring the administration together so that the people involved who have to interface with the process are not faced with complexity and bureaucracy. It has therefore been possible for a large number of European states to overcome the kind of bureaucratic difficulties that she has described.

Jacqui Smith: I do not disagree with the hon. Gentleman on that. A lot of work in the UK has gone into making sure that that administration is as smooth as possible. My hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Clwyd (Chris Ruane) rightly praised the work of those involved in the management of structural funds programmes in making sure that that is as effective as possible.

What do our proposals mean for current objective 1 regions in the UK? I am aware that the Commission's expansionist budgetary proposals hold superficial attractions for some UK stakeholders. As I have tried to explain, however, the Commission's proposals would, in our view, offer a poor deal for the whole UK and no security for our objective 1 regions. In contrast, the Government's approach offers a genuine guarantee of continued funding for our poorest areas, and a fair deal for the taxpayer.

First, it is important to understand that the Commission's proposals in no way constitute a credible offer of funding for the UK's regions. As I suggested earlier, net contributors to the EC budget, such as France, Germany, Austria, Sweden and the Netherlands, are firmly opposed to the Commission's budgetary proposals and share the UK's determination to maintain that total EC budget of 1 per cent. of EU GNI. Liberal Democrats have a touching faith in the Commission, which, perhaps understandably, they do not have in a Labour Government. They have faith, however, in Commission proposals that promise money from a pot that does not yet even exist, and which will not be agreed by member states. The debate needs a bit of reality.

Secondly, it is essential to remember that money does not come from Europe as if by magic. As one of my hon. Friends pointed out, the UK is a net contributor to the EC budget. All receipts from the EU will come at a cost to the UK taxpayer. It is not free money—currently, we contribute about €1.6 for each €1 that we receive. Therefore, in order to continue to receive substantial structural funds receipts following enlargement, it is inevitable that the UK will have to make much greater contributions to the EC budget, leaving less money available for domestic spending on regional policy.

Andrew George: The Minister says that the debate needs reality, but it also needs parity. It is not beyond the wit of man or woman to conceive of a scheme that allows for a 1 per cent. budget but that also targets that money at those regions in Europe that are entitled to objective 1 aid. That would mean that regions in some of the 15 earlier member states would be entitled to objective 1 status, just as the accession states will be.

Jacqui Smith: But the argument comes back to whether we want to see contributions being recycled from richer member states back down to richer member states, through Europe, or whether we want to focus domestic resources on regional policy. That is part of the fundamental difference that we have.

In contrast to the Commission's proposals, the Government's guarantee represents a firm commitment, if our approach to reform is adopted, to increase resources for regional policy in the UK for the whole of the next structural funds cycle. We therefore believe that the guarantee offers far more certainty for current objective 1 regions than the Commission's unrealistic and unsustainable approach.

Fundamentally, I want to underline again this Government's determination to tackle persistent regional disparities within the UK and to achieve a successful outcome to the negotiations on reform of the structural funds. We are convinced that our reform proposals, and perhaps even more importantly our proven commitment to regional policy, will ensure the best deal for the UK's nations and regions. We will set EU regional policy on a sustainable footing. We will ensure genuine solidarity between member states. We will also ensure prosperity and continued economic growth in the constituencies of hon. Members present here today.

Oral Answers to Questions

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

The Secretary of State was asked—

Dairy Industry

1. Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): What recent assessment she has made of the profitability of the dairy sector. [207843]

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): Profitability varies between farmers within the industry. The difference between the most efficient quartile of producers and the least efficient is of the order of 12p a litre, which is an enormous range when one considers the cost of production against the farm-gate price of about 19.6p. The 2003 KPMG report found that dairy processor profits and margins were not out of line with those of other food sector companies.

Mr. Heath: The right hon. Gentleman takes an extraordinarily sanguine view of the fact that we are losing dairy farms at the rate of 40 a week; that we have lost a third of dairy farms since 2000; and that dairy farmers on average earn less than £3 an hour for a 70-hour week. The fact is that farm-gate prices go down while supermarket margins go up. It is clear that the supermarket code of conduct is not adequate to the task of regulating the industry. Does he intend to take action or is he simply going to wait for the extinction of the British dairy farming industry?

Alun Michael: I was not sanguine; I simply gave the hon. Gentleman the facts. He seems extraordinarily pessimistic. The production of milk is at roughly the same level as it has been in recent years. There has not been a large drop in production, although he is right to say that some producers have gone out of dairy production—because they have taken business decisions to move elsewhere or because they have found it difficult to make a profit from milk. That is illustrated by the big difference in profitability between farmers. We want a sustainable and competitive industry. That must involve bringing up the efficiency and profitability of those at the lower end of the scale whom I have mentioned. That is being addressed both by the industry and by the Government. That is why my noble Friend Lord Whitty has put so much effort into working with the dairy supply chain forum, which has a clear focus on efficiency and profitability.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): My right hon. Friend will be aware that the Select Committee investigation into the dairy industry found a level of distrust between the different sectors that is hard to see in any other industry. One of the major ways in which it was felt that the producers could fight back was by much larger-scale co-operation and, dare I say it, as a Co-operative Member like my right hon. Friend, co-operatives. What are the Government doing to encourage the formation of such co-operatives to ensure that the producers have an effective voice and a means of organisation?

Alun Michael: Primarily, we are working with the forum to which I referred. I am aware of the way in which various co-operatives are pressing for change. Two of the leading co-operatives in the industry have campaigned, along with the National Farmers Union, on the price received by farmers at the farm gate. It is clear that that engagement in the industry, and our engagement in supporting the industry and seeking to create a sustainable future, is the right way to go.

Sir Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield) (Con): Does the Minister accept that many of us on the Opposition Benches are not seeking to score political points—[Laughter.] No, seriously. The situation facing the dairy producer in the United Kingdom is dire. We could lose the industry, as the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) said. Many of us regret the passing of the Milk Marketing Board, which was the most effective co-operative that has ever existed. Will the Minister look at the profit that the superstores are making as against the profit—very little—made by the producers?

Alun Michael: The hon. Gentleman always lets us know when he is making a partisan point, and he is clearly not doing so on this issue. There is a danger of being over-optimistic or over-pessimistic on this issue. I said that there was an extraordinary variation between some farmers, who are doing quite well and producing at a profit, and others. I ask the hon. Gentleman to pay particular attention to the fact that I gave, that there was a difference of 12p a litre between the top and bottom quartiles of farmers' costs of production. That obviously makes a big difference to profitability.

The supermarket code of conduct is being reviewed as a result of the work of the Curry commission and its report. The Office of Fair Trading initially concluded that there was some evidence of problems within the code, but that little hard evidence had come forward. It has therefore worked on a compliance audit. We all look forward with great interest to the findings of that proactive look at the way in which the supermarkets operate and their relationship with the farming industry.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that value-added products are one way of increasing the sector's profitability? Does he share my puzzlement that one can walk into a supermarket and see the shelves lined with value-added dairy products produced by vertically integrated co-operatives on the continent, while such co-operatives in this country are deemed anti-competitive?

Alun Michael: Certainly, value-added products are an important opportunity for the industry. There are two considerations—the farm-gate price for milk and producers gaining more profit from suppliers. Historically, in most European countries, more processing arrangements have been owned by farmers. The co-operative movement was invented in this country, but was exploited more by farmers in many other countries than by our own farmers. Obviously, the important thing is to help the industry become as competitive as possible in the interests of both the consumer and a long-term sustainable industry.

Charles Hendry (Wealden) (Con): Is the Minister aware that even the most efficient dairy farms are closing down? The largest one in my constituency, which had 500 dairy cows and a £2 million investment in the most modern milking facilities in the south-east of England, recently closed because it could not become profitable. We are reaching a stage where the only profitable dairy farms are those relying on cheap family labour, where family members are not paid a proper wage for their work. Will the Minister take on the supermarkets, whose pricing policies have led directly to a situation in which efficient dairy farms are closing down and there is an increasing reliance on imported foreign milk?

Alun Michael: First, on the supermarkets, it is important to wait for the report by the Office of Fair Trading which, as I said, has been looking proactively at their relationship with farmers. Members on both sides of the House may well wish to look at that report when it is published. As for profitability, major investment by some producers has made it difficult for them to remain profitable in the market, but as I suggested, there is an extremely large variation in profitability between the top 25 per cent., which is composed mostly, but not exclusively, of large producers, and the producers at the bottom end who may find it difficult to maintain production. Significantly, the production of milk in this country has not gone down, even though some farmers have moved out of milk production.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): Further to those figures, if Mr. Micawber was a million-litre midlands milk producer with median costs of 22p a litre, he might say that a 20p farm-gate price equals ruin but a 24p farm-gate price equals prosperity. Is it not the case that the retailers are taking an excessive slice of the retail price? The investigation chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) found it impossible to determine the actual distribution of 18p per litre of the price paid by the consumer. What is happening?

Mr. Speaker: I hope that there is some chance that the hon. Gentleman will make his supplementary questions brief. That certainly was not brief.

Alun Michael: The current farm-gate price is, I believe, 19.6p, so clearly producing milk in excess of that would not be profitable. In 2003, the KPMG report found that 60 per cent. of milk was produced profitably for farmers, which, as suggested by the large variations between the top and bottom quartiles, implies that for some people production is not profitable. I recommend that my hon. Friend chooses as his weekend reading the report by the Milk Development Council published in August 2004, as it demonstrates that, although the proportion of the price taken by the supermarkets has increased in the past 10 years, another 10 years before that the proportion that they took was roughly what it is now. One must therefore take a careful look at the matter, and that is precisely what my noble Friend Lord Whitty is doing with the forum that represents the farmers and the dairy industry, which we want to be sustainable in the long term.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) (Con): The profitability of the sector is being significantly reduced by bovine tuberculosis, which the Government have described as an epidemic and which they predict will cost £2 billion over the next 10 years. What is their assessment of the likely improvement in profitability in the UK if they implemented the wildlife management measures introduced in Ireland, which delivered a 96 per cent. reduction in infection risk in Donegal?

Alun Michael: I find it interesting that the hon. Gentleman did not follow the questioning of hon. Members on both sides of the House about enabling the dairy industry to be competitive and successful. There are recently published results from the Irish four areas badger culling trial, which we are studying with great interest. We are asking the independent scientific group on cattle TB to look at those findings and assess their relevance to the situation in the UK. That will lead us to conclusions which, I am sure, will be debated with great interest by hon. Members of all parties.

Andrew George (St. Ives) (LD): I am not sure that the Minister properly reflects the deep seriousness of the situation. There have always been variations in the input and profitability of dairy farms, and no doubt there will be in future. He has to accept that public subsidies that go to dairy farms have been siphoned off into the profit margins of supermarkets. Report after report from the Select Committee and the Milk Development Council all confirm that dairy farms have been losing, out while supermarkets have been creaming it. Rather than circumnavigating further mulberry bushes with inquiries and committees, the Government should act. Why do they not act, as they did to break up Milk Marque four years ago and—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Minister can answer.

Alun Michael: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is a complicated matter. We are trying to move to a situation where demand dictates production. That must be good for the health of the industry in the long term. The current level of production means that some goes into low-level and therefore low-return uses—generic rather than branded butter and other products, such as powdered milk and so on. As I said earlier, the level of production is comparable to that before some producers moved out of dairy. That is why it is so important to relate the activities and how the industry develops to how the market moves.

Marine Environment

3. Paddy Tipping (Sherwood) (Lab): What recent representations she has received on the need for legislation to protect the marine environment. [207845]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): There is widespread support for new legislation to manage and protect the marine environment better. This is why we have announced in the DEFRA five-year strategy that we will introduce a marine Bill to deliver our vision of clean, healthy, safe, productive and biologically diverse oceans and seas.

Paddy Tipping: That is good news. This is a complicated area where there are conflicts. Is not the best way forward to produce a draft Bill soon, so that all the interests have an opportunity to comment on it and we get decent, thoughtful legislation?

Mr. Morley: I am a strong supporter of the draft Bill process. It makes for good legislation. As my hon. Friend says, this is a complicated area, which is why we have taken the decision to introduce a marine Bill. As part of that, we need to consult across Government, because various Departments, agencies and interests are involved in marine management. We want to rationalise it and move towards a much stronger ecosystem-based approach.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): Does the Minister agree that such a marine Bill would operate in the context of the particular threat to the sea of climate change? Why, then, are the Government threatening to sue the European Union for trying to put a cap on the runaway emissions from British industry?

Mr. Morley: The European Union pressed the Government to produce at a very early stage draft proposals arising from our calculations relating to the emissions trading scheme. Those calculations have been refined by Department of Trade and Industry modelling. It was always made clear to the EU that our proposals were in draft, were not complete and would be amended. According to our legal advice, the EU is under an obligation to consider amendments, but it has refused to do so. That is why we have taken legal advice.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend accept my support for a draft Bill as suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Paddy Tipping)? How would new legislation be enforced and how would it relate to EU-wide activity on marine conservation?

Mr. Morley: There are both EU directives and laws and national laws on marine management. One of the proposals that we will consider is whether a role exists for a marine agency to streamline fisheries management and a range of other management issues in the marine environment.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury) (Con): I do not detect enough urgency. The Government have discussed the issue for some years; they have seen private Members' Bills being talked out; and they are now discussing another five-year think. The matter is urgent, and the scientific, environmental and spatial planning cases for a marine Bill are overwhelming. We must address the issue with greater urgency than the Minister has suggested today.

Mr. Morley: Let me clarify one point: the proposal is within our five-year strategy, but that does not mean a five-year process. We want to move forward as quickly as possible, bearing in mind that we must go through a full consultation, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is, like the Government, committed to that principle. He knows, too, that a Conservative Back Bencher introduced a private Member's Bill, which the Government backed and which Conservative Members in the other place destroyed.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): Can we clarify the record? Opposition Front Benchers say that that private Member's Bill was talked out, but, quite disgracefully, maverick Tory peers, not the Government, talked it out.

Mr. Morley: My hon. Friend, who has been interested in the issue for a long time and who has a distinguished record, is right. The talking out of the private Member's Bill was linked to vested interests that felt that a marine Bill would stifle their commercial objectives. The idea behind a marine Bill is to balance commercial operations in the sea such as oil, gas, renewables, ports and dredging with proper, sound, sustainable environmental management.

Waste Electrical and Electronic Equipment

4. Dr. John Pugh (Southport) (LD): What discussions the Department has had with companies producing electrical and electronic equipment on the need to reduce waste arising from such equipment. [207846]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): The Government have consulted extensively with stakeholders, including producers, throughout negotiation and planning for implementation of the waste electrical and electronic equipment directive.

Dr. Pugh: Does the Minister agree that the marketing strategies, maintenance policies and planned obsolescence used by key players in the industry are compounding the problem of electronic waste? We face an increasing waste mountain of perfectly functional VHS recorders, analogue TV and radio receivers, computers, and DVD players that play but will not record.

Mr. Morley: The hon. Gentleman makes a reasonable point. Part of the problem is that technology moves on, but I sympathise with his point. One of the advantages of the new WEEE directive is that it is based on producer liability, which providers manufacturers with a powerful incentive to ensure that they build methods of recycling and reuse into their products. That is in their interests, because take-back will be their responsibility in the future.

Mr. Andrew Turner (Isle of Wight) (Con): When Councillor Julian Whittaker asked Isle of Wight council why it has a warehouse full of redundant electrical equipment, including telephones, computers and photocopiers, he was advised that its possession of those negative value assets was due to the cost not only of dismantling that equipment but of data removal, and that it was impossible to dispose of the equipment for that reason. Will the Minister assure the House that old equipment, as well as equipment that is coming online today, can be disposed of without excessive cost?

Mr. Morley: The recycling of computer equipment is important. Well established organisations and companies take and recycle IT equipment. The hon. Gentleman's point concerns the cost of IT removal. Local authorities raise many issues with me, but that issue is new, and I do not know whether a local issue has occurred. I would not claim to be an IT expert, but I know that there are well established methods of removing data from redundant equipment and storing it and backing it up in archives. Isle of Wight council may wish to take some technical advice on that.

Game Birds

5. Mr. Archie Norman (Tunbridge Wells) (Con): What her policy is on regulation of the game bird industry. [207847]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Mr. Ben Bradshaw): We plan to liberalise the game laws to help to boost the game bird industry while continuing to improve hygiene and welfare standards.

Mr. Norman: Will the Minister take this opportunity to acknowledge the real and growing contribution to rural employment that is made by the game bird and shooting industry, which employs more than 26,000 people? In the light of the passing of the Hunting Act 2004, as well as the pro-regulatory views expressed by the Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs and by animal welfare groups, will he reaffirm the Government's commitment to the principle of self-regulation of the game bird and shooting industry? To what extent has he considered the case for deregulation, particularly of the anachronistic provision for licences to shoot and to sell game?

Mr. Bradshaw: I am happy to give the hon. Gentleman all the assurances that he seeks and to confirm that the Government intend, subject to consultation, to abolish game shooting and dealing licences, which are archaic. That will give a welcome boost to the game shooting industry.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (North-West Norfolk) (Con): Does the Minister agree that game birds are a very healthy alternative to factory-produced poultry, and what does he intend to do to improve the marketing of game?

Mr. Bradshaw: Again, I agree with the hon. Gentleman. Game is extremely nutritious and tasty, and contains some of the vital oils that are shared with oily fish, which we know to be very good for one's health. The Government already give marketing help to the industry through various grants. We hope that one of the consequences of doing away with some of this archaic legislation—I have to say that that was not dealt with under the Conservative Government—will be a welcome boost to the shooting and game dealing industry, ending the ludicrous fact that game can be sold only for very limited periods of the year.

Sugar

6. Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley) (Lab/Co-op): What representations she has received regarding discussions with the European Union concerning changes to the African, Caribbean and Pacific sugar regime. [207848]

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): My ministerial colleagues and I have received a number of representations on behalf of ACP countries highlighting concerns about the possible consequences of EU sugar reform for their industries.

Mr. Foulkes: I urge my right hon. Friend to fight like a tiger in Europe against the sudden price drop proposed for Caribbean sugar, which will cause havoc to many small islands' fragile economies and perhaps turn them on to growing illicit crops, with a consequent effect on security and law and order, not only in the Caribbean—particularly Jamaica—but on our own streets.

Margaret Beckett: I understand the seriousness of my right hon. Friend's point. I assure him that the British Government attach great importance to the need for transitional measures to mitigate the impact of sugar reform on existing preferential suppliers as a group, and particularly the ACP. However, I am sure that he accepts that the existing regime, which is due to expire in 2006 anyway, and has the effect of keeping the price of sugar three times above world levels, is not sustainable in the long term.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): The right hon. Lady referred to changes to the existing regime. I am sure that she would acknowledge that those changes could have a serious impact on the future of UK sugar producers. Will she have urgent talks with the Chancellor designed to reduce the duty on the relevant biofuels so as to make the production of alternative fuels more attractive?

Margaret Beckett: The House may wish to be reminded that although we cannot have a detailed assessment of the likely impact of changes in the regime until we see the more detailed regulations, we have published on our Department's website an independent study carried out by Cambridge university and the Royal Agricultural College examining the possible impact of a range of options in the field of reform. It is unquestionably true that this would lead to changes in every member state. It is also true that some of those changes could reduce production levels, again in every member state.

I entirely take the right hon. and learned Gentleman's point about biofuels, but he will know that there is much discussion between our Department, the Department for Transport and the Treasury about this issue, and there is no unwillingness on the part of the Treasury to do what can be done to stimulate the market for biofuels. There is, however, reluctance to take steps that might not stimulate British production but draw in imports. Only on that matter is there any dispute, and we continue to keep it under review.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): The Secretary of State is right that the current regime is not only due to expire but needs reform. She is also right to refer to the implications for our traditional cane suppliers from the African, Caribbean and Pacific countries and the need for structural help to face the changes. I am sure that she agrees that there will be price reductions—we do not know the extent of them—and quota cuts. What is the Government's attitude to the Commission's current proposals, which may alter, to change the whole system of quota cuts so that Britain would take a much greater hit than we would sustain if the current mechanism for cutting quotas remained unchanged? Will she resist the Commission's proposals to change the mechanism for cutting quotas?

Margaret Beckett: I am afraid that I do not entirely share the hon. Gentleman's view. It is and always has been the Government's purpose to defend British interests as vigorously as we can, and we have a good track record of doing that. However, there is something to be said for the Commission's general approach. It is too early to predict the Commission's further detailed proposals because, as hon. Members know, the Commission has understandably said that further sets of proposals are unlikely until the EU's appeal against the World Trade Organisation case has been heard.

The Commission's existing proposals will have an impact on every member state. The independent review suggests that the likely scenarios would lead to reduced production of sugar beet here, but that the impact would be significantly lessened if growers restructured and/or reduced their costs. A range of measures might mitigate the impact on the British industry. The hon. Gentleman can rest assured that we will do our utmost to achieve the best long-term outcome for the British industry.

Municipal Waste

7. Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): What steps she is taking to reduce the amount of biodegradable municipal waste being sent to landfill sites. [207849]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): The Government have several mechanisms in place to reduce the amount of biodegradable municipal waste going to landfill. The most important are the landfill allowances trading scheme, the waste implementation programme and the £3 per tonne annual increase in landfill tax, which will lead to a rate in the medium term of £35 per tonne.

Simon Hughes: I am grateful for the reply, and I support the Government's initiative. However, given that—almost incredibly—more than a third of landfill comes from the food industry, and that a national charity called FareShare, which is based in Bermondsey but works throughout the country, takes quality unused food and redistributes it to organisations such as those that deal with the homeless, will the Minister examine the reasons for the sudden loss, with no notice, of Government support for that organisation, which contributes so much to reducing landfill? Will he talk to his colleagues in the Treasury and elsewhere to reinstate the support, because FareShare makes a huge ethical and practical contribution?

Mr. Morley: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point and I have a great deal of sympathy with FareShare's work. He will appreciate that the top objective for proper sustainable management must be to minimise waste. That is the Government's objective.

The issue about FareShare and the way in which it fits in is complex and the hon. Gentleman may appreciate a bit more detail. I am happy to write to him about that.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): As my hon. Friend the Minister says, the main objective must be to minimise waste, because even in counties such as Lancashire we are running out of holes in the ground in which to dump the rubbish. Does he believe that we have satisfactory arrangements and plans for the authorities that are responsible for the collection and disposal of waste? There are supposed to be plans for the whole country. Are they working in the best way for minimising waste that goes to landfill?

Mr. Morley: My hon. Friend makes a good point. The Government believe that there is much scope for better co-ordination and better working within the two-tier authorities—those that have both a waste collection authority and a waste disposal authority. The Waste and Emissions Trading Act 2003 contains powers to impose an obligation for closer co-ordination between those two tiers and the Gershon review makes recommendations on efficiency savings. Those provisions are part of the Government's agenda and the issue is being addressed now.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon) (Con): Given that disposable nappies account for 2 per cent. of the volume of waste being produced—to which my three grandchildren under the age of one are making their contribution—would it not be useful to conduct a proper economic analysis of the relative environmental costs of reusable and disposable nappies? There is no simple formula and such an analysis would enable institutional users such as health trusts to understand which was the more environmentally friendly option.

Mr. Morley: The right hon. Gentleman makes a valid point. Various whole-life assessments and calculations in relation to energy and cost have been made in the argument about disposables versus reusables and the Environment Agency has commissioned a detailed study of exactly the kind that he asked for. I think that it is undergoing peer review, but it will be made publicly available in due course.

Sugar

8. Hugh Bayley (City of York) (Lab): What progress has been made with reform of the EU common agricultural policy sugar regime. [207850]

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): As already reported to the House, the November 2004 Agriculture Council broadly accepted that the existing EU sugar regime was unsustainable. We are still awaiting detailed legislative proposals from the European Commission to take forward the approach first set out in its communication of July 2004.

Hugh Bayley: I am glad that the Commission recognises that change must happen. The EU needs to cut its sugar production if we are to stop dumping our surplus on the world market. Does the Secretary of State agree, however, that it is important for the cuts to be made on the basis not of a carve-up between nations but of the least efficient producers in Europe being the ones to go, so that efficient producers such as British Sugar can remain in business?

Margaret Beckett: It is important and necessary for all member states to take proper account of the changes that are being proposed. Throughout the discussions on CAP reform—including those on issues that have already been agreed and those on sugar—it has been the aim of this Government to ensure that we have an agriculture regime that is efficient and responsive to the market and which does not have the distortions, either within the single market of the European Union or in the world market, that past regimes have had.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde) (Con): Does the Secretary of State accept that, in this time of change for the British sugar beet industry, the construction of a UK bioethanol plant is of particular importance? Does she accept the illogicality of her earlier answer, in which she suggested that she was worried about imports of biofuels to meet our European requirements in the context of blending petrol and biofuels? The best way to deal with this would be to have a plant in the United Kingdom. Will she explain to the House the paradox of her Department's support for such a plant, while we do not, at present, have one?

Margaret Beckett: I am conscious of the fact that the right hon. Gentleman chairs the Select Committee on Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, which takes a view similar to that of the Government on the overall prospects for sugar reform and the need for such reform. I very much welcome that. On bioethanol, perhaps I did not express myself with as much clarity as I would have wished. I did not mean to suggest that there was a dispute over whether there was support for a bioethanol industry. That support exists and he will know that the Chancellor has already offered generous cuts in taxation to help to stimulate that market. It is now a matter of what further steps might be taken to stimulate production. Other matters, such as the availability of capital grants, are also being considered.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok) (Lab/Co-op): Does the Minister agree that reform of the sugar regime should provide an opportunity for a section of British farmers to break away from the welfare dependency culture that seems to be prevalent among so much of the agriculture industry? Is it not ironic that the Tories consistently oppose subsidies, except when they and their friends are receiving them?

Margaret Beckett: Far be it from me, normally, to be terribly fair to Conservative Members, but on this occasion, I must admit that my hon. Friend is being uncharitable to them, because the Select Committee certainly supports a reform of the sugar regime, and, as far as I am aware, so do the Conservative Front Benchers. Certainly, there is now widespread acceptance across the House that we do not want the persistence of a regime that, as he rightly said, has encouraged dependency. We want an efficient and well run single market in agriculture, as in other industries. In every part of the House, people are confident that British farmers are more than capable of holding their own in such a market.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Given that, since the advent of the "Everything but Arms" initiative, Mozambique, Ethiopia and Malawi have sustained losses of approximately $238 million as a consequence not of trade-distorting subsidies but of barriers to market access, does the Secretary of State agree that western policies in this field are both morally wrong and economically counter-productive? In seeking to take the matter forward, it is essential to bear it in mind that, as well as getting rid of the subsidies, we must open the market to give the poorest people in the world the legitimate opportunity to compete and grow. Our constituents expect nothing less.

Margaret Beckett: The hon. Gentleman makes an important and powerful point, and as ever, he does so extremely well. I am absolutely mindful of the fact that it is hugely important that this reform is seen not only as worth while and important in its own right but as part of the context of a wider agenda of trade reform. It has become increasingly clear that the expectation of our fellow European Union members is that this issue will play a large part during the British presidency of the EU in the second part of this year. The hope is widely held that the matter can be resolved as far as possible in that presidency, precisely in order to get the negotiations on the right road before the talks on the Doha round that are due to take place in Hong Kong in December. All of us in politics are paid what we might regard as dubious compliments from time to time. One that has recently been paid to my Department and me has been the clearly and strongly expressed view of our predecessors in the presidency that the matter should be left to us to resolve.

Waste Services (Efficiency Gains)

9. Tim Loughton (East Worthing and Shoreham) (Con): What steps her Department plans to take to help local authorities deliver efficiency gains in waste services. [207852]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): DEFRA will provide support for stronger local authority procurement skills and for greater joint working between tiers of local authorities and among adjacent local authorities, and work with the waste market to ensure effective delivery of new facilities as landfill diminishes in importance.

Tim Loughton: Will the Minister therefore pay tribute to the two councils in my constituency, Adur and Worthing—both Conservative controlled—working in partnership and with West Sussex county council, which have been innovatory in improving recycling levels? They have returned to weekly blue box collections, which were slashed to fortnightly by the previous Liberal administration, supported innovative programmes such as the Alchemist store, which I shall reopen on a new and improved site tomorrow and which provides recycling facilities for local schoolchildren, and have now merged their waste disposal fleets and used joint depots to maximise efficiency gains for local council tax payers. If he will pay tribute to them, why does his Government reward my councils in Sussex with some of the meanest local government grant settlements anywhere in the country?

Mr. Morley: I have written to all local authorities to congratulate those of all parties who have performed well on waste collection and recycling, to encourage those who are not performing as well to do better, and to offer the support available through the waste implementation programme and Waste and Resources Action Programme. I very much welcome the innovation of local councils, including the hon. Gentleman's, and the example of joint procurement is exactly the kind of initiative that the Government want to encourage. On financing, this Government have made £1.3 billion available through core funding to local authorities over the spending review period, as well as about £275 million in additional funds through private finance initiative credits, which is a significant amount. Incidentally, that funding would be slashed to the bone were the Conservative party's James review ever implemented.

Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): Does the Minister subscribe to the spending review commitment to cut further efficiency savings by £300 million? How can he meet that target when one of the most effective tools for achieving efficiency gains has been the contracting out of waste disposal functions under the Environmental Protection Act 1990? How can he marry these two proposals? How can he increase efficiency savings by ending the contracting out that has worked so well, especially in Conservative-controlled councils?

Mr. Morley: We believe that local authorities should be respected and that authorities that perform well should be encouraged and supported. We do not believe in the principle that everything in the private sector is automatically good or bad, or in the principle that everything in the public sector is automatically good or bad. We believe that there should be flexibility and choice and that the 1990 approach is far too restrictive for local authorities.

We believe in the £300 million savings, which represent part of our objective—securing good value for money and efficient delivery of services, while implementing the strategies that we have devised to reduce reliance on landfill and increase recycling. As I said earlier, what is different about our Gershon approach is that it seeks to make efficiency savings while protecting the delivery of public services, whereas implementing the James report, published by the Conservative party, would slash services to the bone.

Kyoto Protocol

10. Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): What steps she is taking to ensure that the UK meets its obligations under the Kyoto protocol. [207854]

The Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (Margaret Beckett): The UK has a range of obligations under the Kyoto protocol, including reducing greenhouse gas emissions, adapting to the impacts of climate change and assisting developing countries in tackling climate change. We are making excellent progress on all of them, and are well on track to meet our target of reducing greenhouse gas emissions by 12.5 per cent. by 2012.

Tony Lloyd: I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend's role in ensuring that we have done so well with the Kyoto objectives, but may I ask her specifically about our failure so far to make the same progress with carbon dioxide emissions? We are still some way from our domestic target of a 20 per cent. reduction by 2010. I know that it is both my right hon. Friend's and the Prime Minister's ambition to concentrate on that during our G8 presidency. Would it not give the Prime Minister great moral authority, and also make practical sense to British business and society, if we were to get ahead of the game in respect of greenhouse gases, in particular carbon dioxide? Would it not be sensible to introduce sectoral carbon budgets, so that industry and the country would know how we intended to achieve the 20 per cent. reduction? Everyone would be clear about what was expected of them and we would have something against which to measure our progress.

Margaret Beckett: Issues of exactly that kind are being discussed, and will continue to be discussed over the next few weeks and months, in our climate change programme review. As my hon. Friend says, although we have made very good progress with our overall reduction in greenhouse gas emissions, we have made less progress with the reduction in carbon dioxide emissions. That is, of course, against the background of a period during which, as was recently shown by the result of monitoring from Hawaii, carbon dioxide levels have risen throughout the northern hemisphere. It may well be that only the many steps taken by the Government to reduce emissions have enabled us to remain where we are at present. Nevertheless, my hon. Friend is right in saying that if we continue as we are we will not be on track to meet our much more stringent domestic target of 20 per cent.

As it happens, a review of the climate change programme, to begin in 2004, was built into the current agreement. The review has begun and part of its task will be to consider what steps we can take to put ourselves back on track. My hon. Friend's suggestion is one that people will consider and we are open to advice and input from all sources.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet) (Con): I accept that the Government's declared target of reducing carbon dioxide emissions by 20 per cent. by 2010 goes beyond the Kyoto agreement. Will the Secretary of State confirm that in 2002–03 carbon dioxide emissions actually increased by 1.5 per cent.? Can she give last year's figure? Perhaps more importantly, when will she announce initiatives to get us back on track for the 20 per cent. reduction by 2010?

Margaret Beckett: Yes, the hon. Gentleman is right. There was a 1.5 per cent. increase in 2002–03, but of course, we are still below the emission levels of 2001. However, he and my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Tony Lloyd) were right to point out that that is not good enough. I cannot give the precise date on which the outcome of the climate change programme review will be published, but we hope that it will appear a little later this year.

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield) (Lab): I pay tribute to the Secretary of State and her Ministers for their magnificent work in delivering on the Kyoto protocol. However, can she confirm that, at the recent COP 10 meeting in Buenos Aires, the oil-producing nations, led most notably by Saudi Arabia and supported by the United States of America, demanded that, if they are to deliver on Kyoto in future, such nations should receive billions of dollars in compensation for producing and selling less oil? Can she assure the House that that is not a path that the United Kingdom Government will traverse?

Margaret Beckett: I certainly can, and my hon. Friend's description of what happened in Buenos Aires is entirely right. Indeed, those who follow these matters will know that that was only one of many occasions on which some oil producers have sought to put the interests of their economies above—and in the queue for compensation before—those of some of the most vulnerable states in the world, which are likely to be most affected by climate change. I can assure him that, in conducting these negotiations, it is no part of the United Kingdom Government's goal to support such steps and he will be as conscious as I am of the fact that, when the next climate change talks are held in December, the UK will be the lead negotiator on the European Union's behalf.

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk) (Con): The Secretary of State's tone is self-congratulatory, given that the Government have not continued the progress that was made before 1997 in steadily reducing CO_2 emissions. How can they claim to be taking seriously their obligations under the Kyoto protocol, given that they have failed to ensure Britain's timely participation in the European emissions trading scheme? Is she not ashamed of the fact that, despite years of notice being given of the start date for this scheme, Britain is one of only five European countries that were not ready to take part? Does not that failure completely undermine the Prime Minister's attempt to put climate change at the heart of Britain's presidency of the EU?

Margaret Beckett: It is very much a goal of the British Government's approach and policy to spread the message, which we believe to be true, that it is perfectly possible to cut emissions and to grow the economy. I am afraid that one reason for the success that the Conservatives claim in cutting emissions during their time in office is that they flattened the economy. This Government's achievement has been to grow our economy by a figure for 2002–03 of, I think, more than 30 per cent., while cutting emissions by 14 to 15 per cent., so we need no lectures from the Conservatives; and, of course, the overall level of greenhouse gas emissions is down from the level that we inherited from them.

There is some misunderstanding about the emissions trading scheme. The position in the UK is not particularly different from that elsewhere in Europe. The scheme operates on precisely the same basis in most member states exactly because most have yet to sort out and finalise their allocations, and although people cannot sell on the spot market, for example, they can participate in the forward market. My understanding is that virtually every member state is in more or less the same position. As my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment pointed out in answer to an earlier question, the Government submitted to the European Commission amended figures for the level of allocations in the emissions trading scheme precisely because the review and analysis of existing information suggested that our previous figures needed substantial adjustment. It was the Conservatives—and, indeed, players throughout British industry—who were demanding that we take account of British industry's representations concerning the claimed potential impact on competitiveness, so it is a bit rich for them now to complain about our having done so.

Norman Baker (Lewes) (LD): Are the Government still absolutely committed to a 6 per cent. reduction in carbon emissions by 2050, and can the Secretary of State confirm that there is no question of watering it down or abandoning it? Can she also confirm that, during the British presidency of the EU and the G8, we will actively encourage other countries to adopt that target?

Margaret Beckett: There is certainly no question of the Government resiling from the long-term target that we set. During our G8 presidency, there will be several events through which we shall try to promote discussion about what happens in the longer term across the globe. My hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) referred to the discussions that took place in Buenos Aires, and in the early part of February, we will host a scientific conference to consider the latest information and establish whether there could be more of an emerging consensus about the sort of targets that could achieve stability and avoid further dangerous impacts on climate change. In the middle of March, we will host a meeting of energy and environment Ministers from some 20 states, including those with particularly substantial and massively growing energy needs, such as China, India and Brazil. We are indeed using the opportunity of our G8 presidency to do what we can to promote more thoughtful discussion.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would be among the first to acknowledge that, while it is absolutely right for the British Government to identify where we think--

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is far too long a reply.

Milk Prices

11. Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): If she will make a statement on the level of farm-gate milk prices. [207855]

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality (Alun Michael): The most recent figures available show that the average price for milk delivered in November 2004 was 19.6p per litre. Milk prices in 2004 were consistently above those in 2003—there was a little narrowing towards the end of the year—despite last year's price support cuts. Farmers have also been paid a dairy premium of 0.78p per litre of quota partially to compensate them for price reductions, which have not as yet happened because the market price is above the intervention price.

Mr. Robertson: I am grateful to the Minister for that response, but over the last 10 years, farmers have seen their share of the retail price of milk fall from 60 per cent. to 40 per cent. That perhaps explains why two of the largest dairy farmers in my constituency have given up producing milk, and I suspect that more will follow suit. A short while ago, the Secretary of State said that it would be regrettable to introduce a fuel transport obligation because that would suck in imports, but if farmers are going to go out of business, that is surely what is going to happen with milk. When I meet my farmers in the near future, what can I say to them? Given the current dire position, what hope can I give them for the future?

Alun Michael: In the first instance, I point again to the Milk Development Council's report published in August, which has two extremely interesting tables. One shows the prices and margins over the last 10 years, while the second goes back 20 years and more. They demonstrate that the variations have increased the take from supermarkets in the last 10 years, but that the margins are closer if we go back over 20 years. These are complex issues.

The hon. Gentleman should also bear in mind the fact that the production of milk remains, with some variations of a couple of per cent., at the level it was before the decision of some producers to go out of the market. As I said, it is a complex issue, and in an earlier answer I underlined the great difference in profits that resulted from the efficiency of the top quartile of producers compared with the lowest quartile.

Ann Winterton (Congleton) (Con): There are no more efficient dairy farmers than those in Cheshire, especially in Congleton—[Interruption.]—and, perhaps, Macclesfield. Many of them have been forced out of milk production because of farm-gate prices and many more remain in production only because of the cheap labour of their families. If we want a living and working countryside, we have to ensure that dairy farmers remain profitable and that there is transparency in the figures produced by the processing and retailing sector. The 18p highlighted in the report of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee has to be accounted for.

Alun Michael: It seems that the hon. Lady does not believe in a market-related industry. It was an interesting intervention, but I am not sure what she is arguing against. As I said earlier, and wish to reinforce, we are working with the industry so that it can achieve long-term sustainability. For some producers in the lowest quartile, the cost of production means that their businesses are not sustainable. Improving that situation is one of the issues that the forum led by Lord Whitty is seriously addressing with enthusiasm and vigour, as indeed it should.

Pollution Control Regulations

12. Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle) (Lab): What recent assessment she has made of the effectiveness of pollution control regulations in controlling hazardous emissions to the air. [207856]

The Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment (Mr. Elliot Morley): The Department commissioned a review of local authorities' performance in regulating air pollution from industry, which was published in April last year. The Environment Agency assesses annually the performance of each installation it regulates.

Mr. Prentice: I wonder how that squares with the situation in Colne in my constituency, where Macadam's garage has been illegally spraying cars for months. A woman came to see me and described how her front room smelled as though it contained 20 open tins of varnish. It has been like that for months, but the Liberal Democrat-controlled council seems powerless to act. Surely the powers are available to prevent people from allowing such harmful emissions into the air and to provide redress for the people who have been affected.

Mr. Morley: I know that my hon. Friend has been very active in representing the interests and the concerns of his constituents in that matter. As I understand it, the powers exist for the council to use, but it appears that it has become entangled in a complex legal situation of double jeopardy. The council could take action under the Pollution Prevention and Control (England and Wales) Regulations 2000 and could seek an injunction to stop any illegal activity. We are giving advice to the council and seeing whether we can assist.

Business of the House

12.32 pm

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): Will the Leader of the House please give us the business for next week?

The Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. Peter Hain): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 17 JANUARY—Second Reading of the Constitutional Reform Bill [Lords].

TUESDAY 18 JANUARY—Second Reading of the Drugs Bill.

WEDNESDAY 19 JANUARY—Opposition Day [2nd Allotted Day]. There will be a debate entitled "Government's failure to give value for taxpayers' money", followed by a debate entitled "Government's failure to understand the needs of farming and rural communities".

THURSDAY 20 JANUARY—A debate on armed forces personnel on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 21 JANUARY—The House will not be sitting.

The provisional business for the following week will be:

MONDAY 24 JANUARY—Remaining stages of the Gambling Bill.

TUESDAY 25 JANUARY—Opposition Day [3rd Allotted Day]. There will be a debate on an Opposition motion. Subject to be announced.

WEDNESDAY 26 JANUARY—A debate on sitting hours and related motions followed by remaining stages of the Commissioners for Revenue and Customs Bill.

THURSDAY 27 JANUARY—Remaining stages of the Railways Bill.

FRIDAY 28 JANUARY—The House will not be sitting.

Mr. Heald: I thank the Leader of the House for giving us the business. He announced that the remaining stages of the Railways Bill will be taken on Thursday 27 January, but that will clash with the Committee sittings on the Road Safety Bill. Will he look again at that problem, which could cause considerable inconvenience for Members on both sides of the House who wish to attend both debates, including Ministers and Opposition spokesmen?

Has the Leader of the House made any progress in arranging a debate on foreign affairs so that we may discuss the situations in Africa and the middle east?

The Leader of the House has assured me that the Constitutional Reform Bill will have its Committee stage on the Floor of the House. That is an important principle because "you cannot play about with the British Constitution in a Committee upstairs".

Those are not my words, but Herbert Morrison's. As far as I am aware, the Government have stuck to that principle, starting with consideration of the Scotland Act 1998 and the Government of Wales Act 1998 and continuing through 16 other constitutional measures. Will the Leader of the House repeat his assurance that the whole of the Constitutional Reform Bill will have its Committee stage on the Floor of the House?

In the Chancellor's absence, may we have a statement from the Chief Secretary on the trade deficit, which for this year is now a whopping £53.2 billion? At one time Chancellors resigned over such news: now they leave the country.

May we have a debate about round-the-clock drinking? Police chiefs have attacked the plan, saying that it will cause a huge strain on resources. Is not there a danger that the staggered hours will mean more hours of staggering about by binge drinkers, who have become such a feature of our national evening culture? Is not that a major health issue and a major cause of crime, and should not it be a major concern for the Government?

Finally, may we have a statement from the Prime Minister on his U-turn about changes in the law on householders tackling burglars? The Prime Minister said that he would support reform; now he says that he does not. Is not it the case that, as the Chancellor once said:

"There is nothing you could ever say to me now that I could ever believe"?

Mr. Hain: On the Railways Bill and the Road Safety Bill, there was a difficult business management issue, as the hon. Gentleman knows. As he fairly acknowledges, he and I were anxious to hold the sitting hours debate on a day when the maximum number of Members would be present—whichever way they voted—so it was desirable to hold it in the middle of the week, and that is what we did by putting it on Wednesday 26 January. I am sure that we can get round those related transport matters in Committee and on the Floor of the House in a practical fashion.

I continue to note the hon. Gentleman's very fair request for debates on Africa and the middle east, and the Foreign Secretary is aware of it. As the hon. Gentleman knows, we are at a stage in the business cycle where we are getting through many Second Readings and making progress—more rapid progress than some of our critics might have imagined. The legislative programme is in very good shape indeed. There has not yet been an opportunity to hold those debates, but I continue to keep the matter under review.

The hon. Gentleman is aware that the Constitutional Reform Bill is currently being discussed by the usual channels. The Government will of course ensure that any programme motion provides for the matters in the Bill—which, yes, I described on 9 December as "a major constitutional measure"—to be debated on the Floor of the House. That has always been our intention. However, it is not the intention to deal with every aspect of the Bill on the Floor of the House, and adequate time for scrutiny in Standing Committee will be allocated. There are precedents for that, and the hon. Gentleman cited some: the Greater London Authority Bill was one and the Political Parties, Elections and Referendums Bill was another. The Constitutional Reform Bill has 111 clauses, and the major constitutional measures will, properly, be taken on the Floor of the House, but for some of the other measures in a Bill over which there has been exhaustive consultation, and which has been exhaustively debated in the House of Lords, I am sure that the House will see it as reasonable that the Government should adopt the approach that we have adopted—even if the hon. Gentleman does not.

On the question about the trade deficit, I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman has not pointed to the fact that we now have the strongest economy in living memory, with unemployment at its lowest for 30 years, the lowest mortgage and inflation rates for 40 years and the longest and most sustained period of economic growth for 200 years, compared with Conservative policies, in government, of high interest rates, high inflation, two recessions and 3 million unemployed. I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would want to keep quiet about the economy, as the Leader of the Opposition consistently does in his questions to the Prime Minister. The country knows that electing a Tory Government would place at risk the whole future of the economy, with rapidly increasing mortgages, cuts in public spending, rises in unemployment and rises in prices.

On binge drinking, the hon. Gentleman knows that, in the end, it is for local authorities to determine what the licensing hours should be for individual premises or what the policy should be in a particular locality, and we have provided for that. The problem is that we have binge drinking now, so clearly the existing system is not working. We are trying to ensure that people do not have to pour out of licensed premises at exactly the same time, tanked up because they are desperate to get extra alcohol into themselves; unfortunately, too many of them do and they then create law and order problems for the police.

Mr. Heald: What about the police?

Mr. Hain: The police have varied views on the scheme—not all of them oppose it, and many recognise that this is a sensible way to proceed. Why should the rights of the law-abiding majority to drink sensibly be transgressed? Surely their rights and liberties should be protected, which happens elsewhere in the European Union. Why should the rights of people who come out of the theatre and want the chance to enjoy a pint or a glass of wine be infringed and limited by an arbitrary cut-off that is imposed because of an abuse that is practised by a minority, bearing in mind the fact that, in any case, local authorities will have the right to control the matter locally?

The hon. Gentleman asks about burglaries and reasonable force. As the Home Secretary said yesterday in a written ministerial statement—it has been repeated today—after an exhaustive review, the Association of Chief Police Officers and the Crown Prosecution Service, the two key bodies involved, agreed that the existing law allows plenty of scope for reasonable force to be exercised. Indeed, I am advised of cases in which householders have killed intruders, but have not been prosecuted because the existing law provides plenty of scope. Our message to householders is that they have the right to defend their homes and to use reasonable force, and that they are entitled to use reasonable force if they suffer a burglary of an aggressive character. We are putting that message forward and the existing legislation provides for that, as ACPO and the CPS have confirmed. There is thus no need to amend the legislation.

John Cryer (Hornchurch) (Lab): The Leader of the House will be aware of the Unison campaign to take hospital cleaning contracts back into the public sector, which has started partly, at least, because in the 20 years since the privatisation of cleaning, the number of hospital cleaners has halved. If it was up to me, I would renationalise the lot and take back everything that the Tories privatised, starting with the railways. However, this situation is crucial—it could be a matter of life and death. The introduction of the profit motive into hospital cleaning has been a complete failure, as it has in most areas. May we have an urgent debate on the matter?

Mr. Hain: The Secretary of State for Health has made it clear that cleaning is a serious problem in too many hospitals, and he is tackling the matter. The situation is a legacy of the Tories' disastrous privatisation of cleaning, when they failed to ensure adequate standards, which are now being pushed through by the Government's policies. My hon. Friend will understand that MRSA is a separate, though related, issue because that is to do with the mutation of disease, which is difficult to deal with. The Secretary of State is well aware that clean hospitals are a vital prerequisite for effective treatment.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): Will the Leader of the House arrange for the Prime Minister to come to the House early next week to make a statement on the hunt for weapons of mass destruction? He will have noted that overnight the President's spokesperson at the White House said that the Iraq survey group will now officially stand down. The exercise has ended, which clearly demonstrates that the House was given a completely flawed prospectus for going to war in Iraq. We now know that WMD stands for either weapons of mass distraction, or weapons of mass deception. We clearly need a statement from the Prime Minister as early as possible.

I think that the Leader of the House was in the Chamber a few minutes ago when hon. Members on both sides of the House were asking the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs important questions about the Kyoto protocol and climate change. Will he arrange for an early debate on the subject? We know from the Secretary of State's replies a few minutes ago, and from the Minister for the Environment and Agri-environment's answers to my question about the severe weather conditions and climate change yesterday, that the Government are undertaking several initiatives in the near future—in February and, I think, in March—partly as a result of our current role as the lead country in the G8. Should not the House hear precisely what the Government have in mind to ensure that G8 countries live up to their expectations? Is the Leader of the House aware that there has been an important Lords report on this issue, to which I understand the Government have not yet responded, and a report from a Commons Select Committee on climate change and flooding, which asks for a White Paper? The Government apparently responded that there was no need for such a White Paper.

[Mr. Paul Tyler]

Does the Leader of the House recognise that this is an extremely important issue for hon. Members throughout the House? If we do not take the opportunity of the G8 leadership to do something serious about it—notably to persuade the President of United States to take the matter seriously—the whole of the world will suffer.

Mr. Hain: I very much agree with the hon. Gentleman about climate change. The way in which our weather has been behaving recently gives the lie to claims that global warming does not produce climate change and that emissions are not at the root of that problem. We have made climate change a key priority for the G8 presidency and I am grateful that the hon. Gentleman supports the Government on that. It means that we are in the same position on this matter. I will bear in mind the need to debate the issue in the House. I am sure that there will be plenty of opportunities to do so as the G8 presidency progresses.

The hon. Gentleman will know that the information that has just come to light from the Iraq survey group about its changed role is nothing new. He will also recall that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary made a statement to the House on 12 October; I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was present for it. My right hon. Friend went into these issues in some detail. Both he and, before him, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made it clear that we accept the conclusions of the Iraq survey group about its failure to find any evidence of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq at the present time.

Llew Smith (Blaenau Gwent) (Lab): My right hon. Friend will be aware that on many occasions the Prime Minister and other Ministers, including him, said to Parliament or in media interviews that the reason we were going to war was not that we had to get rid of Saddam Hussein but the fact that he had weapons of mass destruction, that they could be used in 45 minutes and that they were a threat to the world. As the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) has just said, America has announced the winding up of the Iraq survey group and admitted that there were no weapons of mass destruction. May we have a debate in which apologies can be given? More important, I am sure that hon. Members will have noted that, although there have been resignations from the media for the coverage of the war, there has been no resignation from the Government—from the people responsible for the war—even though it has resulted in more than 100,000 deaths among Iraqi people and, indeed, our own soldiers.

Mr. Hain: These matters were exhaustively gone into when my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary made his statement on 12 October. He was questioned and exactly the points that my hon. Friend raises were made. My right hon. Friend robustly answered them, and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has repeatedly answered those questions in Prime Minister's questions over recent months.

We had an honest difference of opinion on the war—

Llew Smith: You were wrong.

Mr. Hain: Well, no. My hon. Friend says that I was wrong.

Llew Smith: You were.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman gets only one bite of the cherry.

Mr. Hain: Does my hon. Friend believe that Saddam Hussein should still be in power? The real choice now is not what the original decision was and the merits of the basis of the original decision; the real choice is whether we should have a democratic Iraq, with elections at the end of this month, or terrorists destroying the prospect of democracy in Iraq. That is the choice before us now.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley) (Con): May we have a debate on the availability of information in books or chatrooms that could assist people to commit suicide? In Preston in September, a 19-year-old lady had a book called "Final Exit" and visited chatrooms and then, sadly, committed suicide. The Lancashire Evening Post is running a campaign entitled "Stop Pedlars of Death". May we have a debate on what can be done to close down the sources of the information that vulnerable young people are getting?

Mr. Hain: I shall certainly draw that case to the attention of the Ministers involved, as it is clearly alarming.

Peter Bradley (The Wrekin) (Lab): I have always believed that what matters most to my constituents is what happens outside their front door, on their streets and in their neighbourhoods, and how it affects their quality of life. I am worried, however, that we may have got it wrong, because the Liberal Democrats voted against the Anti-social Behaviour Act 2003 and, on Monday, the Conservatives failed to support the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill—indeed, those who turned up for the debate spoke against it. May we have an urgent debate to review the Government's policies and establish whether Government or Opposition Members understand the public's priorities better?

Mr. Hain: I am inclined to have a re-run of the Second Reading of the Clean Neighbourhoods and Environment Bill, because there were only two Conservative speakers, compared with 18 Labour speakers. That demonstrates that the Conservatives are not interested in antisocial behaviour or clean neighbourhoods. They do not care about graffiti, fly-tipping, abandoned vehicles, noise pollution and other scourges of people's neighbourhoods. The Labour Government, however, are taking the matter forward, and we will continue to do so, even though we have to face up to the Opposition.

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire) (Con): The House welcomed the fact that on Monday the Prime Minister came here to make a statement on the Indonesian earthquake. The Leader of the House will accept that many Members were unable to participate in that exchange, and that some important issues arose and need to be discussed. May we therefore have a debate in Government time next month on issues arising from the Indonesian earthquake?

Mr. Hain: I realise that this is an extremely important matter and, as the right hon. Gentleman said, there was a full chance to question the Prime Minister about it on Monday. It will be kept under constant review. For example, the figures for British casualties and other casualties are being adjusted almost daily as more accurate information becomes available. We will certainly bear in mind the right hon. Gentleman's request.

Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock) (Lab): May we have a debate on the need for a further Thames river crossing to the east, outside the borough of Thurrock, incorporating flood defences? I draw to my right hon. Friend's attention the fact that last weekend the M25 was blocked. That has an impact on us in Essex and north Kent but it also has a serious impact on the entire UK economy. The Dartford-Thurrock crossing is not so much a tunnel as a funnel, and we need alternative crossings so that people can get to the channel ports and airports without suffering 24 or 48-hour closures.

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend raises a serious matter, especially given the location of his Thurrock constituency. I shall certainly make sure that the relevant Minister responds in detail to the points that he made, as certain issues need to be taken into account in future.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon) (LD): The Leader of the House will have noticed the increasing role of the Attorney-General and his Department in matters that affect the business of the House. At present, we have 10 minutes every four sitting weeks to hold the Solicitor-General to account. Will the Leader of the House agree to increase that time and ensure that we have greater opportunity to hold that important Department to account?

Mr. Hain: I think that the hon. Gentleman will find that the 10-minute slot is long established. He will know that there are other opportunities to question Ministers on the outcome of a policy. The Attorney-General and the Solicitor-General advise Ministers who, as was the case with the Minister for Rural Affairs and Local Environmental Quality, who dealt with hunting and its ban, and the Foreign Secretary, who is responsible for matters relating to the Guantanamo Bay detainees, can come to the House to answer questions and make a statement. They are the people who ought to be held to account in policy areas about which the House is rightly concerned. I therefore do not accept that there is a need to grant additional time to the Solicitor-General, but we will obviously keep the matter under review.

Mr. John Lyons (Strathkelvin and Bearsden) (Lab): This week, the management of the national health service proposed changing the staff pension scheme from a final salary scheme to one based on average pay. Will the Leader of the House find time for a debate on that important issue? Many of us believe that if something is good enough for MPs it is good enough for the hard-working staff of the NHS.

Mr. Hain: Consultations are under way with the trade unions, who are concerned about the matter. The Secretary of State for Health is alive to the points made by my hon. Friend.

Bob Spink (Castle Point) (Con): Following the tsunami disaster, may we have a debate to explore how science can be used to improve detection and early warning for all types of global natural hazards? The lives of more than 100,000 people could have been saved by better warning systems, and science can play an important part in providing such systems.

Mr. Hain: I very much agree that science has an important role to play, which is why we have greatly increased expenditure on science in Britain. He rightly identified the importance of detecting major disturbances, which is why the Prime Minister asked the chief scientific adviser to look into the matter and report as quickly as possible. I understand from informal conversations that we have the potential and perhaps even the capability at present to monitor such things, so the question is how we can best enable the rest of the world to benefit from that.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge) (Lab): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the excellent report by the Modernisation Committee on sitting hours and ask him about September sittings, of which I am a great supporter? I understand why there will not be any September sittings this year, but I urge him to introduce a proposal enabling questions to be submitted within a two-week period. That would mean that we would not have a long time from the beginning of the summer recess until October when we are unable to table questions to Ministers.

Mr. Hain: I am not used to being congratulated at the Dispatch Box.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): We love you really.

Mr. Hain: I do not think that I want that kind of congratulation.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell). The Modernisation Committee's report on sitting hours was excellent, and I shall certainly bear in mind her comments. However, this year the House is not sitting in September because, as she knows, security work is being undertaken, as stipulated by the House authorities. We want to keep the matter under review but, because we are changing term times, we should not make a premature decision.

David Burnside (South Antrim) (UUP): Will the Leader of the House find Government time for a debate on the funding of political parties? In our part of the United Kingdom, we have the only party that, if the opinion of the Chief Constable is correct, funds itself through criminal activities, be they drug money from Colombia or the robbery of the Northern bank. Is it not quite improper that one party in the House receives facilities, allowances and offices in the Palace of Westminster and funds its activities both in Northern Ireland and in the Irish Republic to the disadvantage of nationalist parties north and south of the border and other parties that campaign legally, correctly and properly under electoral law on the funding of parties in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Hain: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland said when answering questions following his statement to the House a few days ago, the Government want to keep that and other issues under careful review. Nothing is ruled in and nothing is ruled out, but it is not in anyone's interest, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman will understand as a representative from Northern Ireland, to take precipitate action. The key objective and focus must remain to get the peace settlement locked in, with all the parties to it practising democratic politics, not indulging in any kind of criminal activity.

Mr. Parmjit Dhanda (Gloucester) (Lab): My right hon. Friend may be aware of the key role that the South West of England Regional Development Agency has played in helping me and helping the Government to set up an urban regeneration company. As a consequence of that, Gloucester stands on the verge of a £1 billion regeneration in Gloucester docks. Will my right hon. Friend consider allowing time for a debate on the James report, which would asset-strip the RDAs and jeopardise £1 billion worth of regeneration in Gloucester docks, should the Tories ever come back to power?

Mr. Hain: I would be enthusiastic about finding time to debate the matter. We will see what we can do. As my hon. Friend says, the regional development agencies in the south-west and across England are playing a vital role in regional regeneration and are widely supported, especially in the business community, for the backing that they give to the creation of a dynamic regional economy. The fact that the Conservatives want to abolish regional development agencies and would, as my hon. Friend says, use the James report to asset-strip those key levers of public policy, on top of some £35 billion worth of cuts and £15 billion worth of extra spending, means that there is a £50 billion black hole in their economic strategy, which would put the whole economy at risk.

Mr. Roger Gale (North Thanet) (Con): Among the prerequisites for a free and democratic election are the creation of an electoral register, the ability of those conducting the election to verify that those voting are entitled to vote, and the ability of those voting to vote in peace and without fear of intimidation. Given the Government's support for the elections in Iraq at the end of the month, which the Leader of the House endorsed yet again today, could he find time for a debate in Government time on the Floor of the House well before those elections, in order that the House may be satisfied that those elections will be free and fair, and that the results will be anything other than meaningless?

Mr. Hain: The Foreign Secretary will wish to keep the House closely informed about progress. With Foreign Office questions coming up in a short while, there may be an opportunity for a report to the House. The momentum for the elections is building and there are now 111 lists containing more than 6,000 candidates registered to contest the national elections. I understand that some 15 million eligible voters have been registered. That is a big advance in democratic terms, compared with the tyranny under Saddam Hussein. It must not be allowed to be disrupted or blown apart by terrorist action, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman will agree.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): Gently, may the Father of the House say to the Leader of the House that in parliamentary terms, the answer that he has just given to the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) on Iraq will not quite do? The Leader of the House says the Foreign Secretary will report to the House. It is high time that the views of the House of Commons were not truncated. They should be expressed in a one or preferably a two-day debate. Unlike the hon. Member for North Thanet, I think that it should be held shortly after the elections, rather than before the elections. Last night in Committee Room 12 the World Service gave a presentation, during which Paul Reynolds quoted Sir Jeremy Greenstock, of all people, as saying that the situation in Iraq had become ineradicable and irredeemable—yes, ineradicable and irredeemable. Those are the words that were used. Would it not be a disgrace if the House of Commons did not debate these crucial matters, preferably in the first week in February—and on an amendable motion?

Mr. Hain: I will bear in mind the request from the Father of the House. The Foreign Secretary will be answering questions on 25 January—

Mr. Dalyell: Questions are not good enough!

Mr. Hain: I am sure the Foreign Secretary will want to keep the House informed—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is nice to see that the Father of the House has recovered, that he is well and that he is giving the Speaker a difficult time.

Mr. Hain: I agree. I, too, am delighted to see the Father of the House back. [Interruption.] I do mean it. I have a great deal of respect for him. The more he wants to heckle me, with the Speaker's permission, the happier I will be. I just want to ask him a question. [HON. MEMBERS: "You can't."] I want to raise a point, then, with the Father of the House, in the best spirit. Do we want the elections to proceed or not? Exactly the same arguments were made in respect of Afghanistan. The Afghans have now had their first ever democratic election. It was not perfect, but it is a massive advance for democracy in that region. When the elections take place at the end of the month in Iraq, we will see a massive advance for democracy and a defeat for terrorism. Surely we should make common cause in that objective.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): I understand the Government are keen on job training schemes. Today the Prime Minister is making a speech on the economy and the Chancellor is meeting world leaders. What conclusions can we draw from that?

Mr. Hain: The conclusion we draw is that the Prime Minister and the Chancellor are together facing up to the fact that we as a Government have the most successful economic strategy of any Government in living memory, and that there are big challenges facing our economy in the future because of global pressures—the threat from China, India and other competition from abroad. With our economic stability and success, this Labour Government are taking the economy into a position where Britain can be successful in the world, compared with a Conservative Government, who would throw that success out of the window and risk everything that the British people have worked so hard to achieve in recent years.

Mr. Martin Salter (Reading, West) (Lab): Would the Leader of the House publish the true picture of the impact on Commons catering of the changes in sitting hours that we voted for some two years ago? An awful lot of misinformation is being circulated in order to persuade us to go back to the absurd spectacle of the House voting on laws of the land late into the night. Does my right hon. Friend agree that the opponents of change need to come up with stronger arguments?

Mr. Hain: There will be an opportunity to put the record straight when we debate these matters on 26 January—Wednesday week. It would be good to do so. I am advised that takings in the Refreshment Department are significantly up. I am a great fan of the Members Dining Room and try to get there whenever I can, but the Adjournment restaurant and the Portcullis café arrangements are now much more popular than used to be the case for catering facilities in the House. People's habits are changing. One cannot attribute that entirely to changed sitting hours, but we should make our decision on sitting hours according to what the House of Commons ought to be like in the 21st century, not how it was in Victorian times.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim) (UUP): Since the disappointing and depressing statement made by the Secretary of State on Tuesday, it has emerged that £10 million of the £26 million stolen from the Northern bank in Belfast is in untraceable notes, which is a huge boost to the IRA war chest. Again we see Sinn Fein-IRA giving a two-finger salute to our Government, the Irish Government and the American Government. Democratic parties participating in the House and the people whom they represent in Northern Ireland are outraged at what they perceive as inaction against Sinn Fein-IRA.

Further to the request of my hon. Friend the Member for South Antrim (David Burnside), will the Leader of the House make it possible for us to have an early debate so that we can discuss the criminal activity attributed to Sinn Fein-IRA, and provide the House with an opportunity to offer some constructive suggestions as to how there could be political progress in Northern Ireland which would exclude Sinn Fein from the Executive and cease to punish truly democratic parties? Such a debate would also provide an opportunity for the House to approve suggestions for proper sanctions against Sinn Fein for their illegal, criminal activity.

Mr. Hain: We share the strength of the hon. Gentleman's feelings and all want to see an end to criminal and illegal activity from whatever group or source. Equally, the hon. Gentleman must recognise that Sinn Fein has a significant electoral base. It is a major political party in Northern Ireland. While firmly stamping out illegal or criminal activity by anybody in Northern Ireland, it is important that we find a way of getting the devolved legislature back in business and the peace settlement locked in for good.

Mr. Alan Hurst (Braintree) (Lab): My right hon. Friend may not be aware of the difficulties that commuters on the Harwich to Liverpool Street main line, which passes through my constituency, are experiencing. They have occurred following the change in the franchise from First Great Eastern to a strangely titled company called one, which has implemented a new timetable. Fewer trains run at peak times and arrival and departure times are confused compared with the previous timetable. As a result, trains are more crowded than they were and standing is the order of the day. Given the difficulties, which are a particular problem for my constituents in Kelvedon, will my right hon. Friend instigate an early debate on procedures for proper consultation with season ticket holders before a new railway timetable comes into force?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend makes an interesting point, which he is right to raise on the Floor of the House. I will draw it to the attention of the Secretary of State for Transport, who will see what inquiries he can make and get back to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Sutton Coldfield) (Con): Does the Leader of the House recall the Committee composed of senior Privy Councillors of all parties and from both Houses that reported on the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001 in a document published on 18 December 2003? It unanimously concluded that intercept evidence should be permissible in British courts. Does he further recall that the Government promised to respond to that proposal by early 2004? The White Paper preceding the Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill, "One Step Ahead", promised that their response on intercept evidence would be available to the House by June last year. During the course of the autumn, the then Home Secretary made it clear that the response on that important matter would be with the House by the end of last year.

The Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill is now in Committee, and next Tuesday I hope to move an amendment on behalf of the Opposition to allow intercept evidence to be used in British courts. Does the Leader of the House understand how helpful it would be to the Committee and to the House if the Government were to produce their response on that important matter, which has been delayed for too long?

Mr. Hain: I commend the hon. Gentleman on the thoroughness of his question. I confess that I am not familiar with all the details, but I am sure that the Home Secretary will take those points seriously.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax) (Lab): Those of us who, unlike many Ministers, campaigned for years against Saddam Hussein find the suggestion that because we opposed the war we supported Saddam Hussein deeply insulting. Can we have an urgent debate on the elections? It should be made clear that if the four provinces where most of the violence is occurring do not participate, half the Iraqi electorate will not participate in the election. How can that possibly be free and fair? Is it not time we had a debate on Falluja, where a war crime, for which somebody must be made to answer, has almost certainly occurred?

Mr. Hain: I did not say that my hon. Friend and others who opposed the war necessarily supported Saddam. I said that we must all take account of the fact that, as a result of military action, Saddam's brutal and murderous tyranny, which I acknowledge that she, like me, opposed, is no longer in power, which is a good thing. On the elections, we obviously want every eligible voter to participate. The elections are being organised under terrorist threat, and we cannot allow terrorists to stop them, which would stop the prospect of democracy being entrenched in Iraq, by intimidating some voters and denying them the opportunity to vote. We cannot give in to terrorism and must ensure that democracy progresses as best it can in the difficult circumstances.

Mr. Michael Weir (Angus) (SNP): Has the Leader of the House had an opportunity to consider early-day motion 475, on payroll contributions to the tsunami appeal, which has wide cross-party support?

[That this House notes the concern of aid charities that funds will be more difficult to raise on a continuing basis after the initial publicity surrounding the disaster fades; welcomes the support of many workers and companies for the proposal to donate a day's salary to the Tsunami appeal either in January or throughout the year; notes that such an initiative ensures a continuing flow of funding, attracts gift and relief aid and introduces more people to payroll giving; and further calls on the House authorities to make the facility available to honourable and Right honourable Members to allow them to participate in the continuing campaign in addition to their own existing contributions to constituency and national fundraising.]

In particular, early-day motion 475 includes the suggestion that the House authorities should make available to hon. Members the facility to donate one day's pay to the tsunami appeal through the gift aid scheme. Has the Leader of the House had a chance to take up the matter with the House authorities, and will he make a statement?

Mr. Hain: If any hon. Member wants to make such a donation by means of the payroll, I am sure that the House authorities will help, but I do not want to impose a universal scheme on hon. Members because the level of donation is an individual decision. I am sure that we have all contributed—I have, and I know that the hon. Gentleman has—and we can do that without having our donations docked from our pay. If hon. Members choose to donate in that way, however, I am sure that the House authorities will respond positively to a request from the hon. Gentleman or any other supporter of the motion.

Mr. Iain Luke (Dundee, East) (Lab): Given the upset and outrage felt by many TV licence holders throughout the length and breadth of this country about the screening of the programme, "Jerry Springer—The Opera", on Sunday on BBC2, which has led to an unprecedented level of complaints, will my right hon. Friend find time to debate the standard of programming in the BBC as part of the charter renewal programme?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend has made his point, but the matter is for the BBC. Many hon. Members would criticise me if I said that Ministers should determine the programme content of the BBC, or any other major broadcaster.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): Will the Minister explain why the Government have not yet introduced the animal welfare Bill, which was promised in the Queen's Speech and on which the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs Committee reported in the autumn? Given that the clock is ticking towards a general election, which we expect later this year, will he assure the House that the Government expect that Bill to have completed all parliamentary procedures before the general election?

Mr. Hain: Since I do not know when the general election will be, I cannot possibly give such an assurance. However, our legislative programme is dynamic. We are making enormous progress on Second Readings, in Committee and even on remaining stages, and the animal welfare Bill is part of that process.

Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield) (Lab): May we have an early debate or perhaps a statement from the Chancellor on the child trust fund? I do not want to debate the merits of the fund, which are fairly clear—more than 1,000 children in my constituency are already scheduled to benefit. The matter that needs debating is the future of the fund in the perhaps unlikely event that a Government who were committed to billions of pounds of public expenditure cuts came to power. Could such a Government remove eligibility for the child trust fund not only from future parents and children, but from children who are already in receipt of it? We should consider that important matter of public policy in this House.

Mr. Hain: A debate, perhaps on an Opposition motion and entitled "Baby Bond Stealers", would be very good. If I can find time, I may well be encouraged to arrange such a debate, because the issue is very serious. If the child trust fund were abolished, tens of thousands of youngsters would be deprived of up to £500, and certainly £250, deposited by the taxpayer with the Government's organisation in a bond for life. If we are re-elected, when children reach the age of 17 we will double that deposit and allow relatives to contribute.

Martin Linton (Battersea) (Lab): Seven.

Mr. Hain: Did I say 17? I meant seven. If a different Government came to power and sought to abolish that scheme, would they retrospectively steal that money? The Liberal Democrats in particular must answer that question, because they opposed the child trust fund. The Conservatives have not made their minds up yet, and they are accountable not only to babies, but to all the parents who have benefited from the policy.

Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale) (LD): One of the most pressing issues that currently faces Scottish farmers, which was not raised at Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs questions, is the future of the rural development regulation, which includes about £150 million of associated funding for Scotland. Given the uncertainty about the future of less favoured areas, will the Leader of the House ensure that an early debate occurs, so that we can inform Ministers about the strength of feeling on those issues in Scotland and elsewhere in the UK?

Mr. Hain: I realise the importance of the issue that the hon. Gentleman raises, and the Secretary of State will have carefully noted the points that he made.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that a regulatory reform order on reform of the civil registration service in England and Wales has been rejected by the Regulatory Reform Committee? Among other measures, that would have delivered the right of registration officers to go to an employment tribunal should they be unfairly dismissed. As patron of the Society of Registration Officers, I have campaigned on that matter in this House since 1997. Will my right hon. Friend seek a statement from the Chancellor on how the Treasury will proceed on this now more than urgent matter, which could be dealt with separately from the other reforms that were in the regulatory reform order?

Mr. Hain: I acknowledge my hon. Friend's diligent expertise in this area. The Government are reviewing the reports published by the House of Commons and House of Lords Scrutiny Committees and considering how best to proceed. As part of that process, we are actively consulting the key stakeholders, and I am sure that my hon. Friend will be one of them.

Mr. Andrew Mackay (Bracknell) (Con): How can the Leader of the House possibly justify the Foreign Secretary's not coming to the Dispatch Box in the very week when our American allies have closed down the Iraq survey group and admitted that there were no weapons of mass destruction in Iraq? Does not he realise that if many Members of this House, including me, had known then what we know now, we would not have voted to go to war?

Mr. Hain: Honest differences of opinion are held on the war—I understand that. I do not wish to repeat myself, but this matter was the subject of a detailed statement by the Foreign Secretary last autumn, when he was asked detailed and challenging questions, and there has been nothing new. I think I am right in saying, though I stand to be corrected, that the Iraq survey group has not shut up shop and is doing other work, but there is no question but that it did not find any evidence of weapons of mass destruction—that is not in dispute, and the Government have accepted its conclusions.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): Will my right hon. Friend arrange for a debate or a statement on the proper procedures for the closure of fire stations? The chief fire officer in South Yorkshire proposes to close Mosborough fire station in my constituency. There has been no contact with me or with elected local councillors, no information leaflet for the public, no detailed statement to the press, and no proposal to hold a public meeting. It would be helpful if a Minister came to the House to make a statement on what they would regard as the proper procedures to be gone through on this matter, which concerns and alarms many of my constituents.

Mr. Hain: I am sure that it does concern and alarm my hon. Friend and his constituents. I understand that the consultation period ends on 11 March. However, it is surprising, to me at least, that he has not been properly informed about the matter. I hope that he will take the opportunity to insist that he be properly consulted.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East) (Con): May we have a debate on the financial assistance scheme that the Government have rightly set up to try to help people who have had their pension schemes destroyed as a result of firms going into liquidation? Such a debate would allow us to raise the case of APW Electronics Ltd. in Eastleigh. It has not gone into liquidation, but only because it was able to blackmail its work force into accepting a huge reduction in their pension returns, or else the company would be liquidated. My party has stated that it would use the unclaimed assets in dormant bank and building society accounts to bail out people in such situations. Will the Government do the same?

Mr. Hain: I am sure that that issue was debated during the passage of the Pensions Act 2004 during the previous Session. Through that, the Government have established the Pension Protection Fund, which is a big advance for the future. We have also provided extra funding for those who have been so scandalously robbed of their pensions. However, there will be an opportunity to raise the matter at Department of Trade and Industry questions on 27 January.

Jim Sheridan (West Renfrewshire) (Lab): May I bring my right hon. Friend's attention to early-day motion 425?

[That this House notes the suspension of copyright payments by Littlewoods and Vernons Pools Ltd. to professional football clubs; is concerned about the effect of this loss of income on smaller clubs; and urges the pools companies to resolve the situation as soon as possible.]

The motion refers to the withdrawal of much needed revenue from the football clubs by the pools companies. Some £5 million has been taken out of the beautiful game and put into the players' agents' pockets. That is money that could be used to develop the skills of our youngsters. Will my right hon. Friend ask the appropriate Minister to make representations to the football authorities in order that that money can be kept in the game? After all, if football players want representation with their employers they can join a trade union, like the rest of us.

Mr. Hain: I hope that they do join trade unions like the rest of us; indeed, I encourage all individuals in work to do so. As for the Ministers concerned, I guess that those at the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and possibly the Department of Trade and Industry will want carefully to note the points that my hon. Friend makes.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South) (UUP): We all welcome the response of the world and our own nation and people to the Indian ocean disaster. We have been warned, however, that we should not take our eye off the ball in relation to other ongoing tragedies. May I ask for a statement in the near future from the International Development Secretary on the situation in Montserrat? It is nearly 10 years since the earthquake tragedy there, and some people who were given temporary protective status in the United States have now been told that it will be lifted at the end of February because the situation is no longer temporary but will become permanent. What are we doing as a nation to deal with our own fellow citizens in Montserrat?

Mr. Hain: I will certainly draw that matter to the attention of the Secretary of State.

John Robertson (Glasgow, Anniesland) (Lab): May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to early-day motion 451, which concerns fee charging for ATMs?

[That this House condemns the policy of high street banks to sell off their non-branch based ATM machines; notes that many have been replaced by ATMs which charge an average of £1.50 per withdrawal; further notes that fee-charging ATMs are disproportionately located in poorer areas where few people can afford to travel to free alternatives; is concerned that this is a particular problem for people whose state benefits are paid into their bank accounts, and who are therefore charged simply for receiving their benefits; is disappointed that the Royal Bank of Scotland has not done more to alleviate this problem since it acquired Hanco, which operates around a quarter of all fee-charging ATMs; concurs with the Citizens Advice Bureau and the National Consumer Council, who have criticised the Royal Bank of Scotland for effectively levying a tax on the poor through their actions; further concurs with Gamblers Anonymous, who have criticised Hanco for locating an ATM in an amusement arcade in Glasgow; and calls on the Royal Bank of Scotland and other high street banks to guarantee the future of free withdrawal facilities at ATMs in disadvantaged areas.]

The motion refers to the despicable conduct of the Royal Bank of Scotland, in the guise of Hanco, in charging people £1.50, and sometimes more, in the poorest areas of my constituency. It is attacking the elderly and the poor. There is no problem in the rich parts of the constituency—ATMs are not put in those areas because people there can afford to travel to the free ATMs. Is it not time that we had a debate on this matter, that these finance companies were brought to book, and that rules were established on ATMs, particularly those in areas where the poor and elderly live?

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend raises a very serious point. We are all concerned about this problem, especially as it affects poorer people—especially the elderly, those without cars or those on low incomes—who, as he implies, may not have the necessary transport to get to a bank to draw out money free of charge. That is a serious matter that the Minister concerned will want to consider carefully.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West) (Con): The value-added league tables published today show very clearly not only that grammar schools have been more effective than comprehensive schools but that selective education systems, such as the one in my borough of Trafford, achieve better results than comprehensive systems across the country. May we have a statement from the Government setting out how they might change their policy in order to withdraw some of their discriminatory policies against grammar schools? In particular, can grammar schools be allowed to expand where they are successful and parents want it, as other schools can?

Mr. Hain: As the hon. Gentleman knows, we have encouraged diversity. Indeed, specialist schools, although criticised when they were first proposed, have been hugely successful. What we see across the board under this Government is the record investment that is going into schools, with the recruitment of tens of thousands more teachers and classroom assistants, investment in IT equipment, and a steady rise in standards compared with the dismal record of Conservative Governments. I should have thought that that was the issue that the hon. Gentleman should focus on; it is certainly that on which the electors will decide when it comes to the general election.

David Taylor (North West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): I found the Leader of the House's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke) deeply disappointing. Has he seen early-motion 488, which concerns "Jerry Springer—the Opera" and was tabled by the hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Donaldson) and signed by several Members, including me?

[That this House regards with dismay the decision by the BBC to broadcast Jerry Springer—The Opera on BBC2, causing widespread offence to Christians and those of other faiths by its mocking portrayal of Jesus Christ, Holy Communion and some of the central tenets of the Christian faith; condemns the show's juvenile and offensive use of repeated profanity in an attempt at humour; further notes that it is particularly serious that the show should have been transmitted by the publicly-funded national broadcaster and questions whether it places the Corporation in breach of its Charter; laments the arrogant dismissal of Christian concerns by the content of programmes aired by the BBC; and calls on the Government publicly to rebuke the corporation for its attack on the religion adhered to by over 70 per cent. of the UK population and for its lowest common denominator approach to ethics in its attempts to chase ratings.]

Anyone who saw that programme will have been dismayed by its unremittingly juvenile, offensive and blasphemous content. Is it not the case that the BBC, as its ratings go downhill, is taking the lowest-common-denominator approach to that? Does not this House have a role to play in reacting to that, not dismissing it as did the Leader of the House in his reply to my hon. Friend?

Mr. Hain: I understand the passion with which my hon. Friend expresses his point. I do not seek to dismiss anything but I do not think that it is for me, as Leader of the House, to pronounce on a specific programme or to set standards. That is a matter for the BBC, which needs to bear in mind feelings in the House of Commons and among the public. I am sure that the director-general will register my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): Is it possible to hold a debate on the consequences of maladministration in the tax credit system, especially its effect on many of my constituents and others, who were overpaid by the system through no fault of their own and are now having money recovered from them? Does the Leader of the House appreciate that people who are by definition on low incomes find it difficult when that income is reduced still further by having to pay back money that they have spent in good faith on the upkeep of their families?

Mr. Hain: Of course the Government are concerned about any instances of maladministration but I am not sure about the point that the hon. Gentleman is trying to make. Surely he should praise the Government's introduction of tax credits, which have benefited millions of hard-working families and individuals. If I am right, the Liberal Democrats did not support or vote for that proposal. The electors will want to bear that in mind because millions of people on low incomes have benefited. In addition, people have been brought into work when perhaps it would not have been worth their while to work previously. That has led to high employment and a lower cost to the public purse for benefit payments.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): May we please have a debate on Darfur, western Sudan? Given that the African Union force is clearly not preventing the mass murder of innocent civilians in Darfur, that violence now afflicts the internally displaced persons camps, and that the Janjaweed militias continue to run riot, does the right hon. Gentleman accept that a debate in Government time in the main Chamber would allow hon. Members to argue that the international community has a moral duty to act now, not through a monitoring force but by the despatch of a substantial peacekeeping force, which alone will allow us to stop the slaughter there before it is too late?

Mr. Hain: The hon. Gentleman is a more passionate spokesman on those matters than anyone else on the Conservative Benches and the House welcomes that. He makes an important series of points and the Government acknowledge them. We shall certainly bear them in mind and I shall ensure that both the Secretary of State for International Development and the Foreign Secretary are aware of the points that he has raised today.

Points of Order

1.32 pm

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am aware that a Committee of the House can investigate complaints by hon. Members about the answering of written parliamentary questions. However, owing to my latest experience, may I ask you to review whether the procedure assists us in implementing Standing Orders?

On 8 November, I tabled a named day question to the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs but as it had not received a reply at Prorogation, it fell. I was obliged to retable the same named day question in the current Session. I did that on 6 December. It is important because the question relates to the possible cause of the 2001 outbreak of foot and mouth. I asked the Secretary of State,

"for what reason the Northumberland Trading Standards video of Burnside Farm at the time of the 2001 foot and mouth disease outbreak was not submitted to the Anderson Inquiry."

I have phoned the Department and said that I now require the answer. It has had two months in which to reply to a simple, factual question, yet it continues to deny me an answer. I ask not only whether the Department, through your offices, will answer my question, but whether you will personally take another look at the way in which Members' questions are answered across Government. We have named day questions for a purpose and I should like to believe that some improvement will occur.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. Lady for raising the matter with me. First things first: if she sends me all the relevant papers, I will investigate the matter and get back to her.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Since 1945, the convention in this place has been that what is described as a first-class constitutional Bill is committed to the Floor of the House for its Committee stage. The Government have followed that procedure on all Bills of substance about the constitution—for example, the Scotland Bill, the Government of Wales Bill and measures on our relationship with Europe. Part of the proceedings on some borderline Bills that have definitional issues have been held Upstairs. However, on all the major constitutional Bills, that has not happened.

On 7 May 1997, Madam Speaker ruled that a constitutional Bill had to be debated in the Chamber. If the Leader of the House wishes to take a different stance and change the convention, should he not make a statement in the House and allow questions from hon. Members of all parties? The matter is important because on a measure such as the Constitutional Reform Bill, which deals with the separation of powers, the role of our courts and of the Lord Chancellor and so on, we might be unable to consider provisions such as the appointment of judges in Northern Ireland, which appear late in the Bill, on the Floor of the House. It would be wrong not to deal with such a matter on the Floor.

Mr. Speaker: That is a matter for the House after Second Reading, which will take place on Monday. I hope that that helps the hon. Gentleman.

DELEGATED LEGISLATION

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 118(6) (Standing Committees on Delegated Legislation),

PRISONS

That the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998 (Specified Organisations) Order 2004 (S.I., 2004, No. 3009), dated 14th November 2004, a copy of which was laid before this House on 17th November, in the last Session of Parliament, be approved.—[Margaret Moran.]

Question agreed to.

Orders of the Day

Consumer Credit Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

1.36 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Gerry Sutcliffe): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill is the final stage in the most significant reform of domestic consumer credit law in almost 30 years. It caps the work begun by the former Minister with responsibility for competition and consumers, now the Minister for Public Health, who initiated the wide-ranging consumer credit review. Today, the Bill marks a major step forward towards a fairer, clearer consumer credit market for the 21st century. It will offer benefits to consumers and industry and fulfil our manifesto commitments.

I am pleased to say that, with so much support from hon. Members of all parties and their welcome for the Bill and the White Paper that preceded it, the measure will empower and protect consumers. It will increase competition and equip the credit sector to meet the challenges of the modern marketplace.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge) (Lab): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way so early in his speech, but those of us who are in Committee have to take what opportunities we can.

Will it be possible during the Bill's passage to introduce provisions to give the Secretary of State the power to put a ceiling on interest rates? My hon. Friend knows that some constituents are unwittingly led into credit agreements incurring interest rates and charges that can exceed 300 per cent. If such a provision cannot be included in the Bill, will he at least ensure that the measure provides for secondary legislation so that one could be introduced in future?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I understand my hon. Friend's problem with the Committee sittings this afternoon. I shall refer to ceilings on interest rates shortly but I give him the commitment that although we will not include such powers in the Bill, we shall keep the issue under review, for reasons that I shall mention later. I am sure that my hon. Friend will get a copy of Hansard and I am happy to meet him to talk about the matter.

We did not embark on reviewing and amending the consumer credit law lightly. The scope of the markets that we are considering is huge and the United Kingdom has one of the most highly developed credit markets in the world. We represent a quarter of the EU credit market generally and more than half of the EU credit card market. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer said in his pre-Budget report last month that we had the best combination of low inflation, low unemployment and rising living standards for decades.

With the achievement of that macroeconomic stability, to which the Government committed themselves, we have enjoyed interest rates at a level not experienced since the 1950s. I understand that the Monetary Policy Committee said today that rates are to remain unchanged. Those rates have brought about improved access to affordable credit for consumers across the country, and the benefits of affordable credit are plain to see. When it is used effectively, a combination of sensible borrowing and saving enables consumers to enjoy the freedom that credit gives: freedom to improve their home, to take a holiday, or to buy the car that they need for work or family use.

However, one in eight households still have arrears on either consumer credit or household bills, with all the strain on families, on health and on well-being that that level of debt can bring. Sometimes, the effect can be even worse. We have heard hon. Members tell the House about tragic suicides related to debt. I have no doubt that in all hon. Members' constituencies, there will be casework that shows the level of abuse by unscrupulous lenders who prey on the vulnerable, and on the poorly informed consumer. I know that there are such cases in mine. They highlight the real human misery that underlies the statistics on debt.

More than half the households that are over-indebted have an income of less than £7,500 a year. I heard of one couple, both of whom suffered from mental illness, who were persuaded to take out a loan of £500. Within 12 months, the same lender had pressured them into taking out a further 10 loans, leaving them with a total debt of more than £5,000. That was 10 times the amount that they had originally agreed. The couple also owed another £19,000 to other lenders. Most importantly, they had no means to repay any of these loans. Thankfully, the couple were offered assistance by a local support organisation, and I am pleased to be able to tell the House that the debt was written off.

No humane society can stand by and do nothing to prevent this sort of predatory lending. We certainly could not, and we are not going to. That is why this Government are committed to toughening the laws to combat rogue traders, unfair terms in contracts, and loan sharks who prey on the vulnerable and use despicable tactics to ensnare their victims. But this commitment cannot be fulfilled by new legislation alone. Building a credit market for the future means not only legislating for consumers but working with them.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): Is it not important that, as well as introducing this legislation, the Government encourage people who need to borrow money to go not to the loan sharks but to credit unions? These provide a very good way for people to borrow at fair and reasonable prices, and allow them to understand fully what they are committing themselves to.

Mr. Sutcliffe: My hon. Friend has pre-empted what I am going to say later. He is right to say that credit unions have a tremendous role to play. In the Chancellor's pre-Budget report, £120 million was given for a financial inclusion fund. The Bill needs to be seen in the context of all the other work that is going on in the Treasury, the Treasury Select Committee and the Financial Services Authority. This Bill is not just about credit; it is about the whole issue of financial inclusion.

Angela Eagle (Wallasey) (Lab): I want to give a great welcome to the Bill. However, there is something rather odd in it that I want to ask my hon. Friend about, as he has been talking about extortionate credit. I want to ask him about the very unusual presence in the Bill of a maximum fine of £50,000 for those who are discovered dealing in extortionate credit, in contravention of the terms of their licence. It is very unusual to see such a maximum set down in a Bill rather than in secondary legislation. Will my hon. Friend consider this matter very carefully? It is 30 years since the Consumer Credit Act 1974 was put on the statute book, and it seems wholly inappropriate to fix in the Bill a fine for this despicable behaviour of which many of us, on the Labour Benches at least, have had direct experience through people visiting our constituency surgeries. These people have been viciously exploited by the sellers of extortionate credit.

Mr. Sutcliffe: My hon. Friend is right; all hon. Members will be aware of such cases. On the question of the £50,000 fine, there are issues relating to licensing regimes and the powers of the Office of Fair Trading, and a balanced approach must be taken. If my hon. Friend is lucky enough to serve on the Standing Committee, she will be able to probe and develop some of the reasons why the figure was set at that amount. There is a serious point relating to that, and I shall return to it in more detail if time permits.

We need to work with consumers. We also need to work with the industry to produce this legislation, to ensure that, together, the Government and the industry can provide information so that people can make informed choices and, more importantly, get help when things go wrong. We must also work with the regulators as well as legislating for them, to ensure that they have better, more appropriate powers to obtain information. That is what we are doing.

A good example of that is the cross-government strategy to tackle over-indebtedness. "Tackling Over-indebtedness—Action Plan 2004" sets out seven strategic priorities, and the 10 partnership priorities necessary to achieve them. The Government are working in partnership with consumer bodies, the credit industry, regulators, the voluntary sector and academia to address this problem. We are working together to increase the availability of affordable credit for vulnerable consumers, particularly those on low incomes; to ensure that timely and appropriate free debt advice is available for those who need it; and to improve the financial capability of consumers to ensure that they can make informed decisions about their borrowing.

Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): On the question of informed decisions, does my hon. Friend recognise that, when comparisons are made between the charges for one credit card and another, it is virtually impossible for consumers to get an accurate impression because of the different ways in which the different companies collect their charges? Has he seen the proposals from the Consumers Association and Which? for a standardised method for the collection of credit card interest? This would enable consumers to make a proper comparison between the annual percentage rates of the different cards.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention and I congratulate him on the work that he does in Sheffield and elsewhere on these issues. In regulations flowing from the White Paper, the Government introduced a uniform calculation of the APR. We talk about responsible lending and borrowing, but the difficulty arises because there are so many different charges that can be included in APRs and the like. It is important that clear and transparent information should be given to the consumer, not only when the agreement is signed but throughout its lifetime.

[Mr. Sutcliffe]

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton) (Con): Does the Minister agree that, when people get into financial difficulties and need advice, the sooner they seek that advice, the better? One of the most accessible places for them to go is their local citizens advice bureau. Does the Minister share my concern that, as a result of local government settlements and grants, there are worries about the viability of some of our CABs and about their ability to give this important advice locally?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I acknowledge the hon. Lady's concern about CABs. She will be aware that the Department of Trade and Industry finances much of their work through national funding. Perhaps, however, she should have words with Members on her own Front Bench about future public spending issues. Clearly, if there were to be cuts in public spending, services such as those provided by the CABs would be at risk.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Is not one of the difficulties that many people take out a loan or get a new credit card without taking any advice? They do not talk to anyone about it. Instead, they pick up one of the 25 letters that they received through the post just before Christmas asking them if they would like a new credit card and are told that they are guaranteed to get a card and that they can have an advance of up to £3,000. Alternatively, they are sent a little cheque that tells them that they have £3,000 to spend. That is irresponsible lending. Those letters are unsolicited, and they offer guaranteed, pre-approved credit.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I was fortunate enough to be in the Chamber yesterday when my hon. Friend asked the Prime Minister a question on this subject. I am not going to be prescriptive about this, because if I were to give my interpretation of these matters, it could present a problem when we need to deal with dispute resolution and with the courts making decisions. The Bill makes provision for an unfair credit test, and that will involve the need to consider each individual case as it comes along.

On the question of credit card cheques, the banking code—the remit of the banks to work under a code of practice—is to be changed from April 2005, and an updated version covering the use of credit card cheques and the question of who they should go to will be a step in the right direction. I shall be monitoring that issue, and I know that the Treasury Select Committee is looking into it as well.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): Following up that point, is there not a further concern that many people take up these offers without making the calculation as to whether a credit card—as opposed to a bank loan or some other mechanism—is the appropriate means of raising the funds that they need? Should there not be an obligation on credit providers to advise people that other, cheaper options exist, instead of simply soliciting their custom without giving them any advice or warning them that they might have to pay a much higher interest charge than they need to?

Mr. Sutcliffe: That goes to the heart of the issues of clarity, transparency and people making sure that they know what they are letting themselves in for. While the argument is about responsible lending, it is also about responsible borrowing, not just for the short term but for the lifetime of agreements.

Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington) (Lab): My hon. Friend has just mentioned forthcoming changes in the banking code. Does he accept, however, that the changes envisaged in that code in relation to credit card cheques will not deal with the unsolicited issuing of those cheques? The White Paper, that his Department produced last year cites as an example of irresponsible lending the unsolicited issuing of credit card cheques, yet I cannot find any measure in the Bill to deal with that.

Mr. Sutcliffe: My hon. Friend is right. He is a distinguished member of the Select Committee, before which I had the honour to appear recently to discuss credit card issues. It has done a tremendous amount of work on credit cards. I think that the banking code is the appropriate route for addressing the issue, but I will keep the matter under review during the lifetime of discussions on the Bill I hope that he will be satisfied with that.

Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North) (Lab): I want to take my hon. Friend back to what he said about DTI funding for financial support and advice. In Northampton, our CAB's money advice work was paid for by lottery funding, which has come to end, so nobody is doing that work now. Funding for such incredibly welcome and important work needs to be enshrined in statute, because people need to be able to exercise their right to seek such advice. Will the DTI therefore consider whether there is a proper national spread of available financial advice?

Mr. Sutcliffe: It is important to praise the work of CABs, but others, including industry bodies, local government bodies and a variety of other voluntary sector organisations, also offer financial advice. We will be looking to use some of the £120 million in the financial inclusion fund for debt advice and support. I want to make sure that easy access to such advice is available across the UK. People who find themselves with debt problems tend to leave it too late before they seek advice, and I hope that, as a result of this Bill and other work, people will know better where to go for advice and support. As a result of the Bill, people will be able to get out of unfair agreements.

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): I want to return briefly to the issue of credit card cheques. Will the Minister at least consider requiring credit card companies to make it absolutely clear, in bold letters, that the moment those cheques are presented, they cost the customer interest? I regard myself as a person of average financial sophistication, and yet I have fallen foul of that practice.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt). These are serious issues, which I am prepared to examine, but this Bill may not be the appropriate vehicle for that change. I know that the industry will monitor closely what is said in the debate today and in Committee. One of the good things to note is that the industry has welcomed change—it recognises that the 1974 Act is 30 years out of date, that people's attitude to credit has changed dramatically, and that it needs to acknowledge the thoughts and views of the consumer. That is the balance that we are trying to strike.

As I said, the first Act was introduced in 1974, and at that time, there was one credit card carrying a total debt of around £32 million at today's prices. It took six years to put in place the detail of the 1974 Act. We have been criticised for taking some time to prepare the Bill, but I make no apology for that, because it is a complex marketplace, and very important to the economy.

Mr. Iain Luke (Dundee, East) (Lab): I congratulate the Minister and his team on introducing this Bill and on the consultation process. Is he aware that there is an anomaly in relation to the time orders, on which there is a difference between Scotland and England and Wales? Obviously, the CAB in Scotland would be glad if time orders in Scotland were brought into line with those relating to England and Wales. Will he undertake to consider that in Committee?

Mr. Sutcliffe: The time order is an interesting, useful tool on which we need to do a great deal of work, for which the Bill provides. I will consider the various representations from the CAB in Scotland and elsewhere on how we can make the time orders most effective. I shall now try to make some progress with my speech.

We can see from the interventions by Members from across the House how important this Bill is to our constituents and to the credit industry. We were careful to consult at every stage. We could not have reached today's position without the continued support of all stakeholders: business, consumer groups and regulators. I thank all those who helped to get this legislation right.

Important though it is, the Consumer Credit Bill is not the whole picture. The Bill builds on the success of the consumer credit White Paper that we published a year ago. We have been doing considerable work with other organisations on many fronts. We have produced new regulations for credit advertisements, enabling consumers to shop around with confidence and to choose the best credit product to suit their needs. We have increased transparency across the sector by legislating for consumers to receive information before they sign up to an agreement. We have standardised the way in which APRs are calculated, so that consumers can compare the costs of credit deals with confidence. We know that many people found that a confusing issue—it was an issue to which the Treasury Committee devoted a lot of time, and we too are addressing it.

We have ensured that consumers are given clear, up-front information in the agreements themselves, in print which people do not need a microscope to read. We have introduced a fairer deal for consumers who want to settle their loans early. We have brought forward new rules enabling consumers to conclude agreements electronically, increasing financial inclusion across the sector. We have worked with colleagues in other Departments to provide regulations that ensure that consumers are protected when signing agreements away from business premises.

The Bill is therefore just part of our vision to provide protection for consumers in a fair, clear and competitive credit market. The Bill has three main themes: improving rights and redress, improving the regulation of consumer credit businesses, and ensuring appropriate regulation.

The current tools available to consumers for obtaining redress or solving credit disputes are, at best, limited. Where there is a dispute, consumers are often restricted to court action—a costly and time-consuming process. Where consumers are trapped in unfair agreements or subject to unfair behaviour, the current rules do not provide for adequate redress. I am sure that all Members are well aware of recent high-profile examples, such as the judgment last month in the case of London North Securities v. Meadows, in which an original loan of £5,000 soared to a debt of £384,000. Last month, the judge ruled that the agreement was unenforceable, partly because its terms were extortionate and failed to state correctly the terms of the loan. I am aware that the lender has appealed, and we await the outcome.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): I congratulate my hon. Friend on introducing this long overdue measure, and colleagues in all parts of the House on ensuring that the measure was brought before the House today and not delayed. If the Bill is passed, extortionate rates of interest can no longer be levied on future loans, but schedule 3 also includes a welcome provision for those of us whose constituents currently have problems, to ensure that the courts can reconsider existing agreements during the transitional period. Constituents such as one of mine, Mr. Frederick Jones, of whom the Minister is well aware, need that redress. Will he be open in Committee to the idea of ensuring that that transitional period is brought forward, so that my constituents, and those of many other Members in all parts of the House, can get that redress early rather than having to wait at least two years?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I thank my hon. Friend for his compliments on the work carried out, but as I said, that work has been done by major stakeholders across the range. We are able to examine the possibility of retrospection because lenders themselves realise that their position and reputations are put in jeopardy when such cases come to the fore. I am sure that in Committee we can consider the detail of how best to use that provision to benefit consumers.

Mr. Michael Weir (Angus) (SNP): Following on from that point, one of my concerns is that while cases such as Meadows raise an anomaly, the court case deals with only the particular problem of that constituent or lender. I presume that the company has offered such loans to many other customers, who may not, for various reasons, have come to court, but who are in the same position. There seems to be no provision for forcing companies to allow some of their other lending activities to be examined. Would such a provision be feasible?

Mr. Sutcliffe: If the hon. Gentleman reads the Bill carefully, he will see that there is such provision in the form of the unfair credit test and the alternative dispute resolution procedure. We are improving the position, although if we find during the Bill's progress that further improvements are possible, we shall consider them. I believe that the reason why so few cases are brought is the high hurdle presented by the extortionate credit test. Lowering it by introducing an unfair credit test will improve things. I have already mentioned penalties, and the effect on the reputations of companies that do not act responsibly and fairly. The Bill gives the Office of Fair Trading powers to review the lifetime of licences that are approved.

As Members have pointed out, the Meadows case represents a rare success for the consumer. Consumers should have the right to challenge unfairness where it exists, and obtain redress when that is appropriate. The Bill, as I said, introduces a mandatory alternative dispute resolution system giving consumers a fast and effective procedure, without the need to resort to court action immediately. It will be run by the Financial Ombudsman Service, which is experienced in dealing with disputes of this kind, and it will provide an impartial ruling in any circumstances in which a lender's internal complaints procedure has been exhausted. Consumers will be able to challenge unfair agreements more effectively, and competition will be increased throughout the sector.

As I also said, the Bill will replace the out-of-date extortionate credit test with a new test based on the principle of unfairness. That will enable consumers to exercise rights that have previously been out of their reach. Consumers will be able to apply to the courts to reopen agreements involving an unfair credit relationship. The system will require consideration of all aspects of a transaction, including the lender's conduct in administering the loan. It will also give the courts a wider discretion to assist those who are unfairly treated by lenders.

Provisions on unfair relationships will act as an incentive for lenders who might exploit consumers to behave fairly, which will result in increased and effective competition throughout the market. Consumers will be empowered to challenge unfairness where it exists, and obtain redress when that is appropriate.

Empowering consumers by increasing their ability to challenge unfair agreements is our first aim, but consumers must also be confident that they are borrowing money from responsible lenders. Our second aim, therefore, is to improve the regulation of consumer credit businesses. The amount of work currently involved in licence renewal, together with the OFT's limited information-gathering powers and the lack of intermediate sanctions, hampers the OFT in both its running of the licensing regime and its policing of licence holders. The Bill will give it more powers, enabling it to obtain the information that it needs to ascertain and monitor the fitness of firms.

Overhauling the licensing regime will create more categories of licence, and will introduce indefinite standard licences, together with an improved fitness test based on the credit competence of licensees. The result will be a more streamlined, more targeted system that is more appropriate for the modern credit market.

Reducing the burden of bureaucracy on both industry and the OFT will also ensure that lenders acting unfairly are prevented from continuing and, if necessary, excluded from the market, that responsible lenders can be regulated by light-touch regulation, and that consumers can have confidence in a competitive market.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud) (Lab/Co-op): Will my hon. Friend give way briefly?

Mr. Sutcliffe: I will, but I need to make some progress.

Mr. Drew: My hon. Friend is being very generous with his time.

I know that cold calling per se is illegal, but the excellent "debt on our doorstep" campaign—no doubt my hon. Friend has engaged in plenty of consultation with its members—has brought to our attention the way in which sellers use shopping vouchers and go on to estates, especially at Christmas, trying to induce people to buy without clarifying their rights. Could that practice be dealt with more effectively?

Mr. Sutcliffe: That is not covered by the Bill, but as the Minister with responsibility for consumers, I am looking into doorstep selling. The OFT has produced a report on which we have consulted, and we will make recommendations in the near future on the whole issue of cold calling. My hon. Friend may know that the Competition Commission is examining the home credit market following a referral by the OFT. A great deal of work is being done to ensure that consumers are protected.

Consumers often suffer because of lack of information during the lifetime of a loan. Under the current regime they are often surprised by arrears or default fees, or are not told when they are behind with payments. The Bill will make lenders tell consumers when they default and when they are charged.

Ms Keeble: I believe that that applies only to longer-term debts. Will my hon. Friend consider making similar provisions to cover shorter-term debts, and to prevent debts from being rolled over year after year? People may find loopholes in the Bill as it stands.

Mr. Sutcliffe: We think that the balance is right in the Bill. It will deal with burdens on business, and ensure that products that should remain in the marketplace are retained there.

Keeping consumers informed is an essential part of being a responsible lender. Consumers must know exactly what their debt is. The more informed consumers are, the more aware they will be of whether a product is appropriate for them. Improving the standard of regulation, however, will be of no use if regulation does not do the job for which it was designed. The Bill's third aim is to ensure that regulation is appropriate and measured, ensuring comprehensive protection for consumers while allowing industry the flexibility to innovate.

The Bill does ensure comprehensive protection, extending the protections in the 1974 Act to all consumer borrowing by removing the £25,000 financial limit above which consumer borrowing is not currently protected. It is appropriate and measured, maintaining the protections for business lending under £25,000. It allows industry the flexibility to innovate with an exemption for high net worth borrowers, enabling them to opt out of regulation. But lenders must also be confident that they are operating on a level playing field. The Bill makes the provisions in section 127 of the Act, on the enforceability of defective agreements, more proportionate. The remedy reflects the detriment.

Passing discretion to the courts will not remove consumer protection, because agreements can still be found unenforceable, but it will increase fairness across the sector and allow lenders to compete on the basis of best practice.

During our extensive consultations, we considered many other proposals. I am aware of campaigns to introduce an interest rate ceiling, which my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) mentioned earlier. The Government commissioned research on international practices, and decided not to introduce a ceiling in the UK credit market at this stage. We are not convinced that such ceilings help the consumers whom they are intended to protect. I stand by that decision, but as I told my hon. Friend, we are committed to keeping the matter under review.

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West) (Lab): I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who has allowed many interventions. I join those who have given the Bill a warm welcome. I am particularly pleased about what it will do not just for those with credit cards, but for those in the sub-prime lending market—the poorest of the poor, who pay the most.

Having campaigned for the Bill, should the Minister not include in it a power enabling him to act on the basis of his review of whether a cap on interest rates and charges is necessary? If he leaves that open, we may have to wait another 30 years for more primary legislation to get to grips with the issue.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his work in the all-party poverty group and on behalf of the "debt on our doorstep" campaign. I know that we disagree about interest-rate ceilings, although I will keep the matter under review. I do not think that taking powers through the Bill will help at this stage, but I am happy to discuss what might be done. I hope that it will not be 30 years before the Bill is reviewed, because the issues affect our constituents. We must ensure that people are treated fairly.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): My hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) mentioned credit unions. I declare my interest as a member of the board of the Money Tree credit union in north-west Leicestershire. Does the Minister accept that credit unions have shown the way forward with interest rate capping, in that the loan rate used is capped at 1 per cent. per month and has been for a very long time? They do have a transparent, equitable and open approach to this subject.

Mr. Sutcliffe: On interest rate ceilings, which we can discuss in more detail in Committee, difficulties can arise in terms of what is included in the annual percentage rate. Hidden charges for late payment, for example, can be left out and the situation can become unclear. We will doubtless discuss the detail of the pros and cons of interest rate ceilings in Committee, but I acknowledge the work of credit unions. Part of the difficulty for some credit unions in trying to get people to save has been that they are unable to get access to credit for 12 weeks. We have looked at using the social fund and the new financial inclusion fund to assist credit unions in their efforts to help those who need early access to credit.

The Bill will empower consumers and encourage fair standards throughout the industry, and it drives forward an agenda based on responsible lending and responsible borrowing. It equips the UK credit sector to continue to lead in its field not only in Europe, but across the rest of the world, and it sends the direct message to the industry that for those who act dishonestly or unfairly, there is nowhere to hide. Our loan shark pilots are a prime example of this. But responsibility cuts both ways. Consumers have a responsibility to take control of their finances, to use credit sensibly, and to seek support and advice at the earliest opportunity when it is needed. The industry has a responsibility to provide consumers with the information that they need; to ensure that when it lends, it lends responsibly; and to make sure that support is available when customers get into difficulties.

We said that we wanted to improve rights and redress for consumers; the Consumer Credit Bill will provide for this. We said that we wanted to improve the regulation of consumer credit businesses; the Consumer Credit Bill will achieve this. We said that we wanted to ensure appropriate regulation across the market; the Consumer Credit Bill will secure this. It has been broadly welcomed and I commend it to the House.

2.12 pm

Mr. Stephen O'Brien (Eddisbury) (Con): I note that the Minister hopes, with the leave of the House, to have time to make a further contribution in the wind-up. He will therefore have two bites of the cherry, so I have a number of questions to which I hope he can give an answer today, perhaps with the assistance of those in the Box, if required.

This is one of only two Department of Trade and Industry Bills in the Queen's Speech, the other being the Bill on equality, for which no publication date has been given. The Bill before us is therefore the only current DTI Bill, so it is somewhat surprising that the Secretary of State is not here to present her Department's flagship Bill. The Minister did not apologise for her absence. As he knows, this is not the first time that she has not deigned to come to the House.

Mr. Sutcliffe: The Secretary of State is in India on Government business. As the hon. Gentleman says, this is an important Bill, on which we have consulted widely, and I should point out that the DTI has confidence in its whole ministerial team. Strangely enough, under the Liberal Democrats, who want to do away with the DTI, or the Conservatives, who are not entirely sure how much spending they would allocate to it, we would not have a Bill such as this.

Mr. O'Brien: I am grateful for the Minister's explanation. I hasten to add that I meant no disrespect to him; I very much enjoy working with him—and sometimes at him—at the Dispatch Box. It would have been helpful to know that the Secretary of State was not listed to appear, and that today's arrangements were pre-planned. I am somewhat relieved to hear that she did not have to choose between being in London with the Prime Minister or in Africa with the Chancellor; instead, she decided to strike out on her own and go to India. [Interruption.] Labour Members clearly do not like being reminded of the proper courtesies of the House.

People have always wanted things that they cannot immediately afford, and there will always be others on hand with money to lend to them—at a cost. We cannot at all times follow Polonius's famous injunction in "Hamlet" to "Neither a borrower, nor a lender be".

[Interruption.] Polonius, who was an old man, was indeed struck through after giving that sensible advice to a boy. Let us hope that no attempt is made to strike through this Bill, because as the Minister knows, it enjoys broad support.

As the former chairman of the National Consumer Council, Baroness Wilcox, has written,

"Many people are forced by necessity to borrow, sometimes on contracts that they do not understand, and at rates that realistically they may not be able to afford."

For precisely that reason, a previous Conservative Government introduced the Consumer Credit Act 1974. It regulates consumer credit and consumer hire agreements for amounts up to £25,000, and lays down rules covering the form and content of agreements; credit advertising; the method of calculating the annual percentage rate of the total charge for credit; the procedures to be adopted in the event of default, termination, or early settlement; and extortionate credit bargains. The Act also requires all traders who make regulated agreements to obtain licences from the Office of Fair Trading.

Of course, since the early 1970s markets for consumer credit have expanded significantly. Liberalisation of financial markets in the 1980s and shifting attitudes towards consumer credit have since contributed to an environment of greater financial sophistication. In 1971 one type of credit card was available. Today there are more than 1,300. Unsurprisingly, however, such rapid evolution of the consumer credit market has not occurred without serious consumer casualties along the way. The signs are that the number of casualties is increasing, not declining, under an increasingly outdated legislative framework.

According to the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux,

"The number of debt related problems dealt with by Citizens Advice Bureaux has risen sharply in recent years, growing by about 75 per cent. since 1997."

I would like to congratulate the outstanding citizens advice bureau in Winsford, in my constituency. It has helped many people, particularly those in very challenged social and economic circumstances who have already got into debt problems. In response to an earlier intervention, the Minister made the important point that citizens advice bureaux are not the only organisations giving advice on debt; others also offer advice to such people before insurmountable debt problems arise. However, CABs are among the best organisations for offering advice to those who have already incurred the debt from which they must extract themselves.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Ochil) (Lab): In the light of the praise that the hon. Gentleman is showering on CABs, can he assure us that they would not be subject to the proposed economies and savings in Government expenditure on which Mr. James and others are advising the Conservatives?

Mr. O'Brien: As usual, the hon. Gentleman makes a partisan point. I had hoped that, as Chairman of the Trade and Industry Committee, he would make an impartial one. Just as the Government have initiated the Gershon efficiency savings review, so the James report is advising the Conservative party. However, that report adopts a much more rigorous, bottom-up approach to efficiency savings. Whether the assurance that the hon. Gentleman seeks can be given will be determined by my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor. I am sure that where efficiency savings can be made, they will be made. No test would conclude that CABs should be cut, so I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not trying to suggest that the James review would recommend doing so.

Angela Eagle: All Members will join the hon. Gentleman in paying tribute to the great work that CABs do. In its briefing to Members for Second Reading, NACAB says that the £50,000 limit on fines for those who contravene the terms of their licence and deal in unfair or extortionate credit agreements ought to go. As the hon. Gentleman has spent the past few minutes praising CABs, and in the light of their expertise and experience, does he agrees with that assessment that the £50,000 limit ought not to be included in the Bill, and should go?

Mr. O'Brien: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for raising that point. I heard her previous intervention on the Minister, and she raises a fair question about putting the ceiling in the Bill. It is not unprecedented, but it is not common. We all work closely with the CAB in our surgeries and have a great deal of respect for it, particularly on debt issues. My hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury (Mr. Robertson) will be leading for us in Committee, and I am sure that he will deal with that matter and explore it in greater detail.

The challenge for policy makers is to ensure that consumers are, in the words of Baroness Wilcox, "in control" of the credit they take. Consumer choice is rightly a fundamental principle of a free market economy and consumers must be able to exercise their choice responsibly on the basis of full information that will apply for the life of the contract, not just at the time of the initial transaction. That is particularly the case for people on relatively low incomes. If their choices and obligations are not made easier to understand, they will continue to suffer the increasing financial exclusion that has escalated during the last seven years. It happens that, under a Labour Government, the gap between rich and poor has significantly widened.

Like the citizens advice bureaux and the National Consumer Council, the official Opposition welcome in principle the Bill's aims of cracking down on loan sharks and unscrupulous lenders, helping consumers challenge unfair credit agreements, and making credit agreements more transparent and understandable. We must bear in mind the fact that the vast majority of consumers handle credit sensibly, and for them the credit market is an important aspect of managing their affairs. Those on low incomes tend to be more vulnerable to the vicissitudes of financial fortune, and I pay tribute to the many Church organisations, charities, local government organisations and other groups, as well as the CAB, for the important work that they do on behalf of people on low incomes in their communities. It is vital unrelenting work of almost immeasurable worth to society as a whole, let alone to the individuals and families concerned. A prime example is the Royal United Kingdom Beneficent Association.

When we legislate, we must be careful not to confuse the fact of debt with the cause of debt, and we should not lose sight of the growing evidence that the primary cause of debt is often linked to the heinous practice of over-aggressive marketing, particularly to low-income people. I have to say that that applies in particular to doorstep selling, although I recognise the slight distinction that we have to make when it comes to doorstep selling and the campaign focused on it. That activity is not always carried out by those traditionally labelled the pariahs of society—loan sharks. Over-aggressive marketing is carried out by others, too, but the Bill is strangely silent on that serious aspect of the problem. I hope that the Minister will take the opportunity to explain the Government's thinking on what appears to be a glaring omission from the Bill.

I now turn to the action against what are known as rip-off practices. The duty of lenders to treat customers fairly in today's consumer credit market is a particular feature of the proposed legislation. The present extortionate credit test is 30 years old. In that time, the test has produced only 10 successful cases. It is clear that the difference between the original loan amount and the amount demanded back by creditors established as extortionate by the original Act is failing to prevent enough undesirable exploitative credit arrangements. It needs revision.

We support the principle of clauses 19 to 22, which give the courts new powers to make judgments about unfair credit agreements, moving the focus away from credit agreements to the overall way in which the lender deals with the customer. However, concern remains about the details of the legislation. The CBI and others believe that the burden of proof that it places on traders, so that every creditor-debtor relationship is unfair until proved to the contrary, is extreme.

Chris Bryant: In that case, does the hon. Gentleman support the idea, already advocated by several Labour Members, of imposing a ceiling on interest rates, or at least a provision whereby the Government could, via a statutory instrument at a future date, allow for such a ceiling?

Mr. O'Brien: The hon. Gentleman raises a point that has already been mentioned in interventions. I heard what the Minister said as well as he did. I am not ducking the issue, but I will come on to the point later, if he will bear with me.

I ask the Minister now how he will carry out his duty of allowing proper scrutiny of his proposals. To avoid any suspicion of headline grabbing in advance of an anticipated general election, will the Office of Fair Trading guidance, at least in draft, be published and made available ahead of the Committee stage, starting in the usual 10 to 14 days' time? After all, that would be fair in the current context. Any answer in the negative, I would submit, would be unfair to those seeking to scrutinise the Government's proposals both here and outside this place. For the Minister to withhold that guidance on the definition of "unfair" would be a sharp irony, as well as unacceptable. I hope that, as a courtesy to the House and a fair service to all interested parties outside the House, a draft will be made available before the Committee stage starts. That will be crucial to understanding the potential operation of the Bill.

Part of the Bill deals with action against rogue traders. Again, like the National Consumer Council and NACAB, I broadly welcome the tougher licensing system introduced in the clauses. They will give the Office of Fair Trading more powers to set more detailed and relevant tests on who is fit to hold a consumer credit licence, to request more information from consumer credit businesses over fitness and practice issues, to place more detailed restrictions on the activities of licence holders, to impose requirements on particular licence holders where the OFT is dissatisfied with their conduct, and to impose civil penalties on licence holders in breach of the requirements.

In theory those powers are, if exercised with restraint and proportionality, sensible. However, there is a significant caveat, given the Government's record on expanding bureaucracy and red tape, and their tick-box approach, which experience shows is least likely to work, because it is no substitute for the judgment and responsibilities of practitioners. Clause 38 confers powers on the OFT to impose requirements on licensees and give the regulator potentially greater flexibility. The only present option is simply to kill or to keep a licence held by a firm that may have 100 or more branches. Businesses and consumers alike stand to benefit from the OFT's being able to require a single offending branch of a firm to address the matter with which it is dissatisfied, rather than having to choose between either ignoring isolated instances of bad practice or the draconian option of shutting every branch of the firm.

The Government have resisted—I believe rightly—the temptation to make high interest rates unlawful per se, and they have not applied interest rate ceilings. That deals with the intervention of the hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant). However, in an interview broadcast on the radio on the Sunday before Christmas, the Minister said that such provisions would be unworkable. I am concerned because in the same interview he said—he repeated it this afternoon—that the Government would keep their fundamental policy approach under review, not least through pilot research being conducted in Birmingham and Glasgow. He said that if the power to introduce an interest rate ceiling were introduced, such a power could be introduced by the simple expedient of secondary legislation under the Bill. After what I have heard today, that may have been brought up to date. I agree that it would be unacceptable to confer such a power through secondary legislation, and I hope that the Minister will reconfirm that it would be done through primary legislation.

Mr. Battle: If there were a power in the Bill that allowed the Minister to introduce capping on rates and the charges that often compound the interest and take people from being £100 in debt to being £1,000 in debt, the Minister would not have to use it, but its existence would act as a signal to the markets that if they did not act responsibly, the Minister could act. Would that not be worth while?

Mr. O'Brien: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman. It is an interesting idea to have powers in a Bill to act as a deterrent against their ever being used—and from time to time, that is how it works out in practice. I accept that point.

It is not my position to make the Government's argument, but the Bill contains an unfairness test. As I understand the right hon. Gentleman's argument, he wants a new policy approach after all the research that the DTI has commissioned, especially on international best practice, has been gathered. I would insist that any new policy approach should be in the form of primary legislation. Otherwise it would exist only as a threat, rather than something that we could properly consider and scrutinise, as is the duty of this House.

Angela Eagle: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. O'Brien: I will, although the hon. Lady has already had a good crack at intervening.

Angela Eagle: I thank the hon. Gentleman for having the grace to give way again. Does he think that compounding interest rates, which my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) mentioned, and which causes major distress, as many of us know from our surgeries, could ever be fair?

Mr. O'Brien: I, too, have heard from many constituents who have suffered from that phenomenon. I suggest that the unfairness test would deal with such problems, but it is really up to the Minister to give a proper response to the hon. Lady. As I understand the Bill's intent, and therefore the basis on which the Opposition has assessed and scrutinised it, the unfairness test is intended to encompass the essence of what is fair or not fair about any compounding, or some compounding. That is not yet determined. However, the hon. Lady makes a fair point about the Bill: it lacks detail, which is unhelpful at this stage.

Clauses 44 to 51 provide new rights to receive information from lenders on the status of their borrowing at points throughout the lifetime of a loan. I am glad that the provisions cover the lifetime of the loan, because I have always regarded that as very important. The information includes annual statements for fixed-sum credit for a duration of more than one year; warnings on the consequences of minimum payments to credit cards; notice of arrears, accompanied by new advice sheets; notice of any sums charged as a result of defaulting on a loan; and notice of contractual interest charged after a court judgment has been made on a loan. Such regular information bulletins will hep to address the point about compounding that the hon. Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle) rightly raised.

Notwithstanding the concern expressed by some in the consumer credit industry that sending formal arrears information notices to customers within 14 days of a missed payment may distress them, in our view NACAB is correct in its assessment that "the provision of information to borrowers about events affecting the status of their loans is an essential safeguard against growing indebtedness".

However, let us be realistic. It is not good enough for the Government to insist that borrowers, especially low-income borrowers, receive a deluge of letters just so that the lender can prove its track record and leave a paper audit trail for the regulator, because people in difficulty often just put such letters in a drawer. People put their heads in the sand, and I have never known of any legislation capable of preventing that.

It is important to recognise that the relationship exists throughout the lifetime of the loan, not just at the time of the initial transaction. Other approaches can include the sympathetic phone call to help someone come to an arrangement, however small the regular amount and however long the period. That area is vital for low-income borrowers. I accept, however, that some low-income borrowers do not have a telephone—we need to root our proposals in the reality faced by many of these people.

As NACAB also points out, the proposed legislation does not cover extending the right to a statement to fixed loans lasting less than one year. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Tewkesbury intends to pursue that point in Committee. As shorter loans are often charged at even higher interest rates and are also often "rolled over", a similar statement for fixed-term loans lasting less than a year might also benefit consumers. Such a statement might be issued at the mid-point in the loan.

In summary, these clauses demand of the lender a real commitment to a continuing relationship with the consumer beyond the initial transaction, which is best practice operated by many in the industry already—not least because it is in their interests to stay close to their customers at all times in all circumstances. The proposal extends the principles of best practice. But let us not forget that all too often, the real difficulty is persuading the borrower to contact the lender early enough when difficulties loom, so that a manageable and fair arrangement can be worked out.

The final principal measure in the Bill is a new route to consumer redress through the application of the financial services ombudsman scheme to consumer credit licensees, as outlined in clauses 59 to 61. The aspiration here is to provide more accessible and lower-cost dispute resolution processes. Although the measure has our tentative support, there is a lack of detail in the Bill, and we will want to explore the detail of the proposals carefully in Committee.

One reason for our caution is the last dispute resolution procedure introduced by the Government on 1 October 2004, which applies generally to employers and employees. In that instance, the Government claimed that the new dispute resolution regulations amounted to a simple three-step procedure. In fact it is a 13-step procedure—a number that is clearly unlucky for the Department of Trade and Industry. The regulations were so complicated that the explanatory guide produced by the Department turned out to be incorrect and had to be reprinted at a cost of £200,000—another example of the waste that may mean that there is not enough money to continue to fund citizens advice bureaux, as the hon. Member for Ochil (Mr. O'Neill) mentioned.

The CBI has also expressed doubts that the financial ombudsman scheme

"has the skills, expertise, experience, resources or the appropriate charging structure to be able effectively to take on complaints relating to a whole range of smaller transactions than it currently covers."

We will need to look carefully at the charging regime for smaller transactions.

Ms Keeble: I read that part of the CBI's briefing, but I challenge the hon. Gentleman to say what evidence there is for that point. I have used the financial services ombudsman in both large and small cases. His office does seem to have the expertise and can provide a cost-effective remedy for people with specific complaints. It is an excellent way to gain assistance for the public.

Mr. O'Brien: I, too, have some experience of the financial services ombudsman on behalf of my constituents, and the response has often been very helpful. The CBI must answer for its own evidence, but it is my job on Second Reading to ensure that the concerns that have been expressed by all interested parties are given a proper airing. I do not have an answer to the hon. Lady's question, but the financial services ombudsman himself said, in an interview on the "Money Box" programme, that he had real concerns about his office's capacity to cope with the volume of work. The Bill would inevitably add to that volume, not least because those involved in smaller transactions are just as concerned as those involved in larger transactions, but the unit cost to the FOS will be disproportionately higher. We must at least consider whether we have the capacity to deliver the intent in the Bill. The hon. Lady asks a fair question. I do not have the answer, but it is now at least on the record.

The CBI added that "consultation on these matters was promised, but has not been forthcoming".

The Minister said that there had been a lot of consultation. I was certainly aware of that, but the Government also claimed that they had consulted on the proposal to scrap community health councils. My campaign four years ago proved otherwise. The Prime Minister had to write me a three-letter page of apology on that point. We had a decent campaign, but the councils were still axed—and something very much poorer was put in their place. Let me point out to the Minister that the CBI feels that it has not been consulted on these matters. We will naturally seek answers to these points in Committee, and we have already signalled that we will not vote against Second Reading.

Let me deal with the reaction of business to the Bill. We should not forget that all transactions have two sides. Members on both sides of the House have expressed their concern for people on low incomes and other vulnerable people. That is right and proper as part of the job we do on behalf of our constituents. However, that would not be an issue if there were not another party to every transaction. In broad terms, British business welcomes the Bill, but like us it has asked where the details are. I listened with interest to the exchanges about unsolicited credit card cheques with the hon. Member for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt) and my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous), and I hope that that important issue will be explored in Committee.

Rogue traders are a menace to business, as well as to individual consumers. As the Federation of Small Businesses correctly observed,

"small businesses need similar protection afforded to consumers as entrepreneurs often use their house for security and lack specialist financial knowledge".

The British Chambers of Commerce commented that they "generally support measures to tackle unfair practices in the consumer credit market".

The CBI

"supports in general the principle of the approach in the Bill to provide greater transparency in consumer credit transactions and the ability to target those traders who deliberately set out to deceive consumers".

It is most unfortunate that the Liberal Democrat spokesman—the only member of his party to attend the debate—has disappeared, as I am about to tackle the Liberal Democrats' irresponsibility about the whole matter. They will have to read my comments in Hansard. We may take business's general approval of the Bill as complete disproof of the Liberal Democrats' simplistic and erroneous belief in the permanent struggle of interest between business and the consumer. I trust that the Minister will not have to suffer the same extraordinary diatribe against the high street banks from the Lib Dem spokesman—wherever he may be—that characterised his party's reaction to the Queen's Speech, issued to the Times Online, on 23 November 2004. If the Minister responds to that, the Lib Dem spokesman will be surprised, as he will not have a clue about the question that is being answered, but we shall welcome him back when he returns.

There is, however, justified concern about some of the specifics of the Bill. The first is the lack of clarity throughout the draft legislation, with, consequently, an over-reliance on secondary implementing legislation that is not, as everyone in the House must admit, subject to the same degree of parliamentary scrutiny. As I mentioned, the Bill sets out three sources of protection for consumers facing unfair practices: the unfair credit jurisdiction of the court, in clauses 19 to 22; the consumer credit jurisdiction given to the financial services ombudsman, in clauses 59 to 61 and schedule 2; and the guidance issued by the Office of Fair Trading mentioned in clauses 19, 30 and 41.

How will those different jurisdictions work together as a coherent system of consumer protection? Is the OFT guidance on the fitness of consumer credit companies for a licence sufficient? Will it leave businesses feeling informed and prepared, when the primary legislation states only—[Interruption.] Oh, the Liberal Democrat has returned; it is good to welcome him back.

Clause 30 states only that:

"The OFT shall prepare and publish guidance in relation to how it determines, or how it proposes to determine, whether persons are fit persons".

Will the guidance, even in draft, be available before the Bill goes into Committee? That will be crucial if we are to give the measure proper scrutiny.

What about clause 62, which gives the OFT powers

"to monitor, as it sees fit"

businesses being carried on without a licence? According to the draft regulatory impact assessment—people such as me really do read those things—the estimated administration costs associated with the measures are £4.9 million a year. How can the estimate be so precise when the phraseology of the legislation is so vague?

The ambition of the legislation is justified, but the some of the drafting leaves much to be desired. As one interested party told me, the Bill is so vague that it is "not fit for purpose", with Ministers ducking their responsibility to propose the remit of the OFT, which Parliament should be setting rather than offloading it all on the OFT. There is a suspicion—I say no more than that—that Ministers are trying to avoid blame when the inevitable unintended consequences flow from a Bill in such an inadequately drafted state and/or that the Bill was drafted quickly so that it could be proposed today, to catch a passing headline in the run-up to a general election. However, we know how long the Bill's gestation has been, so I give the Minister some credit when I suggest that that may not be the answer.

Mr. Sutcliffe: I wanted to intervene on several of the hon. Gentleman's points, but resisted as I shall have a second bite at the cherry during the winding up. However, the time scale of the Bill is not about cheap headline grabbing; the issue affects many people in terms of poverty and financial exclusion. All parties welcomed the White Paper and the regulations that resulted from it. There were no votes against any of the relevant statutory instruments. The reason why the Bill has taken so long is that it is important that all stakeholders—the industry, consumer groups and the voluntary sector—move forward together. That is why so much time has been taken, but I shall answer many of the points that the hon. Gentleman has raised when I wind up the debate.

Mr. O'Brien: I am grateful to the Minister. The points about the length of time the Bill has taken to prepare were put to me by the interested parties we consulted before Second Reading, and I hope that I couched them in terms that suggested that the latter allegation was unfounded. Yet again, there is broad consensus at the Dispatch Box.

To avoid the practice of Ministers and officials relying on secondary legislation to implement costly measures briefly and vaguely alluded to in primary legislation, I ask the Minister to take note of one of the actions recommended in the Conservative party's latest policy document on business deregulation—it is one of which I am particularly proud, because I was responsible for it. We recommend conducting secondary regulatory impact assessments

"whenever the substance of an important regulatory initiative would be provided by the exercise of secondary powers by Ministers or agencies".

Interestingly, that is not currently a power, so I invite the Government to adopt our policy—in any case one of the Labour party's favourite pastimes, in words if not in action—as it would be so desirable in this case.

The Opposition's priority is always to ensure that any new regulation on British business, if it is judged necessary at all, is proportionate, and that we have the appropriate means properly to measure its proportionality. Over-zealous regulation of the consumer credit industry would result in the consumer ultimately suffering a lack of choice, accessibility and affordability, as creditors withdrew products and the market shrank. We share the CBI's concern that "many of the significant policy areas have been left to . . . guidance from the OFT".

A regulator does not have the same accountability to Ministers, and through them the electorate, as a Department of State such as the DTI. A recent academic study found that the budgets of the main Government regulators have tripled since 1997, and the headcount has more than doubled. The Government's own quango, the Better Regulation Task Force, recently complained that there are now so many regulators that it is impossible to establish precisely how many there are. That was confirmed by the response to a parliamentary question that I received on 8 July 2004 from the current Minister for Trade and Investment, when he was in the Cabinet Office. It is an incompetent and unaccountable way to govern.

Given the significant new enforcement and law-making powers that the Bill awards to the OFT, it seems sensible, as the Consumer Credit Association suggests, to place a legal requirement on the OFT similar to that which currently applies to the FSA: that the regulator should take into account the need for proportionality, and the need to promote innovation and maintenance of the UK's competitive position. That is especially relevant since, according to the World Economic Forum, under Labour, the UK has fallen from the fourth to the 11th most competitive economy in world rankings.

Another major complaint from a range of interested parties is about the timing of the legislation. Interested parties could now consult Hansard to read the Minister's opening remarks; in the light of what he said, I need not develop the comments that I had prepared for Second Reading. As the Trading Standards Institute has noted with some concern, however, there is not much "room for error" in getting the Bill on the statute book before a general election, if it is right, as we learn from The Sun, that the Prime Minister has scheduled one for 5 May.

The Prime Minister described the Consumer Credit Bill as an important piece of legislation—like his Chancellor, let us not go down the track of whose word we can believe these days—yet despite those assurances, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is not in the Chamber. We hoped that the Bill could have been introduced earlier, although I accept that the Minister has been working hard to build consensus. There is an absence of the detail that would have helped us to scrutinise it, which is surprising given the length of time that the Bill was in preparation.

In September 2003, the DTI published a research study, which found that 80 per cent. of people would welcome more information on their consumer credit rights; 56 per cent. of respondents deemed the language used on credit agreement forms hard to understand; and an overwhelming 84 per cent. believed that consumer loans should be subject to the same regulations regardless of size—in other words, that the £25,000 threshold should be removed.

Chris Bryant: But 80 per cent. of people do not understand percentages. What would the hon. Gentleman do about financial literacy in schools?

Mr. O'Brien: I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman asked that question, as I take a close interest in that matter and shall deal with it almost immediately. Financial literacy education, as against numeracy, is vital not only as a safeguard against debt but also for the competitiveness, enterprise and entrepreneurial culture of our country.

Why was the Bill not included in the 2003 Queen's speech? There is real concern that the savings ratio has fallen by nearly half since 1997, and now compares unfavourably with those of other advanced countries. While our savings ratio is 5.5 per cent., according to the OECD the EU average is 12 per cent. The Chancellor has seen it fit to take £5 billion a year out of pension funds, supported by Parliament with its Labour majority. Labour's first Minister with responsibility for social security, the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), said:

"when Labour came to power we had one of the strongest pension provisions in Europe and now probably we have some of the weakest."

As my right hon. Friend the shadow Chancellor has noted:

"It took six hundred years of banking history for household debt to reach half a trillion pounds. Now, under seven years of Labour, this has doubled."

Mr. Plaskitt: If the hon. Gentleman accepts that total household consumer indebtedness has reached £1 trillion—he seems to make something of that—will he acknowledge that total household assets have exceeded £6 trillion under this Government?

Mr. O'Brien: I am happy to acknowledge the balance of the asset calculation, but that does not relate to cash. Savings are what matter, so I was making my arguments in the context of the savings ratio, which has suffered such a dire collapse. That is especially important when we consider its relationship with debt.

According to the Bank of England, consumer credit is running at about £1.5 billion a month. Borrowing increases by 15 per cent. every year and the average household borrows 140 per cent. more than its combined income. The Bank of England goes on to state:

"This is above the levels in the US and most large EU countries ... The continuing rapid build up of debt by many borrowers may be building up vulnerabilities for the long term."

The Conservative party takes the issue of consumer debt seriously, because unmanageable debt robs people of their security in the future and their independence from the state. That explains why we have set up a commission chaired by Lord Griffiths of Fforestfach to investigate all aspects of household debt. On Tuesday, the shadow Chancellor published six options to restore the savings culture, which is essential if people are to have security for the future and independence from the state.

We shall support the Bill, so it will not be we who prevent its safe passage through the House. Nevertheless, we are committed to giving it proper parliamentary scrutiny because it lacks adequate detail at present, which may, as a result, have unintended and adverse consequences for the industry and, ultimately, for consumers. The problems of indebtedness, which relate to a sophisticated and complex credit market and, increasingly, equally sophisticated and complex consumer demand, place a duty on the Government to supply citizens with adequate information, protection and education. That addresses the point made by the hon. Member for Rhondda.

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): Is my hon. Friend aware that such is the rate of spiralling household debt that in the time he has been addressing the House, household debt in Great Britain will have risen by about £10 million?

Mr. O'Brien: Quite clearly, the sooner I sit down the better. I am grateful to my hon. Friend because that brings home to us how real the problem is. A proportion of that £10 million—something in the order of 10 per cent.—will be debt that it would have been wiser not to incur, which will inevitably put people in stressful circumstances. Some £1 million of debt will have been raised in the past half hour and that will cause untold stress, mayhem and perhaps tragedy, as we heard from the Minister. We should not lose sight of the gravity of the debate.

I return to my point about education, because we could make a positive contribution to financial literacy. Supply and demand are sophisticated concepts. The 2004 "Fair, Clear and Competitive" White Paper noted that "for consumers to be able to make rational, well-informed choices about financial products", they need not only "access to information", but "the ability to understand that information".

[Mr. O'Brien]

MBNA is a significant employer of my constituents as its UK headquarters is based in the city of Chester. I am visiting it next week to discuss with it all aspects of the Bill. Additionally and importantly, I shall discuss its ongoing commitment over several years to a big issue that is markedly absent—perhaps understandably—from the Bill: the provision of expert people, time and resources for the education of children in our schools in financial literacy to give them the basic levels of understanding to equip them to go out into the world and handle money. Of course, student debt is now heaped on people at a young age, so such a scheme will enable them to handle that responsibly and with understanding. I pay tribute to MBNA for the exemplary work that it already does to lead that field in Cheshire.

Anyone who has been in business knows that any investment in the education of a business's consumer market and those who will enter that market is a proper investment. The industry thus has a real responsibility to make such provision. Any hon. Member who has been a teacher will know that a teacher seldom wakes up in the morning and dashes to school to teach children about money. Teachers want to teach history, English and maths, so we need the extended resources to come from the industry itself. I suggest that we could add value to the Bill by considering such a programme, so I urge the Government to consider that seriously.

The Government's attitude to excessive and irresponsible borrowing is not an example that the citizens of this country should follow, especially the young. I hope that they have not left it too late to do too little. However, the Bill is well intentioned and I hope that the detail will prove that my last statement was not justified. We shall have to wait for the Committee to see that detail, but it would have been helpful to see it now.

2.56 pm

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton) (Lab/Co-op): I give a warm welcome to a long overdue Bill, because the current legislation on the statute book is not fit for purpose. I thank the Minister for his welcome appearances before the Select Committee on the Treasury over the past few years in which we have investigated the matter.

I hope for unanimity in the House on the Bill today because surely there can be little dispute about the key issues. The Bill will enhance consumer rights and redress, and ensure that the test of extortionate credit is replaced with an unfairness test. The need for alternative dispute resolution has been mentioned in the context of the Meadows case in Liverpool, but given that a case that started with a £5,000 debt rising to £385,000 took 14 years to go through the courts, we need a mechanism to take the matter away from the courts so that such cases can be settled speedily. The Bill will improve the regulation of the consumer credit business because the licensing scheme will be strengthened. I think that all hon. Members hope that the Bill will allow us to tackle the problem of loan sharks, which we have all been banging on about for many years. The Bill will ensure that there is more appropriate regulation when there is an extension of protection to all consumer credit by abolishing the financial limit.

The discussions that members of the Treasury Committee have held with witnesses showed that there was a general welcome for the Bill. For example, Ian Mullen of the British Bankers Association told me through correspondence that the timing was right and the Bill was drafted sensibly. Sandra Quinn of the Association for Payment Clearing Services said that the Bill would make transparency and marketing much better. John Vickers of the Office of Fair Trading, who has appeared before the Committee to give evidence about the matter, said that the Bill would ensure that credit regulations were relevant to today's growing market.

The Treasury Committee started its inquiry on the matter several years ago with twin objectives: transparency and a desire to ensure that the market was competitive. Those have been recurring themes since we first read Don Cruickshank's report on banking services. The Committee has been unanimous on that and, indeed, an official Opposition member of it recommended the Cruickshank report so that we could examine the matter in greater detail. We found a market in which the consumer was confronted by complex credit agreements, charging methods, credit cards and other unsecured loan products that often had opaque and ambiguous terms and conditions. We concluded that only when the consumer information is transparent and there are good, fair products will the market be truly competitive.

The Treasury Committee's concerns were aroused when we had a group of chief executives before us a number of years ago. When we asked how to calculate interest rates, one of them replied, "You need a bit of calculus." So we went to the university of Cambridge, to the deputy director of the Isaac Newton Institute for Mathematical Sciences. We gave him a Barclaycard with a £1,000 debt on it. After a whole afternoon's work, this esteemed mathematician sent us back a six-page document on how to calculate interest rates. It was beyond me, and I am sure that it would be beyond everyone in the House to understand how the interest rates were calculated.

Mr. Plaskitt: It was beyond that mathematician.

Mr. McFall: It was beyond quite a number of people—certainly beyond chief executives whom we asked to calculate it when they came before the Committee.

So our concerns were aroused. We found that there were not one but two definitions of annual percentage rates in existence. We have been pushing the Minister and the Department of Trade and Industry to ensure that we have one APR definition. I believe that that matter has now been resolved, but I should like the Minister to reassure us and the public on that point.

Still today, the way in which interest rates are calculated means that we can have two credit cards with identical APRs and balances to be paid over the same period but subject to different amounts of interest, in some cases varying by about 70 per cent. The Minister must look at this issue. There are 10 different ways of calculating interest. For example, some credit card companies start calculating interest from the day of purchase. Some wait until the purchase is posted to the account. Some stop charging when the statement is issued. Some stop charging when the payment is made. Most credit cards offer interest-free periods for new purchases, but some apply them to all new purchases while others apply it to those accounts on which there is no outstanding balance. So there is a recipe for confusion and ignorance in the market today.

Mr. Pike: Does my hon. Friend agree that the way in which the company uses the repayment is also important? People may be charged different interest rates on different parts of what they owe. Usually the repayment is used to repay the part that is subject to the lowest, not the highest interest rate.

Mr. McFall: That is exactly right. I defy any hon. Member to explain to me in simple terms how their interest rate is calculated.

When we do not have information readily available, we do not have informed customers and we do not have a level playing field. The need for transparency is still as urgent today as when we took the issue up, even though advances have been made.

According to opinion polls, 80 per cent. of consumers are unaware of the differences in how interest is calculated, never mind being able to work them out. The industry has not yet made a convincing argument, certainly to our Committee, against some form of standardisation. The companies state that this is a competitive issue. The Committee and others do not take exception to that, but there must be some form of standardisation while retaining the competitive aspect. The last thing the Committee and others would want is to take away that aspect. We want it to remain. We have pushed hard on the issue of transparency.

As a result of our inquiry, the banks and credit card companies have introduced summary boxes on monthly statements. A number of them—not all—are making progress on minimum repayments. We know the concept of the monthly bill stating a minimum repayment. We asked two banks that came before us how long it would take customers to repay the full amount if only the minimum repayment was made. One said 18 years and nine months and the other said 24 years. That is if some of the capital is paid off. But some minimum repayments are only 1 per cent., so the capital is not repaid, and in some cases the customers would never pay their balance off. We are saying to the industry that surely it is right, in fairness to the customer, for that to be on the statement so that they can take an informed decision. If they see that it will take 20 years to repay the debt, perhaps they will do something about paying more to clear the debt more quickly. I am glad to report that both Barclays bank and Lloyds bank have made progress and put that information on the monthly statement.

There is also the issue of transaction and penalty fees. As we know, fixed fees are charged if payment is not made. There is concern that such fees could result in excess moneys coming into the banks. The banks tell us that they merely clear their costs, but not one has declared that publicly. Indeed, most of them say that they do not even declare it to their shareholders. As a result of our work, the Office of Fair Trading looked into the issue and asked the banks for that information. I hope, in the interests of the banks themselves, that they declare the information in public, because then they could reassure the public that the banks are not exacerbating the problems of indebtedness for low-income borrowers, which some groups such as Citizens Advice, the National Consumer Council and others in submissions to the Treasury Committee have said could be the case. We need that public declaration to provide that reassurance.

Mention has been made by some individuals of marketing. It is a big issue. We found in our inquiry a real case of a drug addict in a drug clinic who had been offered a £10,000 credit card loan by a company. He was going to take it up to feed his habit, but the supervisor in the clinic saw it and stopped it. I label that as irresponsible marketing. Companies need to do something about it.

Since the Treasury Committee undertook the inquiry, I regularly receive 40 or 50 letters a week from people all over the country on the issue. I will read one from an individual who said:

"My son 24 has a cluster of learning difficulties including dyslexia, dyspraxia, Aspergers Syndrome etc, a maths age of 12, cannot read print below 12 point and only half a page—but he holds down a job in known limits. He can enter into an agreement with a Bank or mobile phone company but the Data Protection Act prevents parents who primarily care for him from having details of commitments he makes.

In February 2002, his Bank"—

I will not name his bank; it is a major high-street bank—

"were made aware of his special needs and in June 04 I asked them not to raise his credit limit." But it was immediately raised from £400 to £650 automatically. The parent continues:

"by late August his overdraft was £660—Bank then convinced him to have a £2,500 loan at 19 per cent. (spent in 6 days)—the overdraft became £1,200 despite my warnings to Bank."

He then went for another loan of £10,000, which was spent in five days. The letter continues:

"Bank charges alone now amount to £200 on top of repayments and each time a statement is needed it costs £20."

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: The right hon. Gentleman has made an extremely important point. I know of a case in which someone wanted his elderly father to remain independent. However, he did not find it easy to cope with his father's financial affairs, so he sent a notice to the bank asking it to keep an eye on his account. The father never spent more than £50 at a time, but he lost thousands of pounds to a rogue roof tiler and builder. The right hon. Gentleman is making a strong and wise point—we must find an effective binding for high street banks. It should be possible to put them on notice, given that a son has no right to demand a power of attorney to conduct his parents' affairs and prevent them from being ripped off.

Mr. McFall: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his support. I think that we are all at one on this issue. In my discussions with banks, credit card companies and others, we have pointed out that such action would help them as well as their customers.

The Treasury Committee found that data sharing was crucial. We have heard, and will do so again today, of tragic cases in which people commit suicide. They are a minority, but there is a tipping point for many people. However, information is not available for banks and credit card companies to assess an individual's needs and responsibilities, so a tipping point is reached and extreme consequences result. The Treasury Committee has written to the Information Commissioner and, along with him and the OFT, we are working towards all banks sharing full information on credit cards, as that could help to prevent situations arising in which consumers with a large outstanding debt relative to income manage to make the minimum repayment every month but none the less are struggling. If individuals make a repayment every month they do not come to anyone's attention. However, as I shall illustrate later, someone with 20 or 30 credit cards could be struggling, so the sharing of positive and negative data is extremely important. The Information Commissioner and the DTI have a role in ensuring that comprehensive data sharing is introduced. The lender must always assess an individual's ability to repay, but can only do so with full credit data. They need to make an examination of a customer's full credit commitments in relation to income.

The lack of data sharing hampers responsible lending. The availability of credit is good for our constituents and society generally. It helps individuals and families to achieve their ambitions, and meets their needs. However, we must make sure that the equation between responsible borrowing and responsible lending is in sync. Since the major banks appeared before the Select Committee advances have been made. Recently, one of those banks wrote to me:

"I wanted to say how pleased we were that the Committee recognised the progress . . . made in increasing the transparency of our credit cards. As we have said before, we are not complacent and believe it is in the interests of consumers and the business to find ways of increasing clarity and transparency. I can assure you that we intend to maintain this progress in the months ahead . . . We accept that many consumers do not yet fully understand the differences in interest charging methods between credit card issuers."

Clearly, transparency is still a long way off in the industry. Progress has been made, but the Government must be robust. I am not making any criticisms of the Minister, who has engaged positively with the issue, but it is scandalous that we have had to wait more than 30 years for a consumer credit Bill.

The country's £1 trillion debt has been mentioned. That is a sizeable sum, but we must remember that more than 80 per cent. of that borrowing is for mortgages on our homes, which are worth more than £3 trillion. If we add the value of other financial assets, including pensions, shares and stocks, the asset figure is well over £5 trillion.

Mr. Plaskitt: It is £6 trillion.

Mr. McFall: I accept what my hon. Friend says, as he is a keener mathematician than I am. The country is in the black.

Mr. Sutcliffe: Another key figure is the amount of disposable income spent on servicing debt. There are scare stories about debt, but 80 per cent. of it is for mortgages, which make people asset-rich. There has been a 50 per cent. increase in household wealth since 1997.

Mr. McFall: I accept that. We must keep the matter in perspective. The problem, as the Governor of the Bank of England stated when he appeared before the Select Committee on one occasion, is that 10 per cent. of the lending is unsecured so 10 per cent. of the population could be affected. The FSA recently stated that many millions of people still had problems dealing with their debt. Although we are not complacent, we recognise that the country is in the black but that quite a number of people at the lower end could be facing a real problem. They could be tiptoeing into disaster.

The financial services industry is a big industry. It is competitive and profitable, and I welcome that. However, the industry needs to adopt a more acute social dimension. The top nine banks collectively made £17 billion in pre-tax profits in 2004, but with the financial services industry recently being voted the second worst industry by consumers, there is an urgent need to rebuild consumer confidence. That must be a major priority for 2005.

For those tiptoeing into disaster, we need data sharing. We need to bring those who are over-indebted and those who are financially excluded into the wider financial sector network. I was sent information by a debt charity which looked into the situation and concluded that extreme debt is a growing problem. It examined three aspects—first, individuals with debts of more than £100,000. There were 815 clients in that group. The average debt was £114,000. Whereas 75 per cent. of people in that group had their own house and assets, 25 per cent. lived in a rented property and had no financial back-up. The question must be asked how such a situation could come about, where 815 people have average debts of £114,000.

The second aspect was the ratio of debt to monthly income. In the sad case of Dereck Rawson, who left a suicide note in May citing debt as the reason for taking his life, he had run up debts of £97,822 and owned 16 credit cards, but he had a monthly income of £1,473. That is a ratio of debt to monthly income of 66:1. How could anyone possibly pay off a debt of £97,000 with an income of £1,473 a month? There is a need for the industry to get its act together. There is a need for data sharing to ensure that industry good practice is not tarnished by the bad news resulting from such tragic cases. A 66:1 ratio of debt to monthly income is totally unacceptable. Urgent action is required to prevent it.

The third aspect that the charity considered was people with more than 16 credit cards. There were 178 clients in that category. The mean number of cards was 20 and the highest number that an individual had was 48. One can imagine a person with 48 credit cards making the minimum repayment of one or two pounds every month and getting himself or herself more and more into debt as the months go by. Surely we must have a sane system whereby an assessment is made of an individual's commitments so that we can prevent tragic cases from happening. That is in the interests of both the consumer and the industry. We will work with the Department of Trade and Industry and others to achieve that. I do not minimise the difficulties, but for the sake of a functioning, competitive market that is fair to customers we must achieve that aim.

Over-indebtedness and financial exclusion are important issues. The Government response to the Treasury Committee states that 3 million households hold no bank accounts. As we know from our constituents, individuals and households who are excluded from the financial community are also excluded socially.

The Treasury Committee is currently undertaking a short inquiry into cash machine charges and financial inclusion, and the Government have a lot of work to do in that particular area. We have taken evidence from the citizens advice bureau in Speke, Liverpool. Speke has a population of 10,000, but a free cash machine is not available and the cash machines all charge £1.50. The Government want to bring people into the financial network and advise people on low incomes not to withdraw all their cash at one time. If people go to their local convenience store to withdraw small amounts of cash, however, 20 to 25 per cent. of their benefits, or perhaps even more, may be taken away, so we must examine that issue.

The Treasury Committee has not drawn any conclusions and we are still taking evidence. According to the LINK website, the most affluent area in my constituency, Helensburgh, has no cash machines with charges, but other areas of Dumbarton and the Vale of Leven contain cash machines with charges. There were no cash machines with charges until 1999, when LINK changed its proposals as a consequence of the Cruickshank report.

The Minister and his colleagues must address this public policy issue: do we want to continue with a free cash machine network, where it is available, and have charging for convenience—we would need to define "convenience"—or will we move inexorably to a cash charging environment? The Treasury Committee has not drawn any conclusions, but it is a big issue if we are examining financial inclusion and fairness.

The best advocates in the financial services industry realise that they must do something positive to ensure that trust and confidence are restored. One company wrote to me the other day to say that introducing fair and transparent practices, stopping the use of misleading terms and conditions, making fees and charges reasonable rather than their being an excuse to make excess profits, and ensuring that products are easy to understand and involve simple processes would be a start.

I shall finish with a comment from the FSA document, "Treating Customers Fairly", which was published in July last year:

> "The fair treatment of customers is central to consumers having confidence in the financial services industry".

The financial services industry is important for this country's economic well-being, but customers are important too. Let us get the right balance between customers and the financial services industry so that we can look forward to a prosperous future in which customers are treated fairly and the aspirations of individuals and families in this country can be achieved.

Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) (LD): There has been a general welcome for the Bill, which was long trailed. I think that the Government will admit that it is, in a sense, overdue—they have promised it for a long time and it has finally arrived. So far, the debate has addressed a range of issues, demonstrating the concern on both sides of the House about the current credit regime and the need for legislative reform. It is not clear whether the Bill deals with a lot of the issues raised in the debate, and we will need answers to many questions on Second Reading and in Committee to clarify exactly what the Bill is designed to achieve.

Mr. Sutcliffe: That is a crucial point. Many of the issues raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) fall within the remit of Departments other than the Treasury. In my contribution, I said that we must examine the whole matter, including what is being done by the FSA and Treasury Ministers. No one has said that the Bill will catch everything.

Malcolm Bruce: I am grateful to the Minister. I am not saying that that was the claim; all I am saying is that a Bill called the Consumer Credit Bill will give people expectations that the legislation may not be able to fulfil. It is in the Government's interest to address that and it is important that we clarify what it is designed to achieve.

As the hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) suggested, some of the definitions in the Bill are less than extensive. Its full effectiveness can be determined only once it is enacted and tested by experience. The same applies to compliance costs.

The Government propose to extend the existing licensing scheme and ombudsman service, in particular by introducing powers to deal with unfair relationships. That is probably the right approach, but time will tell whether it meets consumer expectations. It is 30 years since the previous relevant Act, and it is interesting to observe that at that time borrowing on credit cards, for example, amounted to £32 million, while now the sum stands at £49 billion. That is a huge change. I will be interested to discover the extent to which the Minister believes that the Bill will deal with unfair relationships in relation to credit card abuse.

I pay tribute to those in citizens advice bureaux and other advice centres who wrestle daily with the problems of people struggling with debt, and help to resolve their problems by giving them practical advice on how to deal with financial institutions and on how to reschedule, or sort out their personal debt in other ways. The citizens advice bureau that most directly covers my constituency is in Peterhead, although Aberdeen deals with some cases. We have smaller information and advice centres in rural communities, which are not involved with or funded by the CAB, including GRAIN—the Gordon rural area information network—the Turriff advice centre and the Keith advice centre. They operate on very small budgets, and many of the people who work for them are very low paid and do it out of a desire to help rather than for the money, or in some cases work as unpaid volunteers. Despite their small budgets, those centres deal with thousands of cases a year and provide real practical help. Perhaps this comment is directed more at the Scottish Executive than at the Minister's Department, but more recognition and funding should be diverted to such smaller organisations, especially when compared with the substantial amount of money that goes to the CAB. That said, I do not in any way undermine the value of the CAB work.

Several Labour Members have commented on the desire for a maximum interest rate. The Minister has made his position clear, and I broadly agree with it.

[Malcolm Bruce]

I understand why the "debt on our doorstep" campaign and others want a specific reference to that to be included in the Bill. However, having listened to both sides of the argument, it seems to me that many of the small-value credit arrangements are effectively dependent on fixed-price charging for debt collection, which is beneficial to both parties because it is clearly understood. That could fall foul of a maximum interest rate. Having said that, several Members referred to cases in which much more unscrupulous mechanisms have been used whereby people are encouraged to roll over debt on increasing rates of interest with additional charges, to the point where by no stretch of the imagination can they be described as anything other than extortionate.

From what the Minister said—and the hon. Member for Eddisbury agreed with him—we may presume, hope and believe that the unfairness test will catch that practice. The difficulty for Members who want a maximum interest rate specified in the Bill is that that presumption is not provable until it has been tested. I fear that what might happen is that organisations such as the Catholic Fund for Overseas Development will find that they cannot safely operate the kind of arrangement that has applied in the past and which they honestly believe to be mutually beneficial. Such organisations would withdraw from the market and only the criminal fraternity would take on the loans. By definition, its members are outside the reach of any Bill because they do not operate under the law. There is a debate to held about that but we need to take that serious point on board. I have no doubt that an amendment will be tabled and I have no problem with that. However, I hope that those hon. Members who are concerned will ultimately be satisfied that, if the Bill is enacted in its present form, it will quickly establish a test case, which will cover the examples that they have mentioned. I would be surprised and disappointed if the extortionate rates that have been charged in such examples could pass a fairness test. I therefore agree with the Government's approach.

The Committee that the right hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) chairs has been active on the issue in the past year or two. My hon. Friend the Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb), who serves on the Committee, has also been active and kept me apprised of much of the Committee's activity. [Interruption.] Indeed, my hon. Friend has kept the press apprised of that, too. That is a wise course of action for a good Member of Parliament with a small majority. I pay tribute to him for his constructive behaviour as a member of the Committee.

Focus has been placed on the practices of what might be described as the mainstream of credit—the role of the high street banks, the main financial services companies such as MBNA in Chester and so on. Nobody suggests that they are sharks or rogue traders, but they work in a lucrative market and deal with millions of people, and they are adopting practices that at least raise eyebrows. I am interested in the extent to which the Bill can tackle those practices. It is important for the Government to clarify that and to explain how practices that the Bill does not tackle could be identified. There is an expectation and a desire for the industry to put its house in order, if necessary through legislative pressure.

We all accept that there is a dynamic in credit products that we do not want to suppress. We do not want to frame legislation so restrictively that it discourages new products. The hon. Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) made an interesting point about unsolicited cheques, pressure to take out loans and 0 per cent. introductions. Of course, he raised legitimate concerns but some people can use such products effectively and to considerable advantage. We need to find a mechanism that warns off and protects people for whom such products are inappropriate, without killing them off for those who can benefit from them. There is a constructive policy debate to be held about how to achieve that.

Although it is clear that financial companies have induced people to take up inappropriate credit—the wrong credit instrument or a credit that they cannot afford to repay—it is comforting that some complain that they have lost £1 billion a year through the astuteness of those who have managed to use 0 per cent. introductory fees, roll them over and not pay any interest on anything for a considerable time. Of course, we all ultimately pay for that, but it is important that the process of regulation is about trying to help people to make informed decisions and prevent them from being pressured into making inappropriate decisions.

The Government could help us to adopt two or three instruments that might assist in the process. The transparency of interest rates has already been discussed. I accept the point about financial literacy but it is a basic requirement of credit to know what the interest rate is. I therefore concur with the right hon. Member for Dumbarton and the Consumers Association that one standard method of presenting interest rates is desirable and, preferably, some broad agreed procedure about how they are applied. One method of calculating them is certainly desirable so that people can make a direct comparison and know that they are comparing like with like, not apples with pears.

I would go further and say that it might be helpful for the Bank of England, the FSA or some other appropriate body to publish an annual average or a range of figures so that people can make a comparison. Perhaps there should also be a requirement that this information should be drawn to people's attention when interest rates are being offered. Along with the 0 per cent. rate, and the introduction of the bonus interest rates, there are credit card interest rates as low as 7 or 8 per cent., yet some store card rates are well over 30 per cent. With the rate of inflation at 2 per cent. and the Bank of England interest rate at 5 per cent., those represent very high rates of interest, and the differences between the available rates are substantial. People ought to be aware of the ways in which they might be able to get a cheaper rate.

Mr. Plaskitt: The hon. Gentleman is trying argue that if there were a standard APR calculation, customers could use it to make comparisons about the cost of credit. Does he accept, however, that they could not do so, because the APR is only a small part of the picture? They would have to look at the whole range of features of the deal to work out the cost. In fact, the only way in which a consumer could access a useful assessment of the cost of credit would be if a cash-based illustration were available—not one based on APRs—but the industry is vigorously resisting the provision of such information.

Malcolm Bruce: That is a fair point. I agree that the APR is an imperfect measure that does not provide the whole answer. Nor would I suggest that we should back off from going down the route that the hon. Gentleman suggested. People need a clearer illustration of how they can make comparisons between different cards, so that they can make rational judgments.

People should also be apprised of the fact that a credit card might not be the appropriate instrument for their credit requirements. The chief executive of Barclays bank let the cat out of the bag in that regard. He was making the perfectly reasonable point—although it probably did not sound too good from his board's point of view—that there are horses for courses. A credit card is not an appropriate vehicle for long-term borrowing, yet many people are seduced by the 0 per cent. offers and the cheques and get themselves into debt. In reality, however, they could probably alleviate their problems simply by transferring the balance to an organised bank loan. After all, if the banks are prepared to offer all these different rates, they ought to be able to provide them. Yet people are not advised that these options exist unless they go to a CAB or some other useful adviser. Why should we not require a notice to be added to a credit card application to say, "Please inquire whether there is a cheaper, more appropriate way of dealing with any loan that you require over any period longer than the very short term", along with introducing a duty to give impartial advice on that. That could help the consumer.

About a year ago, I made a calculation on store cards and credit cards, just using the average costs of repayment. I did not examine the extreme rates; I just looked at the medium ones. On credit cards, the difference between the highest and lowest averages meant that consumers were paying £3 billion a year more than they needed to. The financial services industry, through its own inertia, was benefiting from that amount each year. I am not suggesting that it is improper to make a profit or that banks should not be profitable, but they are sitting back and making profits from people who are paying well over the odds and who could easily and quickly find cheaper forms of credit. We should provide those people with assistance, and I am simply making a few suggestions as to how we might do so. The Minister will find out that if the Bill—or any alternative measures introduced simultaneously—does not really do anything to address these anomalies and abuses, the people for whom this is a big problem will turn round and ask, "What was this Bill all about?"

The hon. Member for Wallasey (Angela Eagle), who has now left the Chamber, was obviously concerned about the penalty proposed in the Bill. Another penalty—perhaps the nuclear option—would be the withdrawal of the licence. Yet another would be for the lender to lose the entire repayment because the agreement was not enforceable—although that might not be a penalty if the agreement were really extortionate. I share the hon. Lady's view that the amount set for the penalty does not need to be in the Bill.

Certainly, I would be interested to see whether some different mechanism could be used. Legislation lasts for a considerable time, and the impact of the penalty could diminish. I accept, however, that individual transactions are concerned, so I guess that in a class action, or in a number of different but related actions, a company could be fined £50,000 several times over, in a cumulative hit, which might make the penalty much more significant.

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: The way in which the hon. Gentleman has raised this point suggests to me, given the interactions that we have had so far, that the Minister might want to consider matching the idea of a nuclear option, albeit with a much more sensible, confined option whereby one can close down a branch of a company where there has been a transgression, rather than exercising the much more draconian option of closing down the whole company. A £50,000 capping rate could be applied, if for some reason the Minister persuades us that that needs to remain in the Bill, per branch rather than per corporate entity. That might have a proportionate effect, depending on the scale of the damage.

Malcolm Bruce: Actually, it is possible to interpret the Bill as worded in that way, and clarification would be helpful. It would be extreme to act against a company with 200 branches and fine it £50,000 times 200. It would be right to fine the branch, or the company on its behalf, that perpetrated the offence. Certainly, the issue needs to be explored a little further.

The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Luke) asked about time orders as they affect Scotland. As I understand it, lay representation is possible in relation to time orders in England and Wales but not, apparently, in Scotland. If the Minister has not done so, I suggest that he consult the Scottish Executive, as a Sewel motion, or some simple mechanism, might allow us to bring the legal position into line. It seems to me that there is a desire for that change in Scotland, and there is no point in the Scottish Parliament having to deal with the issue separately. If the Scottish Executive are agreeable, I urge him to report back on that.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, uncertainty about the effects of the Bill can only be resolved by practice. The hon. Member for Eddisbury has suggested, and will no doubt produce, amendments to try to tie down some of the terms of the Bill more specifically. My experience of dealing with the Office of Fair Trading, on which he and I have had a number of exchanges, is less than satisfactory in a number of cases. It does not regard itself as a consumer association but as a competition agency, which belies its title and people's expectations of its title.

If I may stray marginally, to illustrate this point, I have been exercised by a concern about estate agents and the need to license them. In my view, the OFT examined that and came up with a totally windy and weak response. There is an estate agents association, which has its own terms of reference that could have been adopted for all estate agents. That association would have acted as a consumer protection agency. The OFT concluded that it was not its job to protect the consumer, but only to determine whether there was fair competition. I am concerned that the OFT's psyche is not always what I would expect it to be. Giving it too much discretion may mean that it even disappoints the Minister in terms of what it is required to do. Certainly, some clarification and debate in Committee would be necessary, to put it no higher than that.

[Malcolm Bruce]

On my final concern, I accept that the compliance costs as stated in the Bill do not appear unduly large in relation to the total value of the industry. Nor do I have any special brief on behalf of the companies which, in most cases, would probably have little difficulty in meeting them. Nevertheless, that can only be an estimate, as there are too many uncertainties. I am not suggesting that the Department has not made its best estimate, but in many cases, the courts will decide, the matter will be referred to the ombudsman, or information may be required. We do not yet know the environment in which information will be required but we hope that the ombudsman and the spirit of the law will reduce court involvement and that many of the cases will be resolved long before they come to court. Surely that will be one of the great benefits of the legislation if it works properly.

Until we know how the balance works, we cannot be sure of the compliance costs. I urge the Government to review the arrangements in practice, to establish whether all the mechanisms are working cost-effectively, efficiently and not in too burdensome a way. Given that European legislation is emerging in parallel with the Bill, I also urge the Government to ensure that the two are complementary and that there is no duplication. We do not want costs to be doubled unnecessarily.

Although we all like to make a big issue of concerns about regulation for political purposes, I trust that the House in general accepts that legislation should not involve unreasonable compliance costs and should not be unnecessarily bureaucratic, but should be fit for the purpose and pitched at a level that will enable it to deliver the end result; and that we should review it to establish whether we have overdone it, or gold-plated it to a greater or lesser degree. In view of the uncertainties in the Bill, it would be helpful if the Government committed themselves to reviewing it, perhaps publishing a report in four or five years.

Having said all that, I will end by saying that I welcome the Bill. The general consultation has clearly produced a good deal of consensus. What the Bill will deliver is not yet entirely clear—I hope that the Minister's reply and, subsequently, the Committee stage and Third Reading will provide further elucidation—but I hope that it will genuinely deliver more protection for the consumer, a better-informed public, and an industry that, while continuing to innovate and to develop new products, remains conscious of its social responsibility and general duty to be fair. I hope that we will end up with a vibrant credit industry which, nevertheless, leaves people less prone to the dire debt into which some have got themselves.

3.46 pm

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): I am glad to have the opportunity to speak—but observing how many others still wish to do so, I have put a red line through much of what I was going to say.

I support the Bill, and most of my speech will be devoted to explaining why I believe it is necessary. It is very much in line with the Government's policy of reducing the number of children in poverty. As has been pointed out several times today, the poorest section of the community is ripped off most by extortionate interest rates and hidden charges. The section of the community that can least afford it pays the highest penalty and suffers the most. The Bill attempts to tackle that.

Which? and the Consumers Association also welcome the Bill, but want it to go a bit further. The association has expressed concern about annual percentage rates, which a number of Members have mentioned, and about irresponsible lending. How can lenders be responsible if they do not take into account the full credit history of those to whom they lend, and do not know what debts and other problems they may already have?

The Consumers Association has referred to

"sneaky tricks and hidden charges", which have also been mentioned today. My right hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) mentioned charges for late payment and the exceeding of credit limits, which tend to take no account of whether the limit has been exceeded by only £1, or for only one day. Such charges can be totally unfair, and they are much more prevalent than we realise. Last year one in four people with credit cards incurred a penalty charge at some stage, and Which? estimates that the credit card companies took £427 million as a result. That is a major problem.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Chris Bryant) pointed out, every time we open our post at home, we are bombarded with letters offering us money, and even cheques. On the television and in the press, such organisations are constantly throwing money at people. But they do so indiscriminately, throwing it at those who cannot afford to borrow it, and without taking into account their particular situation.

Mention has been made of the NACAB, to which I shall refer extensively. Burnley District Citizens Advice Service provides a very good debt service. There is only one problem with it: there is too big a queue of people waiting to see its advisers. So that the advisers can do their job properly, analyse people's circumstances and give good advice, such people unfortunately have to wait, yet they might desperately need such information, and quickly. None the less, the Burnley advice centre does its best—indeed, it does an excellent job.

According to the NACAB report "In too Deep", which was published in May 2003, in the five years to 2003, CABs reported a 24 per cent. increase in the number of new debt inquiries and were dealing with more than 1 million a year. Over the same period, inquiries about consumer credit debt rose by 47 per cent. According to a NACAB survey of those seeking advice about debt problems, about three quarters of all clients were on incomes lower than the national average. Almost a third said that they were claiming income support or income-related jobseeker's allowance, and 13 per cent. said that their wages were being topped up by tax credits. Those percentages are much higher than those for the population as a whole. These findings suggest that people on low incomes and benefits find it difficult to budget without accessing credit, and that similarly, they struggle to repay such debts. The Government are committed to trying to help such people—the poorest section of the community—who are currently at greatest risk.

A Lancashire CAB told the "In too Deep" report that one of its lone parent clients in receipt of income support owed more than £12,000 to four creditors. Bankruptcy had been discussed with the client, but she could not afford to raise the £250 deposit fee for the Insolvency Service. The CAB negotiated token repayments of £1 a month to her creditors, but it would have taken her more than 250 years to repay the total debt. The result was unpleasant calls from debt collection agencies and a great deal of distress to the client.

A 2001 survey of CAB debt clients showed that each had an average of five and a half debts, totalling more than £10,700 per household. The debt-to-income ratio showed that the average debt was nearly 14 times the level of income. Of course, total debt includes elements such as council tax debts and money owed to catalogues; I am not suggesting that it consists entirely of credit card debt.

The provision of credit to low-income consumers is on the increase, and given that their circumstances increase the need for such credit, it can prove very costly. A CAB in the north-west told those who compiled a NACAB report of December 2000, entitled "Daylight Robbery", of a new practice used by a mail order company. It appointed company representatives to take orders and collect payments, adding an interest charge of 90.5 per cent. APR for that "extra service" in doing so. In one case, a CAB client who purchased a suite through the catalogue in question paid £15 a week for 40 weeks. She thought that that constituted full settlement, but was then told that she still owed what was a very substantial interest charge.

High-cost products can also be a problem. In the "Daylight Robbery" report, a Lancashire CAB tells of a client who had replacement windows installed at a cost of £5,150. After paying the deposit of £1,150, she was persuaded by the company in question to take out a loan, which it arranged. The agreement required her to pay £96.48 a month over 10 years. That comes to £11,577.60. The client was unaware that the loan would be over such a long period, and after three years she realised that she could get a better deal elsewhere and asked for a settlement figure. The figure quoted was £6,323—£1,173 more than she had borrowed in the first instance.

Although there are cooling-off periods, the reality is very different, especially when high-pressure selling techniques are applied to people in their own homes when they are already under pressure. Clients have their problems aired on TV and elsewhere, and there is no doubt about the reality of the problem.

It is not only high interest rates that can trap someone in debt. People with credit cards with low credit limits can find that the addition of administration charges can soon make a debt spiral out of control. The CAB report refers to a Lancashire client who had a debt on his credit card of just £200. He fell ill, had to stop work and claimed incapacity benefit. The credit card company would not accept the offer of repayment that the client made, and continued to add interest and late payment charges. By the time the credit card company finally agreed to accept his offer and suspend the interest, the late payment charges had increased the £200 debt on the card by 150 per cent. That is the nonsense that many people face.

Finally, I want to deal with consolidations. They are advertised on the television and Carole Vorderman sometimes comes on the screen in the mornings. People know her and her expertise in mathematics from her role in "Countdown", so they listen and believe that she offers a way forward. They often do not realise what the small print says—that taking a consolidation loan might mean securing it with their homes. If people cannot pay in the first instance, and then they cannot pay for the new consolidated loan either, they put their homes at risk as well. A consolidation may be appropriate in some cases, but not in others. People must think carefully before opting for one.

I spoke to a credit card company at the weekend and heard about offers to transfer cards to zero rate and so on. While I was talking, the woman asked me whether I realised that 0 per cent. up to April is not as good as 3.9 per cent. for the lifetime of the loan. Depending on when and how one wants to pay, that may well be true, but people do not look carefully enough at the conditions.

I could say a lot more about such issues, but I shall finish by citing a letter from a constituent that I received in November. I have written to the two companies named in the correspondence, but I will not name them here today. I wrote on 10 December, but I have not yet received the courtesy of a response of any kind. I shall give them a little bit longer. My constituent wrote:

"A few years ago I took credit with the . . . company so I could have some repairs done to my car. The original amount was for around £470. I got into some financial trouble after I separated from my wife and handed all my debts to . . . debt management company, who have been handling my debts for about four years".

He now owes £1,174—more than he started off with, after paying for several years. The company has not, as I said, had the courtesy to reply to me. It is that type of rip-off exercise that I hope the Bill will deal with.

I have great respect for the Minister, who has admitted that the Bill will not tackle all the problems. That is true, and we need the Government to take further action. Which? said that it would be good to go further, and I agree. I hope that the Minister will not soften the Bill in Committee. If anything, he should make it tougher, which would do a great service to the many people in this country who are being ripped off.

3.59 pm

Angela Watkinson (Upminster) (Con): This will be a largely consensual debate, because each and every one of us has had constituency cases through which we have become familiar with the suffering that unmanageable debt can cause. I welcome the new legislation, which is aimed at providing a fair deal for customers. It is necessary because household debt broke through the £1 trillion barrier in July last year and is predicted to rise to £1.1 trillion this year. It took 600 years of banking history for household debt to reach £0.5 trillion, and it has doubled, while the savings ratio has halved, since 1997. Interestingly, in an intervention in the speech by the right hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall), the Minister said that household wealth had doubled in that time, and that illustrates the declining propensity to save.

[Angela Watkinson]

As many as one in 20 households now pay up to a quarter of their income in consumer credit repayments. Many families and individuals have combined mortgage and credit card debt that will become unmanageable if interest rates rise again—there were five increases last year. People who overstretch themselves leave no margin for an increase in repayments and are heading for trouble. Recoveries by bailiffs are increasing dramatically, and debt advice centres are facing unprecedented demands for help. Behind each of those examples are stories of misery for the families involved.

Greater transparency and simplicity is needed in the consumer credit and loans industry, but it is important that our new measures have a positive impact on business as well as benefiting borrowers. I shall concentrate my remarks on the changing social attitudes to debt. The explanatory notes attached to the Bill refer to the Consumer Credit Act 1974 and the term "hire purchase". We do not hear that much these days, but I recall when it was first introduced. It was talked of in shocked whispers. The word "hire" in that phrase illustrates the attitude to credit then, as it implied that people did not own the item that they had borrowed money on until they had made the last repayment. Until then, it was only on hire and still belonged to the company that had provided the loan.

Attitudes have changed completely over the years. It is now regarded as smart to use other people's money, especially when it comes to credit cards. We have heard several hon. Members describe how interest payments can be avoided by changing debts from one credit card company to another. Cash has also become much less popular. Money-back guarantees on faulty purchases are also attached to credit cards, which make them attractive. Many people have multiple cards. There was only one type in 1971, and now more than 1,300 are available. The companies vie for customers by making the terms and conditions seem more and more attractive.

Store cards often offer 10 per cent. off as an incentive, but the issuing procedures for store cards are especially casual. Some constituents of mine moved house to a new area, and six months later, applied for credit to buy a new car. To their astonishment, they found that their credit rating was not good, even though they did not owe any other money. The people who had moved into my constituents' old house had picked up some junk mail with their names on and used it to apply for a range of store cards, run up debts on all of them and failed to pay. The assessment procedures for those store cards must have been very lax. Stores should be more circumspect when issuing cards, to ensure that they are issuing them to the right people.

Some stores must have had bad experiences. I recently went to buy a small item of furniture and the store staff started to ask me for all sorts of information. I said that I did not want credit, nor did I want the item delivered, because it would fit in my car. However, they still wanted to know my name and address, how old I was and what I had for breakfast! I was not willing to give that information, so they lost a sale. However, that situation might have arisen because the store had had experience of bad customers.

People buy on credit what they cannot afford. They often buy poor-quality goods to minimise the size of the loan. The goods do not last, and often do not outlive the term of the loan. People remain in debt, with nothing to show for it. I often wonder about the frequent television advertisements for sofas with nothing to pay for five years. Anyone with several young children will know what a sofa looks like after five years. People must be in perpetual debt, because at the end of the five years they will need another new sofa.

It is also popular to add the cost of a holiday or a new car to a mortgage. Have now, pay later. But people pay much more when they pay later. I welcome allowing customers the right to challenge unfair lending practices, and improving the regulation of consumer credit businesses through measures to drive out rogue money lenders who charge extortionate rates of interest.

Every now and again, I receive a batch of letters from secondary school pupils in my constituency, arising from their citizenship lessons. In the main, they are full of idealistic notions. Sometimes the pupils want to know what I think, but more often they want to tell me what they think about how the world can be put to rights and how everything can be improved. They have some good ideas—if only money were unlimited—but they obviously have no idea at all about money or the economy, about where money comes from and how it circulates. I endorse the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) on the establishment of links between banks and building societies and the teaching of citizenship in schools, so that students can learn that everything has to be paid for, and that everything comes originally from taxation in one form or another.

People need not just to know but to understand the total cost of a loan over the whole repayment period—not simply the purchase price—because it may not be the bargain that they thought. They need to know the cash price, plus interest, plus any default charges. If all that information is available, they can take full responsibility for their decision. They need continuous information on the progress of their loan payments. That is in the best interests not only of the borrower but of the lender. We must not ignore the rights of lenders. They are sometimes the victims of bad payers and have to write off those debts. Such information would prevent debt escalation, increase the likelihood of payment and take into consideration unforeseen circumstances, such as redundancy, illness or accident. Lenders need to distinguish between people who cannot pay and people who will not pay, and to make arrangements for those who want to pay but are in temporary difficulties. They could either increase the term of the loan or reduce the payments.

Debt counselling is a growth industry, as several Members have said. Important as it is, none the less it is shutting the gate after the horse has bolted. As important as debt counselling is budget management advice. If that were available, it would help people to avoid debt in the first place. Such advice should include how to make the best use of a modest income and remain solvent, and how to deal with aggressive doorstep salesmen. I was pleased that the Minister said that that point was under consideration.

Some people respond to newspaper adverts about goods that they think they might want, although the cost is never clear and there is an inquiry tick-box on the advert. An aggressive salesman calls and only the most resistant and robust customer will be able to get that man out of the door without having signed up to buy something, possibly at a cost that far exceeds what they would have paid elsewhere. People need to know how to assess whether a bargain really is a bargain, and how to calculate the full cost as opposed to the cash price.

Prevention is better than cure. Helping people to avoid debt in the first place is much easier than trying to resolve the problem afterwards. The Micawber principle still holds good. Borrowing up to one's repayment limit, with no cushion against the rainy day that always turns up when it is least convenient, is a risky way to live.

Over recent decades, things have changed dramatically. Waiting for something until one has saved up for it is no longer popular. People want things now—today—whether or not they can afford them. Somehow, they think that tomorrow will take care of itself. The result is that personal debt in Britain is increasing by £1 million every four minutes, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) pointed out. Unfortunately, for many people who are just managing to service their outstanding loans at current interest rates, another rise could just shift them into the unmanageable category, and the downward spiral of defaulting on payments and accelerating debt. I welcome the provision of more information, and information that is easier to understand, for borrowers.

I should like education at school and beyond to go much further, to promote real understanding of how money circulates in the economy between income, taxation, spending, borrowing and saving. For a healthy economy and a stable society, we need a balanced approach to consumer credit that gives lenders and borrowers a fair deal, and I wish the Bill fair weather in Committee.

4.9 pm

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West) (Lab): I, too, welcome this long overdue Bill and compliment the Minister for investing his energy and time in getting it this far. I say to the hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) and other hon. Members that the whole House understands the need for action. If I were to make only one jibe, I would say that we do not want to get the Bill swiftly through Parliament because of speculative election deadlines. I am anxious that desperate people who are locked into long-term unsustainable debt should not wait a moment longer for us to take action.

The Bill provides a good framework. It is time to review and bring up to date the Consumer Credit Act 1974 because the markets have moved on. I shall make my next point briefly because there should be a decent discussion about it in Committee and on Report: although the Bill provides a good framework, there could be some tightening up of the nuts and bolts at the corners and the joints. We must ensure that the Bill provides greater protection for consumers who borrow money, not least the 10 per cent. of consumers in Britain who use home credit at some time in their lives—in other words, they pay back their debt through weekly doorstep payments. I want to focus on strengthening protection for low-income borrowers who are at risk from high-cost credit lenders.

We rightly hear much talk about people getting into difficulties with credit cards and the high rates of interest charged by the high street banks, but I want to focus on the 7.9 million people who do not have a bank account or credit card and turn to doorstep lenders and television and newspaper adverts for cash because they have no alternative. Such people in practice end up paying the most to borrow money, which is sometimes used to provide their daily basics. Unjustifiable charging locks the poorest in our society into deep and long-term debt because they are often left with no alternative if they are to survive from week to week.

Experts in the heady world of economics refer to financial shocks, which are unexpected events. Such events in the everyday world could include the arrival of a new baby because of the need for a pram or carry cot and provisions for that child. If a relationship breaks down, people might need to set up a new home and thus buy a bed, sofa, cooker, curtains and carpets. Youngsters changing schools can cause financial shock because they require new gear and clothing to go there.

At first sight, and under such pressure, a person might think that a payment of £4.99 a week is a manageable offer if that is what is in front of them, but the weekly repayments from home loan companies, credit stores and cash converter businesses involve a huge rack-up of compounding annual percentage and penalty charge rates that can hardly be noticed in the small print. The problem is that people can agree to pay back £4.99 over 156 weeks, but with some firms they end up paying back £432.38. People who borrow £100 cash from some companies will be charged £191.76. Another company about which I heard in my surgery lent someone £100, but they had to pay back £220.24, which is a percentage mark up of 440 per cent. The doorstep lending system is locking many of the poorest people into long-term poverty, if not resulting in the repossession of the little property that they have. Yes, such lending is legal, but it usually involves incredibly high interest rates.

I am grateful for the work of Andrew Hutchinson, a campaigning journalist on the Yorkshire Evening Post, who has talked to people about the situation. It is incredibly difficult for people to come forward and spell out their circumstances, not least because to do so can jeopardise their chances of future borrowing. High-cost borrowing is driving people into debt and despair.

I congratulate Church Action on Poverty on its campaign to end doorstep debt. It has spelt out the need for action. I have been asked whether people who borrow from doorstep lenders are incredibly naïve, simply trying it on or desperate. My answer is that they are all of those things in different degrees. Some people are trying it on, and lenders should be pressed to check rather better whether people have the capacity to repay, rather than simply saying, "We have a check-free approach: here's the money". However, the usual reason that turns people to the home credit market is desperation.

To protect low-income borrowers from high-cost credit, I am still minded to support those who argue for a ceiling on interest rates and charges, because so often it is the compounding of interest and charges that drives people into long-term, unsustainable debt. It can be compounded with roll-over loans that translate a few hundred pounds into thousands, if not the loss of one's house, as we have seen in some recent high-profile cases.

[Mr. John Battle]

In the depression years, a cap was introduced. The Moneylenders Act 1927 provided that a rate of more than 48 per cent. was prima facie excessive and the transaction was therefore deemed harsh and unconscionable. In 1974, the Conservatives' Consumer Credit Act dropped that ceiling. I press the Minister and the House to reconsider putting the ceiling back. There are ceilings on interest rates in many other European countries and many states of the United States of America. Like consumer protection groups, I believe that a cap would protect the poorest from excessive credit charges, especially when people have no alternative to high-cost loans.

I welcome the Minister's commitment to review the need for a cap, but if his review comes up with the need for one, how can it be introduced if we have not used this opportunity of legislation to keep open the option of introducing one? Can we not build into the Bill the option of secondary legislation? A statutory instrument could be subject to affirmative resolution so that the House would be consulted and vote on it, but at least we would have the means to introduce a ceiling. That might act as a warning to those who overcharge.

Andrew Selous: What does the hon. Gentleman say to the counter-argument that a cap on the interest rate might end up increasing the total interest repayable because the term could simply be extended? Should the cap not be on the total amount of interest repayable, rather than on the rate?

Mr. Battle: I said that I was minded to support a cap on interest rates quite deliberately. I do not take a dogmatic attitude to this. We must look at the arithmetic in detail. The hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) made the point that it could all hinge on what we mean by "unfair". That is right. We shall need to clarify in Committee and on Report what "unfair" might mean. If "unfair" is to replace the word "extortionate" in the 1974 Act, everything will hinge on what that means.

Will my hon. Friend the Minister clarify the extent of the powers to control the cost of credit through the licensing system? I want to know whether the add-ons for missing payments, for example, would come under the regulatory powers. To put all that together would cast a different light on my proposition.

The Bill makes a shift from "extortionate" in the 1974 Act to "unfair", but in practice it could mean that everyone has to go to court to sort out what "unfair" is. I cannot believe that that is how the matter should be approached.

Can we not give the financial services ombudsman the power to rule that a credit relationship is unfair so that everyone does not have to go to court? That would bypass the need for individuals to go through that procedure. Why cannot the Financial Ombudsman Service determine questions of unfairness?

Clause 15 shifts the power back in favour of the lender and allows the courts to grant creditors the power to enforce agreements, even when the lender has not provided the information in the first place. That goes against the recommendations of my right hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall). I would therefore be grateful for an assurance that clause 15 will not let lenders off the hook concerning the provision of information. Similarly, people bypass provisions on cold-calling. They are not allowed to sell money on the doorstep, but they can give people a hamper or a voucher. That is a con and it should be dealt with in the Bill. The hon. Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson) said that there must be a balance between the borrower and the lender. I am not out to close the market down, because people need to borrow money. The key word, however, is "fairness". We must spell out what a fair test is so that it works in practice. I passionately believe that we should not drive more and more people under.

I welcome the framework, but we could tighten the structure slightly. We must make some definitions clearer and make sure that the Bill is soon on the statute book, not least because people enduring unsustainable debts, who pay the highest price of all to borrow money for the basics, should not be forced to live in financial misery a single day longer.

4.21 pm

Gregory Barker (Bexhill and Battle) (Con): Today presents a valuable and overdue opportunity to reassess the increasing difficulties in the consumer credit industry. I welcome the Minister's consensual and constructive approach, but it is extremely regrettable that the Secretary of State was not here to open our debate. The DTI hardly has a huge legislative burden this Session, and although the Bill is not partisan or contentious, it is important.

As we have heard, the consumer credit environment has changed drastically since the introduction of the Consumer Credit Act 1974. In 1971, there was a single credit card, but since then, spending on plastic has taken off at a staggering pace, gathering speed with the introduction of our flexible friend in 1972 and the subsequent arrival of the debit card in 1987. In the past 30 years, as my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson) said, there has been a cultural revolution in the provision and take-up of credit. I do not want to turn the clock back or reminisce about a golden era, but it is vital that a 21st-century environment should have a 21st-century legislative framework to govern it, which is why I welcome the Bill.

The battle to win customers has inevitably resulted in the expansion of a competitive market. Today, more than 39 million Britons have a debit card, and 30 million have credit cards. Adding store charge cards to the equation, we have a staggering 130 million cards of various descriptions in circulation, all contributing to the UK's £180 billion credit card and personal loan industry. The existence of such consumer credit opportunities has made payment significantly easier for many individuals, but we cannot ignore the simple fact that when things go wrong financially credit can quickly become an inflexible financial nightmare. No matter how easy repayments seem and how attractive the advertisements appear, dabbling in the personal loan and credit card industry brings the possibility of severe financial risk and social repercussions.

The situation is perhaps best summarised by Diane Gaston, the head of communications at the National Consumer Council, who warned consumers to beware credit advertising deals that are often not as cheap as they first appear. The obvious temptation and notable attraction of low interest rates and easy access to loans should always be measured against consumers' ability to pay off debts if things go wrong in the long term, either through unemployment or ill health. Some responsibility can be laid at the door of consumers, but banks, building societies and other credit companies should be prepared to lend responsibly and resist bombarding consumers with attractive credit deals that are frequently more complex and economically more difficult than consumers imagine. We have heard vivid descriptions of such cases today.

Such considerations must also be balanced alongside the economic policies of the Government, which have clearly inhibited the ability of consumers to save and the incentive for them to do so. Findings show that the amount of money saved has fallen by nearly half since Labour came to power. The massive fall in the savings ratio has helped fuel the present consumer boom and bolster the economy, but it is storing up real problems for future generations.

Mr. Plaskitt: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the savings ratio in this country is strongly geared to the housing market, and that on the two occasions under a Conservative Government when there was a house price boom, the savings ratio fell to levels lower than it is today?

Gregory Barker: There is a grain of truth in what the hon. Gentleman says, and look what happened. If he is arguing that the result will be a recession and another house price collapse like we saw in the early 1990s, my constituents will take that warning from him. I am staggered that anybody could stand up in the House and praise the collapse of the savings ratio. For anybody who is economically literate, it must be a matter of grave concern that people are spending more and more and saving less and less. Whatever asset price inflation has been, the percentage saved against those assets is declining. The hon. Gentleman and his Government who support that culture are storing up problems for future generations.

As hon. Members in the Chamber may know, for some time Consumer Credit Counselling Services has been lobbying for changes, requesting measures that will allow consumers to enter into credit agreements in a far more informed way than they have done to date. We must not ignore individual responsibility, but we cannot expect everyone who enters into a credit transaction to be an expert on all parts of financial accounting relevant to their agreement. As many of us are aware, financial regulations and credit agreements are often complex transactions requiring much time and effort to be invested in understanding them, to ensure maximum benefit for borrowers.

Of course, consumers must make themselves aware of the issues likely to arise, but we should not expect the average person to be a financial expert capable of understanding the frequently confusing and endless small print at the bottom of documents. We must realise that the worst credit arrangements are often taken up by those least able to understand the small print and those who, with a pressing need for credit, are not in a position to shop around. However, it is important that consumers take some responsibility for their financial decisions, so I support measures that encourage consumers to expand their financial knowledge. Personal responsibility cannot and should not be shirked, but for the most vulnerable and least fortunate their circumstances often mean that financial decisions are very difficult and are made quickly and under enormous pressure.

The issue needs to be addressed by both firms and consumers. I applaud the inclusion of clauses requiring creditors to provide people entering into credit arrangements with appropriate financial information. As other hon. Members have said during the debate, we need to ensure in Committee that the Bill enforces clear, like-for-like comparisons. Firms and consumers have a mutual interest in the consumer credit market working more efficiently, which requires confidence and ability to be developed in all parties. I welcome measures by some private and public sector bodies that have been working consistently towards such objectives. I am further encouraged by attempts to establish a national strategy in the Bill that will place legal obligations on parties to provide access to information, raising financial awareness and competence among consumers and businesses.

What impact will the Bill have on financial service businesses? It is our duty as representatives of our constituents to ensure that we legislate for the industry in a manner that provides sufficient safeguards and protection for consumers, especially the most vulnerable. Simultaneously, however, we must also seek to maintain a delicate equilibrium between adequate consumer support and a strategy that does not overburden business without obvious benefit to the consumer.

I draw hon. Members' attention to a point made by British Chambers of Commerce. Although it has strongly supported moves to limit unfair practices in the consumer credit market, it has warned that businesses should not be subject to over-burdensome legislation that has no positive effect. I am sure that my hon. Friends agree that there is little to be gained by imposing unnecessary regulations on an industry without any benefit to consumers. It is therefore imperative to recognise that although the Consumer Credit Act 1974 has served some consumers well for many years, it has little to do with the new consumer credit realities of today.

The progression of time, the varying needs and demands of consumers and the advancing pace of the credit market require the reconsideration and reassessment of present consumer credit legislation. Such efforts will ensure that we implement the structure best able to offer the necessary and appropriate levels of protection to both companies and, most importantly, consumers.

A similar sentiment is apparent in the data collected by the consumer magazine Which?, which regularly publishes reports relating to consumer issues. Last week, it released a critical report on the consumer credit industry highlighting existing unacceptable practices, which range from high penalty charges issued on late payments to the hard selling of insurance polices, all of which involves targeting vulnerable consumers up and down the country.

[Gregory Barker]

Importantly, Which? has also responded favourably to the announcement of plans to reform the existing legislation by asserting, as we have recognised today, that the 1974 Act is "desperately in need of an overhaul", and that

"transparent information and products will create a truly competitive market".

I shall briefly return to spiralling levels of household debt. Although I have already outlined my support for measures to update legislation that is ill suited to our current credit climate, my support for the Bill is strengthened by my concern about spiralling levels of household debt. Although the Government inherited a history of household debt—as others have said, it took some 600 years to amass—it has doubled in this Labour Government's lifetime to more than £1 trillion.

Chris Bryant: Several hon. Members have raised, to use the hon. Gentleman's words, "spiralling household debt". In fact, because interest rates are at their lowest level for the past 30 years, the proportion of household income that people spend on debt has fallen over the past four years, so they have been able to pay those bills.

Gregory Barker: The hon. Gentleman makes an interesting point, but he knows that a low rise in interest rates would have a disproportionately high effect on household budgets. If interest rates had increased by 2 per cent. 10 or 12 years ago, that increase would have been easily accommodated in household budgets. If interest rates were to rise by 2 per cent. now, however, it would have a huge effect on household budgets, because people budget for very low interest rates. A small movement in interest rates could have a devastating effect, which we would all see in our surgeries. There is no way to escape the fact that spiralling household debt in the UK is a worrying issue.

In one of its reports, Grant Thornton states:

"Consumer debt is at a historical high, having broken the trillion pound mark, and now amounts to more than the whole external debt of Africa and South America combined ... Contributing to this still-growing debt mountain is the fact that UK consumers now have a heady total of more than 66 million credit cards at their fingertips—a worrying five times more than the European average".

It is not feasible for Labour Members to pretend that there is not a problem.

Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): Is the hon. Gentleman honest enough to admit that his prescription means that if the Conservative party were ever to gain power, it would freeze all new mortgages and no one would be able to borrow money to buy a house?

Gregory Barker: I am afraid that that is a frivolous intervention. The Bill has nothing to do with the Conservatives—it is a Government Bill that we are supporting and trying to improve. Making frivolous points like that does not advance the argument very far.

US credit consumers receive notably better protection than their British counterparts. On the other side of the Atlantic, consumers have the Truth in Lending Act, the Equal Credit Opportunity Act and the protection of the Unfair Debt Collection Act, ensuring that the consumer credit playing field is significantly fairer to all participants. The Fair Credit Billing Act has also done much to enable errors associated with credit arrangements to be investigated and swiftly put right.

Examining the relationship from the perspective of the lender in the USA, there is a clearly defined duty requiring lenders to "know their customer" by recognising the consumer's credit needs and requirements and matching them with appropriate credit services. I was struck by the moving story told by the right hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall). Had the lending institution that he mentioned known its customers, one would hope that it would not have provided credit in a way that produced such a great deal of misery for his constituents.

Some US states have progressed even further, demanding that legal action be taken against credit card companies who have, through irresponsible methods of lending, trapped customers into a spiral of escalating debt. While America has responded to match an evolving credit landscape with improvements and developments in legislation, the British consumer has been left with the Consumer Credit Act 1974—legislation that simply does not reflect the debt reality of Britain today.

Such concerns about the problem of indebtedness were recently acknowledged by the Bank of England in its financial stability review. It notes in its studies of the potential long-term financial outlook for this nation the risks that personal debt may pose to the macro-economic stability of this nation, and urges that the seriousness of that statistic be appreciated. Although I am cautious about how far the Bill will be able to resolve many of the issues of personal indebtedness, I remain supportive of the steps that it will take in moving towards making that a more realistic possibility.

I have been lobbied—as, I am sure, have many hon. Members—by several interest groups and people in my constituency. I was particularly struck by the e-mail that I received from Mr. Ian Clark on behalf of the diocese of Chichester, which covers Sussex and includes my constituency. He says:

"On behalf of the Diocese of Chichester, the church applauds the improvements that the Bill proposes to the regulation of consumer credit in this country—the current legislation is over 30 years old and clearly in need of significant improvement."

He points out:

"The UK has the highest levels of consumer debt in Europe—relative to incomes it is higher even than the well-known debt problems in the USA. Our churches have to deal on a daily basis with the results of crippling debt".

He remarks that MPs too will regularly see in our surgeries the problems that it throws up, and continues:

"The results are not just personal financial ruin, but health and psychological problems, homelessness and family breakdown.

My churches believe that the Bill needs to be strengthened even further in a few key areas to more adequately protect low-income borrowers from high-cost credit and predatory practices. They note that the consumer credit industry has been investigated by the OFT and recently referred to the Competition Commission. They also note that the Consumers' Association's recent Which? report highlighted many of the unfair practices" in its report, "Sneaky Tricks and Hidden Charges".

Mr. Clark made a particular request that we consider certain amendments in Committee, the first of which is:

"To give the power for the Government to introduce maximum levels of interest and charges if this proves necessary in future—at the moment many poor debtors suffer scandalously high marginal APR percentages and unreasonable . . . charges".

Several Labour Members expressed interest in that today, and it will bear consideration in Committee. Such an important issue needs to be addressed in primary legislation.

The next proposed amendment is:

"To introduce an affordability test that will reduce irresponsible lending by some . . . finance companies—see Clause 19."

The next amendment reads:

"To improve the OFT's regulatory licensing powers over lenders and intermediaries—see clause 38, including fines that are reasonable in light of the severity of offence—similar to the FSA model, not limited to £50,000".

I share that concern and we shall test that matter, too, in Committee.

Another suggested amendment proposes that clause 15 should require lenders to provide better and more prominent information to borrowers in line with the recommendation of the Treasury Committee. The clause does not currently require lenders to provide comprehensive and clear information.The diocese also suggests that the use of time orders by the courts should be encouraged through clarifying sections 129, 130 and 136 of the 1974 Act.

We cannot escape the fact that legislation is needed to keep pace with developments in the consumer credit industry. We need to do more to protect the most vulnerable in society from aggressively marketed and unscrupulous lenders. The picture of spiralling household debt that I have described appears throughout the nation, affecting all regions and reflected in the entire spectrum of society. The problems associated with consumer credit have created an untenable financial position that requires urgent attention. Legislation must meet the realities of the consumer credit market.

The Bill is welcome but far from perfect and requires proper scrutiny and improvement in Committee. However, I support the provisions that are aimed at creating a more favourable balance for the consumer, establishing a competitive environment, removing rogue traders while inspiring consumer confidence in the credit market and ensuring a more promising credit landscape in the future.

4.41 pm

Ross Cranston (Dudley, North) (Lab): I welcome the Bill, which must be viewed in the wider context of "Promoting Financial Inclusion", which the Treasury published as part of the pre-Budget report, and the strategy on over-indebtedness. Both documents emphasised the role that credit unions can play. However, it is high time for a review. I accept and welcome the fact that we have a vibrant credit industry but there are casualties to whom we must give attention.

First, I welcome the information provisions. Parts of the industry, such as the Finance and Leasing Association, have criticised, for example, the warnings, the notice of arrears and the notice and information provisions on default. However, I believe that they constitute a proportionate response.

Secondly, I welcome the changes in the licensing provisions. From the publication of the first edition of Cranston's "Consumers and the Law" in 1979, I have criticised those provisions on the basis that they were the nuclear option. One had to withdraw the licence, which was not a practical step. The Bill contains a graduated response in the detailed restrictions that can be imposed and the civil penalties. However, I accept that the civil penalty of £50,000 should be alterable by statutory instrument.

The licensing provisions are important in the context of shark lending. The citizens advice bureau in Dudley has given me a list of the intimidating behaviour of some rogue lenders that includes bullying, telephoning debtors at work and at relatives' houses, telephoning at all hours of the day and night, claiming that goods can be repossessed when they cannot because the debtor has made payments beyond the limit that the legislation prescribes, and saying that clients are liable for the debts of others such as close relations.

However, the problem is not confined to what I have just described. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) pointed out, the big banks also have a responsibility. Let me give one example from my constituency. A bank lent a 71-year-old lady, who is on pension credit, £1,700. Her monthly income is just under £490 and she has to pay £418 a month. The result is penury.

Much depends on enforcement. Tomorrow, I shall visit the west midlands anti-loan shark pilot, which the Department of Trade and Industry set up. I commend that initiative. I have already been in correspondence with Tony Quigley and his team. They have identified one lender in the west midlands region that charges an annual percentage rate of between 8,000 and 10,000 per cent., with hundreds of clients. The team has already done good work in getting what are in effect injunctions against some lenders. They say that their hand would be strengthened if they had a power of arrest for illegal moneylending on the basis that if the perpetrators were arrested, clients and victims would come forward.

Thirdly, I want to deal with the unfairness provisions. The hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien) made a good point when he said that we need more definition by the time the Bill reaches Committee. The old moneylending provision involving the presumptive 48 per cent. unfair interest rate is no longer appropriate. Unfairness itself is not an objectionable test; it operates in the context of the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999. The regulations, however, contain a grey list that identifies what might be unfair. There is a good argument for saying that unfairness should be specified to a greater extent; otherwise, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) said, every district judge in the country could come up with a different decision, resulting in cases going up to the Court of Appeal. The Government should specify the criteria in that respect.

I take the point in the briefing from Citizens Advice that the restriction of the application of this provision where judgment has been secured is objectionable. The reason is quite simple. Many such judgments are reached by default; the consumer has had no say in the matter and the judgments are simply rubber-stamped. There needs to be a mechanism whereby those judgments can be challenged.

I very much welcome the use of the financial ombudsman; this is a real example of alternative dispute resolution. There are other provisions in the Bill which I also welcome. There are also omissions, as some of my hon. Friends have pointed out. One point that has not been mentioned is the section 75 issue, which involves the question whether consumer credit payments abroad are covered. The academic view has always been that they are, but a High Court judge said in a recent decision that they are not. This is a good opportunity to clarify that matter.

Commentators such as Professor Sir Roy Goode have pointed out a number of defects in the current legislation. They are technical defects, and I think that I had better write to my hon. Friend the Minister about them.

In summary, this is a good Bill, and I very much hope that, with the beneficial tinkering that I have talked about, it will be an even better one.

4.46 pm

Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): We should all agree, in a debate in which we are making considerable criticisms of the lending industry, that responsible lending is important to all our constituents in helping them to navigate the financial pressures that we all face at various times in our lives. It is ridiculously easy, however, for our constituents to borrow wholly irresponsibly at a time when debt has spiralled and savings have plummeted. Total personal debt in the UK now stands at £1 trillion. I am not a mathematician, but it might be helpful to the mathematically unfamiliar if I say that a trillion is a 1 with 12 noughts after it. Unsecured personal debt has doubled since 1997. The director of policy advice at Citizens Advice reported on 30 July 2004 that, over the past six years, there had been a 44 per cent. increase in the number of people coming into CABs with debt problems. This is not debt that people can cope with easily. We know from Citizens Advice, which everyone has praised today, that this is a widespread national problem.

I would like to give credit to the two citizens advice bureaux in my constituency, and to praise the excellent work that they do in Dunstable and Leighton Buzzard. I am grateful for the funding that they receive from South Bedfordshire district council, which in some cases helps them to employ additional financial advisers. I am also delighted that a credit union is about to be set up in the Downside area of Dunstable. I would like to see more credit unions in operation because they have an excellent record of operating in many areas of our constituencies that other financial institutions do not reach.

David Taylor: Will the hon. Gentleman rejoice with me at the item in this week's Co-operative News which records that the 500th member of the south-west Durham credit union is one Anthony Blair? Does not this demonstrate that credit unions appeal to all sections of society, not just the less well-off or the left of centre?

Andrew Selous: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. I believe that the President of the United States of America is also a member of a credit union. I intend to join the credit union set up recently in my constituency. He is right—they are for everyone, and more power to their elbow. They are excellent institutions.

We have heard horrendous stories of suicides, which have hit the papers, of people who have got into untenable debt and have seen no way out. I am struck, however, by the fact that in 70 per cent. of marriage breakdowns, financial problems are cited as one of the principal reasons. We should all be conscious of that. It is excellent that both Relate and community family trusts, which do excellent preventive work in terms of relationship support, are providing money advice to couples. Obviously, in all cases, prevention is better than cure.

I was interested to hear that one of the Acts in the United States of America is called Truth in Lending, as that should sum up what the Consumer Credit Bill is about—honesty, transparency, people knowing what they are getting themselves into and not having nasty shocks and surprises, and the industry acting sensibly and responsibly at all times. Above all, that means people knowing the interest rates that they will pay before they take out a loan, how long they will pay the loan for, and having that data well in advance.

Clearly, data sharing is important. Companies that lend need to know what other loans people have. It is ridiculous that at the moment, if people shop around a number of different credit lending companies to get the best value loan, and then they do not take up the offer, that can cause their credit rating to deteriorate, and they are regarded as a worse credit risk purely for acting sensibly and trying to shop around for the best possible loan. Penalising someone who has tried to act responsibly is completely the wrong result, and I hope that practice is stopped.

It is imperative that the lending industry operates under the general proviso of really knowing its customers. That is what it is all about. I want clause 15 to bring about a situation in which, if a lender knowingly lends irresponsibly, that loan will not be enforceable in the courts. It is a little disappointing that we are uncertain about that at the moment. We will have to see how the courts pronounce on such cases, as it is an important principle. If we can establish that knowingly irresponsible lending will not be enforceable, that, probably above all else, will stop the lending industry acting in such a manner.

There need to be clearer "wealth warnings" to people who are about to take out loans. For example, in relation to those advertisements that say, "Consolidate all your debts, roll them all up into one loan and you will be better off," a lot of people do not realise that they are moving from unsecured loans to secured loans, so their home could be in danger. There have been instances of people losing their home through not realising that, which is very regrettable and should not happen.

Payment protection insurance is a scam and a racket. Under the terms on which it is provided by many credit lenders, it is extremely bad value for money, and can very often be provided considerably more cheaply elsewhere. People who borrow should be able to cancel payment protection insurance separately, and it should not be a condition that it is wound up with their loan. People should be offered proper value for money.

It is appalling that someone with a £10,000 loan should be twice as likely to have his or her credit limit increased automatically, as if the full amount owed were paid each month. The credit card companies like people who manage to make only the minimum repayments and they like people with large debts, because they know they will make more money out of those people. The industry will have to do something about the irresponsible increasing of credit limits.

As I said earlier in an intervention, there should be much clearer warnings about credit card cheques, which attract an interest charge the moment they are received by the credit card companies. That is not made clear in the literature. It should be highlighted in large print in statements when they are sent out.

I am sure we all agree that prevention is better than cure. Mention has been made today of proper financial education. I welcome the work done by citizens advice bureaux and schools, but I think that money education should be tied closely to significant life events that affect people's finances—losing one's job, for instance, or wanting to send one's child to university, which has become considerably more expensive under this Government. Other examples are a relationship break-up, the birth of a child and even a change of school, as was mentioned earlier.

I think it would be best for financial information to be provided at the time of such major events in a clear, simple form. It could be provided in a number of places: clear, simple leaflets could be provided in surgeries, hospitals, jobcentres and libraries. I cannot envisage people queuing for a course on financial literacy on a wet Saturday afternoon, but I can envisage them picking up a small, sensible, easy-to-understand leaflet while they wait to see a doctor, at a jobcentre or at the local library. Such advice must be independent, so that our constituents can trust it.

I realise that a number of others wish to speak, so I will end my speech.

4.57 pm

Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith) (Lab/Co-op): I, too, am conscious of the number of Members who wish to speak, so I will confine myself to just a few remarks. Like all who have spoken I welcome the Bill, and I echo the tributes paid to organisations such as the citizens advice bureaux, not just for the work that they do in my constituency and many others but for the effective way in which they, and Citizens Advice Scotland, have lobbied for the legislation and helped to create consensus.

First, I want to comment on the unfairness test which replaces the extortionate credit test. I agreed with what was said by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston) and the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce) about the need for a more specific definition of the unfairness test. However, I was struck by the comment of Citizens Advice in its briefing that one of the benefits of the proposal is that there is no attempt to define "unfair" in a way that would restrict its ordinary popular sense. If any attempt is made to define the test in Committee, it should not lead to any reduction in the benefits that it could bring.

It is in the nature of the credit industry that as one door is shut another is opened, and a new wheeze is dreamt up. Credit card cheques are an example. I do not think that they existed 10 years ago, and I find it hard to believe that they serve any social purpose. Too precise a definition might prevent us from changing our responses in accordance with the changing practices of lenders; that will be an important point to pursue in Committee.

I will be interested to hear from the Minister, if he has time, about the thinking behind the Government's decision not to include in the Bill details about the unfairness criteria. I hope that he can at least confirm today that the new unfairness test will be very broad. He has already said that the threshold will be lower than that for the extortionate credit test, and I certainly hope that the unfairness test will include considerations such as the content of advertising, the way in which, and the type of people at whom, credit is marketed, and the circumstances in which credit is advertised and marketed. The test will of course also have to take into account the individual circumstances of a particular borrower. What might be unfair for one borrower might not be so for another, given their particular experience or capacity in the financial sector.

I shall also briefly refer to time orders and their applicability to Scotland; indeed, this is an important issue for the UK as a whole. The general view is that the time order provision has not been used as much as it could have been, even in England, but there certainly is a particular problem in Scotland. Although this is a reserved matter, it has implications for the way in which the courts—and, in due course, alternative dispute resolution—will operate in Scotland, so it is an important issue to sort out.

I am surprised that the Bill does not make it clear that lay representation will be available in the Scottish courts for those who wish to act on behalf of people seeking time orders. In the initial consultation paper on tackling loan sharks, which was published some three years ago, the Government said that they "proposed to amend the Act"

the Consumer Credit Act 1974

"to make it clear that lay representation should be allowed when applications for Time Orders are made".

The summary of responses to that document pointed out that

"respondents overwhelmingly favoured allowing lay representation" in Scotland. I am not sure why this aspect of the provisions affecting Scotland got lost somewhere en route. I hope that it was not because someone decided that things were getting awfully complex, and that we should perhaps leave it out at this stage, rather than getting caught up between the levels of Scottish and UK government.

This is an important issue that needs to be addressed, particularly in Scotland. I doubt whether a Sewel motion is required, but in case one is, I should point out that one of the beauties of devolution and of having a unicameral Scottish Parliament is that measures can be put through very quickly. I am sure that Westminster and Scotland between them could get a Sewel motion through in the next couple of weeks, given the broad support among all the parties for this important measure.

I want to say something about the limit on the penalty that can be imposed on credit businesses that breach the Office of Fair Trading requirements. I agree that the £50,000 limit is much too low. Some of the organisations whose activities need to be stamped out are not mere back-street lenders; they are big organisations, for which £50,000 is nothing. There is no reason, therefore, for having a limit on the civil penalty that can be imposed. If I have read the proposals correctly—I might not have done so—the penalty can be imposed only if a requirement imposed by the OFT is broken. However, where a particular activity of a credit business is deemed to be unfair and has affected hundreds or thousands of consumers, but it then stops that activity, it will be impossible to impose a civil penalty. The OFT's power to impose a penalty will be restricted in a way that, broadly speaking, that of the Financial Services Authority is not. This issue needs to be looked at.

Finally, I hope that this debate sends out a clear message to our financial services industry. There has been great pressure for such legislation because in selling credit, too many lenders, including some of the biggest names in the industry, have engaged in practices that were frankly outrageous. I shall not go into them today, but we know of the examples to which many Members have referred. However, I am pleased to say that many people in the financial services industry have cleaned up their act and made a clear commitment to improve the way in which they sell their products.

What we need is not just legislation but a change in attitude, so that whenever a new product is dreamed up or new financial wheezes are brought from the drawing boards, the first consideration should not be how to make the maximum profit. That, of course, is part of the industry, and I want to see a successful financial services industry because thousands of jobs in my constituency depend on it. At the same time as thinking about the profits to be made, however, the financial services industry should also consider whether it is being fair to the consumer and the borrower. That is the sort of thinking that should apply when new products are being put on the market, and it is one reason why I am attracted to a broad definition of the unfairness test. If people thought that they could be caught by a broadening of that test, there would be less chance of a bad product going on the market in the first place. Overall, this is a good Bill in every sense, and I pay tribute to the constructive way in which it has been introduced to Parliament.

5.6 pm

Mr. Michael Weir (Angus) (SNP): On behalf of the Scottish National party and Plaid Cymru, I broadly welcome the Bill and we will support it. We believe that the new definition of unfairness is a major step forward that will start to attack the problem of excessive credit charges. However, in an earlier intervention on the Minister, I expressed some concerns about whether it would attack the root of the problem—the fact that only a few cases ever came to court. I accept that under the new definition that may change, and I welcome dispute resolution, despite the fact that I used to earn my crust as a lawyer. In these particular circumstances, such resolution could prove very useful, but I still feel that many people who are suffering under such agreements will never come forward, whatever the test.

Following the Meadows case I, with other Members, met representatives of the Office of Fair Trading to discuss the powers available to it. It appears that although the courts may find an agreement to be excessive, under the present law there are no powers to examine other agreements granted by a company. I appreciate that there is the matter of resources, and that this may be difficult, but will the Minister consider whether the intermediate sanction given to the OFT could include the power to order a company at least to alert other lenders to the judgment against it, and to investigate the terms of similar loans to establish whether they could be dealt with, without people having to go through the suffering of bringing a court case in the future?

In the Meadows case, the loan was granted by a company different from the one that finally became the defendant in the action. The loan had been sold on, which is not unusual in the financial services world. What concerned me when I spoke to the OFT was that it appeared that even when a company's licence was suspended or revoked, there was nothing to prevent it from simply selling on the loan book to another company, with the loans continuing under the same terms and conditions. Although a company had been struck off for excessive charges or other actions, its loans were not subsequently checked. That is wrong. There should be some procedure for alerting people to that problem. If a company has granted one loan, it is likely to have granted many others in similar circumstances. Will the Minister consider granting the OFT that power?

The most glaring omission from the Bill is the absence of any attempt to introduce rate capping, and it was interesting to hear some of the debate on that. We accept that debt incurred on the doorstep has been a pressing matter. Even if a power is not introduced at this stage, there is the possibility of introducing it through secondary legislation, should that be proved necessary by the review undertaken by the Department of Trade and Industry. We believe that it is necessary to tackle the problem.

Enough has been said this afternoon about the extent of the debt problem, and I shall not rehearse that. Suffice it to say that Citizens Advice Scotland, in its "On the Cards" report, shows that there has been a 64 per cent. increase in the average debt since 2001, and it now stands at more than £13,000. I noted that the BBC said this morning that calls to the consumer credit helpline had increased by 71 per cent. in the last year or so. That represents a tremendous increase in the amount of indebtedness in society, and shows just how deeply ingrained the problem is.

According to "debt on our doorstep", more than 3 million people on very low incomes have to borrow money at interest rates of between 150 and 200 per cent. We have heard examples today far above those rates. Even store cards from reputable stores charge interest rates of around 30 per cent.

Much has been said about financial literacy, but one of the problems is that people do not understand APR, AER and many of the other acronyms presented to them. How many people read the detail of an agreement before signing it? Very few, I suspect. In the days when interest rates were rising sharply towards a 15 per cent. base rate, many lenders simply extended the terms of loans and sold them on the basis of the monthly repayment rather than the APR. Many of our fellow citizens did not understand that practice.

A statutory cap is not a new idea, or indeed a particularly radical one. It existed in the UK before the 1974 Act and still exists in many European countries and in several US states. I appreciate that a cap does not appear in the Bill, but is under review. I strongly urge that the review be carried out swiftly. If the financial services industry does not get its act together as a result of the Bill the cap will be necessary, and should be introduced quickly. We only have to look at the never ending stream of credit offers coming through our letterboxes to see just how many companies want credit business, and I do not think that a cap would slow that down.

The exact terms of clauses 12 and 13 do give us some concern. Clearly, we welcome the main thrust of the clauses and the provisions relating to default notices. Two points arise, however. The level of the default sum is not stated in the Bill, and it will be of little use if it is set too high. It has been suggested in lobbying that it could be £50, yet many of the default sums are currently set at between £20 and £25, so would not be covered by the clauses. Perhaps the Minister could share with us his thinking on the amount.

The second problem is that there is no provision as to the frequency with which charges may be imposed under the ceiling. For example, if the ceiling were £50, a succession of smaller charges under that figure could be imposed without restraint. The consumer would not have the benefit of being able to pay off a loan without incurring interest charges.

I am conscious of the time constraints in the debate so I shall end with one point on the issue raised by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz) about time orders. I agree with him about the necessity to bring Scotland into line with the rest of the UK. From my previous experience I know that time orders can be very useful. In Scotland lay representation was originally allowed with such orders, but a problem arose because provision for that did not appear in the original legislation—the Debtors (Scotland) Act 1897. Following representations, it was decided that it breached the Scottish rules of court.

A similar problem would arise from simply amending the Bill. The rules of court needed amending with regard to the representation on which Citizens Advice Scotland has lobbied. Under the present rules, anyone seeking a time order has to pay to have the order served on the defendant, but under the English system, they do not have to pay. Because of the rules of court in Scotland, the sheriff clerk cannot serve it on behalf of the applicant free of charge.

My party and I believe that both those matters must be dealt with quickly. I am not convinced that that can be done merely through an amendment to the Bill; a Sewel motion may be necessary. However, I have spoken to my colleagues in Edinburgh, and as we are keen for the matter to be dealt with, we will co-operate in any way necessary to bring it forward, to ensure that people in Scotland who want to benefit from a time order can do so fully.

5.15 pm

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Ochil) (Lab): Owing to the lateness of the hour, I shall not take up much of the House's time.

I welcome the Bill and the introduction of the unfairness test rather than the use of the word "extortionate". The test is helpful and will be preferable to an interest rate ceiling. As we know, interest rates do not reflect the cost of loans; there are a number of other factors, so the provision offers a good initial way of looking at the matter. However, we need a fail-safe to enable us speedily to improve the system by statutory instrument if the need arises. The matter need not take the proportions suggested by Conservative Front Benchers. I understand their points but, despite having the best of intentions, they are wrong on this issue. There should be provision for the introduction of a statutory instrument. The length of time that we have had to wait for the Bill means that we probably cannot afford to wait too long for changes that are more in the nature of fine tuning than fine principle.

We should look carefully at the fines ceiling of £50,000, which is far too low. As several Members have pointed out, the type of businesses we are talking about are not hole-in-the-wall operations; for many of them, £50,000 would be nothing. It should be possible to adopt a more pragmatic form of words to enable us to alter the provisions if the case for doing so can be shown.

Before Christmas, many of us were afraid that the Bill would not come before the House. The apparent sketchiness of some of its provisions may be attributable to the speed with which my hon. Friend the Minister was able to persuade others to get it into the pipeline. I imagine that there will be an incredible number of amendments in Committee to stiffen some provisions and to give others clearer definition. Draftspeople are probably working on them even as we speak.

As the Chairman of a Select Committee, I am, sadly, normally excused from participating in Standing Committees—actually, I do not really want to. In 1983, a group of us were dealing with the Mental Health Bill and had been working on it for several months. It was the first such Bill since 1959 and in the run-up to the 1983 general election, we eventually got through a compromise. More than 20 years later, another Mental Health Bill is being considered. I want to point out to my hon. Friend that legislation of that nature does not happen quickly, which is all the more reason for a pragmatic, open-ended approach to some of the provisions that several of us have identified as controversial.

I am not normally relaxed about, or praising of, the Scottish nationalists, but the last statement in the speech of the hon. Member for Angus (Mr. Weir) was encouraging. It is important to deal with time orders as expeditiously and as felicitously as possible. If we can have agreement in both Edinburgh and London that that is necessary and desirable, with a good will we can get those provisions through, too. That will greatly enhance for the whole United Kingdom what promises to be an extremely effective and encouraging piece of legislation. It will make the lives of many of our people much easier. Those people may be vulnerable, stupid, indolent—we could apply any number of adjectives—but, more than anything else, they look to Parliament for help and assistance. The Bill, and my hon. Friend the Minister's encouraging remarks, give us the chance to do something about that. I welcome the measure.

5.19 pm

John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): I wish to ask my hon. Friend the Minister several questions, which I am sure he will answer at an early stage of the Bill's progress, if not today.

It is salutary to remember that during the two weeks in which the United Nations put together a record £2 billion for south-east Asia, World Bank profits over that period exceeded that amount. Does the Minister agree that, given that bank profits remain at record levels, if banks are not prepared to regulate themselves properly so that they are fair to consumers, it is appropriate for politicians to regulate them? However unwelcome such regulation might be in principle, it is being forced upon us.

Over the past year, I have dealt with three cases that are relevant to the Bill. The Minister is aware of the Lewis case, which ended in tragic circumstances. It is a tribute to Mrs. Lewis that she has represented well the interests of all families who live with the consequences of debt. I also dealt with a family who were about to lose their house because of mortgage debts, and with a woman who had never worked, yet had £14,000 of debt, all of which was due to credit given by the big banks. Is it appropriate that it should be left to my negotiating skills—however good or bad—to resolve such problems? Should not a systematic approach be provided by the banks, or put in statute, to resolve them, rather than relying on people such as me—in essence, the voluntary sector?

Should we not legislate to deal with the credit card cheques that the banks issue? The Co-operative Bank has specific links with the Labour movement, yet I recently received four credit cheques from it. Does the Minister agree that it is unethical for the so-called ethical Labour movement bank to issue credit cheques? Will he join me in calling on the Co-operative Bank to take a lead among all banks by refusing to issue such credit cheques to anyone in future?

Does the Minister believe that the banks should use a debt-to-income ratio for credit applications, similar to that used for mortgage applications? Does he agree that in addition to annual credit statements from credit suppliers, people should receive a consolidated credit statement similar to that available to consumers in the United States? Does he share my regret that when the banks discussed a voluntary system of sharing information within the Association for Payment Clearing Services, one of this country's major banks was not prepared to agree with the others that credit requires self-regulation?

5.23 pm

Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington) (Lab): I welcome the Bill and the secondary legislation that the Government introduced towards the end of last year. Taking them as a package, I am pleased by the Department's response to the points that we on the Treasury Committee emphasised following our investigative work over the past couple of years, which was thoroughly covered in the speech made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall), the Committee Chairman.

During our investigation, we found a worryingly long list of the industry's failings. They fell into three categories, the first of which was failures of transparency. Illustrations of that included unreadable contract information—literally unreadable in some cases; too much misleading promotional material; and incalculable APRs. I am pleased that some of those issues have been picked up in the secondary legislation that has already been discussed elsewhere in Parliament.

The second category involved questions about the industry's real competitiveness. One of the most glaring examples that we found was store cards. Virtually a cartel operates, and we are still looking at interest rates of about 30 per cent. In some cases, the rates have not been revisited or reduced since 1999. I am pleased that, partly as a result of the issues that the Select Committee teased out in the inquiry, the Competition Commission is looking at the store card industry. I hope that its review will have some consequences for how the industry conducts itself.

The third category involves unfair trading practices. I come back to the unsolicited issuing of credit card cheques. There is one glaring omission in the Bill: it contains nothing that will help us deal with those cheques, which are sent to 16 per cent. of UK households. Virtually every issue is unsolicited, and evidence shows that they are sent to a greater than average proportion of cardholders who are already experiencing some form of financial difficulties. The Treasury Committee concluded from our investigations that in many instances the cheques are sent out irresponsibly by some lenders.

Last year's Government White Paper appeared to agree with us. At paragraph 5.62, it cites as an example of irresponsible lending "unsolicited issuing of cheques that can be used to draw on credit card accounts".

I hoped that, as that example was flagged up in the White Paper, we would see some follow-through in the Bill. I hope that there will be time in Committee to consider amendments to cover that.

Credit card cheques are simply not necessary. They did not exist a few years ago and they are a wretched development in the expansion of consumer credit. Unlike credit cards, they offer no interest-free period. Interest starts as soon as the cheque is used. The rate of interest can be double that for the credit card to which they are nominally attached. There is a handling fee of 2 per cent., which does not apply to the credit card. There is less consumer protection for the transaction than if it had been made by credit card. Such transactions are far less secure against fraud than those made by credit card, yet in virtually all cases in which they are used, the consumer could have made the purchase using the credit card itself.

We have to ask what the real purpose of credit card cheques is and why the industry continues to promote them. The Treasury Committee asked for a number of measures to deal with them. We asked for clearer information on terms and conditions, statements on the cheques about applicable APRs and notice that interest was payable immediately. We asked that companies make it clear to users that they have less protection if they use credit card cheques than they have under any other aspect of consumer protection legislation, and that credit checking be carried out before they are issued.

I take the view that the existence of credit card cheques is indefensible. I accept that it may be difficult to go straight to banning the practice. When we had the chief executives before the Select Committee, I asked them to justify the unsolicited issuing of credit card cheques and I found that they could not. Although their explanations were possible defences for the existence of credit card cheques, none of them had a defence for the unsolicited issuing of them. The truth is that they are a purely cynical, opportunistic marketing opportunity—an enticement to users to use up their credit limit. One has only to look at the glossy promotional material that comes with the cheques to find confirmation of that. The literature says, "Use this for a gift, for a treat, for a holiday, to pay the school fees, to pay a utility bill or even the council tax bill." To suggest to consumers that they should undertake expenditure of that nature using the most expensive form of credit available is irresponsible.

It seems to me that the industry hopes that the cheques will flop on to the doormat on the same day as a glossy holiday brochure—that the consumer will put two and two together and end up paying six for it. I am not convinced that there is a case for those cheques, and they should certainly not be sent unsolicited. They are not part of the fair relationship that the Bill seeks to achieve. They do not help to achieve affordability, because they are the most expensive form of credit. They are not responsible lending. The industry says that when it introduces its revised code in March it will deal with some of these matters and offer consumers the right to opt out, but that does not come close to achieving what needs to be done. We must go much further, and we should require an opt-in. Cheques should be issued to consumers only if they actively request them.

The Bill provides an opportunity to end the unsolicited issuing of such cheques. It is a good Bill, but it is incomplete. If we could add such a provision, it would be much better.

5.30 pm

Mr. Wayne David (Caerphilly) (Lab): The Bill has been a long time coming but, nevertheless, it is welcome and it has been worth the wait. It is to the Government's credit that it commands a consensus, and it has been introduced following a tremendous amount of consultation with various parts of the industry.

As a Caerphilly MP, I welcome the Bill. Soon after I was elected in 2001, I had a meeting with the manager of the Bargoed citizens advice bureau. I asked him what was the issue of greatest concern to him and the town of Bargoed. He said that without question it was the issue of indebtedness. At the end of 2001, I read the results of the greater Gwent survey on indebtedness, which made the stark statement that there was a direct correlation between areas of deprivation and credit use. It cited Blaenau Gwent, the poorest region in the county—indeed, it is one of the poorest in the whole country—as having the worst levels of indebtedness. Monmouthshire, one of the most affluent areas, had a comparatively good record. It showed, too, that in the previous two years, in the borough of Caerphilly, part of which I represent, 7 per cent. of the population had been contacted by money lenders, many of whom were unregistered. Up to 57 per cent. of people who had taken out loans had experienced personal difficulties with those money lenders. That graphically depicts the scale of the problem.

A constituent came to my surgery a couple of years ago. Not unusually, she had taken out a loan of £20,000 and had signed a contract agreeing to an interest rate of 1.97 per cent. a month. That does not seem very much, but the annualised rate was 22 per cent. She discovered before long that she was paying £70,000 on a £20,000 loan, and found herself in court facing a debt of £100,000, a sum that she could never hope to repay. Similarly, a single parent who found herself in financial difficulty was approached in her local club by a supposedly friendly gentleman who offered her a helpful loan of £200. He said that there were no strings attached, but a few weeks later he knocked on her door asking for the £200 with an extra £200 in interest. That is a clear example of the problems that we are up against.

Sometimes, those problems can be resolved by people working together and by the police. However, I took the initiative on the issue of indebtedness with the local newspaper, the Rhymney Valley Express, and we ran a joint campaign against the loan sharks. We sought to highlight the issue and raise awareness, and we stressed the viable alternative of credit unions. The campaign also argued forcefully for changes in the law. That is why I am pleased with the legislative proposals before us.

As many hon. Members have said, the Bill has innumerable good features. Central is the proposition that we should introduce a concept of fairness to replace the concept of extortionate credit. I welcome that provision in clause 19, but there is room for clarification. I strongly recommend that the proposals from the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux be considered carefully by the Government and in Committee.

NACAB has produced an excellent briefing on various aspects of the Bill. There is much to commend those proposals. While the Bill may not be as strong as many of us would have wanted, it is undoubtedly a huge step forward. I urge hon. Members in all parts of the House to support it this evening, and I hope it gets on to the statute book as quickly as humanly possible.

5.35 pm

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury) (Con): It is a pleasure to wind up the debate for the official Opposition. It has been a good natured and well informed debate, and I shall deal in a moment with some of the contributions.

I, too, regret the absence of the Secretary of State, but I pay tribute to the Minister for the way he has put his case and drawn up the Bill. I thank him for his courtesy in inviting me to his office a few weeks ago to discuss the Bill. Perhaps I am not supposed to say that. I am sorry, but I appreciated the invitation. That does not mean that we will agree on everything, but when we do not oppose the Bill, working behind the scenes like that is beneficial to those whom we are trying to help.

We heard from all parts of the House about indebtedness. We heard that debt has increased considerably in the past few years. We also heard that incomes and household assets have increased—that is true, but it misses the point. In individual cases there can still be a problem, and in some cases a desperate problem. To say that income or assets have increased in general is to ignore the deeper point. I am pleased that the deeper point has not been ignored by many hon. Members who spoke today. They recognised that debt can be a huge problem.

I remember my grandfather telling me, "If you're in debt, you're in danger." That is true and it is a maxim that I have tried to stick to all my life. There are times when it may be desirable to borrow money. If one wants luxury items, that may be the right way to acquire them, although personally I think it is not. It may be useful to borrow money or extend one's credit to get over difficult times. The problem is that when one is in difficulty, one is more vulnerable, and when one is vulnerable, one is less likely to strike a good deal. We should be aware of that.

Some people do borrow sensibly, but when I nipped out earlier for five minutes for a cup of tea, I had a message on my pager. Somebody who came to see me yesterday—a constituency case—needed a little money. The message was to let me know that they had gone into their bank today without much supporting evidence and had come out with a promise of £24,000, just like that. That, I regret to say, is not untypical. It happens all the time and it proves to be a difficulty for some people. I know from experience that when people go out to work on Monday morning and get their pay packet on Friday or at the end of the month, it is depressing to see a large chunk of that money go to pay off past debts, perhaps for consumer goods from which the shine, the polish and the attraction have worn off. We are right to tackle the issue.

One of the problems is that legislation cannot tackle all the issues. We live in a free country where, rightly, people can borrow money if they so desire. Nothing that I have said so far should be taken as an attack on the credit industry, which is extremely efficient and one of our leading industries. There is a case for better education on running finances and the composition of credit agreements. From studies that I have conducted, for example, I know that if a contract includes a big condition in large print, minute writing somewhere else on the contract might not be legal and might not reverse what the big writing says. I know that, but a lot of people probably do not, and they may fall foul of such contracts. That is one small example of how we might start to educate people better. When we are broadening the curriculum in schools, such matters could be added to citizenship classes. Whenever I go to a wedding or speak to couples who are about to get married—they do not come and seek my advice—my advice to them is the same as that given to me: do not overstretch yourselves and do not get into too much debt.

I shall move on to hon. Members' contributions. The right hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall), the Chairman of the Treasury Committee, discussed loan sharks and interest calculations and warned about debt.

The Liberal Democrat spokesman, the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce), spoke at great length about many issues—I shall not try to touch on all of them, but his speech was comprehensive.

The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike) spoke about people being "ripped off" by loan sharks and cited one or two moving cases.

My hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson) made a characteristically good, old-fashioned speech containing many good old-fashioned values—that is a compliment. She also provided warnings about debt, and I echo her remarks.

The right hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) discussed interest rate charges. I have not been persuaded yet and want to return to this point, but his argument for a statutory instrument to allow the Minister, whoever that may be—an election may well be coming up—to impose a ceiling on interest rates was persuasive. [Interruption.] I might be that Minister. Labour Members seemed to give up on the Minister and started to ask Conservative Members questions about what we would do, which is sensible because they will be doing that an awful lot more after 6 May.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker) discussed the savings ratio and increased household debt. He provoked a number of interventions, but he made a thoughtful speech, especially when he said that he wanted a "more favourable balance" in the industry, which is a good way to put it.

The hon. and learned Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston) made a good point, to which I shall return, when he asked about the meaning of "unfair".

My hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous) made an outstanding speech, especially when he mentioned that financial problems are a considerable factor in many marriage breakdowns. Although financial problems are not the only reason for marriage breakdowns, debts place many marriages under an unreasonable strain, and I am glad that he raised that point. He raised another important issue, the inadequacy of credit ratings, and discussed payment protection, which he described as "a scam".

Unfortunately, I missed the speech by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz), but I am told that he raised the issue of unfairness. I apologise for missing his speech, and that of the hon. Member for Angus (Mr. Weir), who made the good point that APRs are not a reliable guide to actual interest rates.

In the shortest speech that I have ever heard him make, the hon. Member for Ochil (Mr. O'Neill) made the good point that statutory instruments are perhaps needed.

The hon. Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann) discussed banks and their practices; the hon. Member for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt) spoke about credit card cheques; and the hon. Member for Caerphilly (Mr. David), from whom we have just heard, discussed the difficulties with many money lenders. It has been a very wide-ranging debate.

I mentioned my concerns about debt levels, education and small print. Like many other hon. Members, I am also somewhat concerned about the way in which opportunities to borrow money are marketed and sold.

It is right to reduce the burden of proof to unfairness, but we need to know what that means; otherwise, one or two court judgments might be required in order to set a precedent. I am not convinced that we should leave the provision as it is, and before the Committee starts I shall discuss with my hon. Friends whether we want to try to clarify it. After all, clarification is one of the Government's main motivations for introducing the Bill.

On small loans, one of the arguments against interest rate ceilings is that the interest rate is not necessarily the all-important factor. Many people find small loans of £100 or £200 very helpful. The interest rate on those loans might be relatively high, but the companies who lend that kind of money are often more flexible in their approach, so one factor may balance the other. We will need to take a sensitive approach to that in Committee. I would not want such customers to be alarmed, for example, by getting late payment notices when they are only two or three weeks late with the payment and paying only a fiver a week.

I am worried about giving more power to the Office of Fair Trading. The Bill is all about proper regulation and cutting out the loan sharks—that is necessary, and I would not want anyone to get me wrong about that. However, I remember that when I had an Adjournment debate on the horse-racing industry in the House about 18 months ago—it was replied to by the Minister who will reply today—I said that although Parliament can control the OFT through primary legislation, it has no such control on a day-to-day basis. I could bring my case to the House of Commons, but it would not be heard by the OFT, which had the power to destroy the horse-racing industry. There was nothing that I, as a Member of Parliament with the Cheltenham racecourse in my area, could do about it. That is an analogy, but it is relevant. I am particularly worried, for example, about giving the OFT the power to enter premises. I shall return to that in Committee.

Several hon. Members said that there should be more scope for statutory instruments in the Bill—for example, to allow the Minister, if he so wishes, to set interest rate ceilings or to increase the £50,000 fine if it is found to be inadequate. At the moment, I am not persuaded that we should go down that route, although I understand the points that have been made. Again, I will discuss it with my hon. Friends.

We will need to analyse many of these matters in Committee, and I regret that we may not have adequate time to do so. I am afraid that it is the hallmark of this Government to programme everything. That is why, in a few minutes, we will vote against the programme motion, although we will not vote against the Bill itself.

We recognise the need for the Bill. The credit industry and the financial world in general have changed remarkably and are unrecognisable from what they were 30 years ago. We need to root out loan sharks and to create more favourable conditions for those who borrow money, especially the vulnerable. The same people lose out all the time, and the Bill is welcome if it will prevent those same people from losing out in future. I thank the Minister for his courtesy in keeping me informed as he introduced the Bill, and I look forward to taking up the issues with him in Committee.

5.49 pm

Mr. Sutcliffe: With the leave of the House, I should like to respond to an excellent debate on a serious issue, which affects many of our constituents and an industry that contributes well to our economy.

In my opening remarks, I said that the Bill's fundamental principles were transparency, responsibility, protection and fairness. I believe that it will deliver that. Front-Bench spokesmen from the Opposition parties made excellent contributions this afternoon. I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Ochil (Mr. O'Neill), who chairs the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall), who chairs the Treasury Committee, are present. I want to put on record my thanks to them and the members of their Committees for their excellent work in deliberating on credit and other financial inclusion issues.

Many hon. Members made tremendous contributions, because it has been one of those rare occasions in the House when a Bill gets the general support of all parties. Of course, there are matters of detail to discuss and the Committee and Report stages will be eventful. I am grateful for the expertise that hon. Members' contributions have shown. Indeed, we heard that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston) has published a textbook on many of the problems that we discussed. Excellent speeches were made and competition for places on the Committee will be strong because many hon. Members want to ensure that the Bill meets the objectives that we are trying to achieve.

The debate generally showed consensus. The hon. Member for Eddisbury (Mr. O'Brien), supported by the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Gregory Barker), introduced a little of the political agenda and I want to set the record straight. I shall set out the strong economic position that the Government have achieved—hon. Members would expect nothing less of me. We have the lowest unemployment for 29 years, the longest period of sustained economic growth for 200 years, the lowest mortgage rates for 40 years and the lowest inflation since the 1960s. That is a good record from which to examine many of the issues that we have discussed today.

Some, albeit not many, Opposition Members tried to insinuate the idea that credit was bad for people. On the whole, credit, when used sensibly, is a useful tool for many people. As the hon. Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson) said, attitudes have changed greatly. The industry has expanded from only one kind of credit card in 1974 to the 1,500 products and 39 million credit cards that now exist. In the UK economy, there has been a 50 per cent. increase in total net household wealth. We have experienced average growth of 3.1 per cent. in real household disposable income since 1997. More importantly, 2 million more people are in work. That makes a great difference. I chide the Conservative party a little for presiding over interest rates of 15 per cent. and 3 million unemployed.

I am confident that the macro-economic position that the Government have created gives people the ability to make decisions about their economic choices. Credit can be a useful tool for that. However, there are important issues such as savings. As I said earlier, the key matter for me is the proportion of household disposable income that is spent on interest payments, which was 7.6 per cent. for the first quarter in 2004. That is a good indicator.

I was asked several questions in the debate and I shall try to answer as many of them as possible and as quickly as possible in the time that remains. If I cannot answer them all in the time, I shall write to hon. Members. We shall go through the Bill's many clauses in great detail in Committee. I shall not suffer from lack of advice, given the many issues that were raised in the debate.

One of the key issues raised was the use of secondary legislation in relation to the interest rate ceiling, and I want to clarify our position on that. The hon. Member for Eddisbury is quite right; I did say on the radio that we could introduce secondary legislation on the interest rate ceiling. On reflection, however, I see that that would not be the right way to do it. We will review the position, and I know that hon. Members will raise the issue in Committee. Given the evidence in the report that we commissioned, and the consultation documents that we received from a variety of bodies, we are not convinced that an interest rate ceiling would be adequate to cover the problems involved. The unfair credit test will affect extortionate credit. The reason for not going down the secondary legislation route is that we have consulted fully on this Bill all the way through. It would therefore be wrong to use secondary legislation as a vehicle, without going through further full consultation. I hear what my hon. Friends have said about interest rate ceilings, and I look forward to our debates in Committee, when we shall be able to put on record the various reasons why we do not favour that particular route.

Another key element of the debate involved credit card cheques. My hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Mr. Plaskitt), a key member of the Treasury Committee, has raised this issue on a number of occasions. He pointed out that one of our own documents talked about the inappropriateness of such cheques. I favour the change to the banking code of practice as a means of dealing with this, but we shall need to monitor the issue and, if that is unsuccessful, we shall have to return to it and see what we can do. If the cheques are being sent to vulnerable or inappropriate people, that could be caught up by the unfairness test. Perhaps we need to look at that.

Many hon. Members talked about the role of credit unions. The Government believe that credit unions have an important role to play in the provision of greater choice and diversity in the financial services sector. We have been involved in a number of initiatives to help the movement to grow and to offer a greater range of services to its members. Credit unions certainly have a key role to play.

Many hon. Members also supported the work of the citizens advice bureaux and the other organisations that give help and support to people who have difficulty with debt. We are working closely with Citizens Advice to inform it of the changes, so as to give it time to revise its information and training. It has estimated that the initial cost to Citizens Advice of the introduction of the Consumer Credit Bill will be in the region of £1 million, so we are going to have to look at the resource implications of that. I noticed that the hon. Member for Eddisbury did not make a commitment to fund the citizens advice service in the way that we do, through the DTI, should that awful day ever arrive when his party is again in Government.

Debt advice is important, and the credit industry is looking at the issue. We are working on many ways of targeting the best kind of advice, particularly in regard to vulnerable consumers. We are helping to develop a gateway to telephone advice services that will signpost consumers to the service appropriate to their needs. We are also working to ensure sustainable funding for the free debt advice sector, and encouraging increased contributions for three-year periods.

There has been a great deal of discussion on the £50,000 penalty limit, and we can usefully discuss in Committee how we arrived at that figure. We can also consider the way in which we want the penalty to be imposed for breaches of requirements, and not for extortionate or unfair credit. The penalty cap is not unprecedented. There is provision for such a cap in the Competition Act 1998. It will be useful for us to have a debate in Committee on that subject, and on the licensing regime. We considered the introduction of a provision relating to 10 per cent. of turnover—a provision that is also in the Competition Act—but we decided that it might be inappropriate. Hon. Members from Scotland raised the question of time orders. I am keen to ensure that they will be a useful vehicle, and we need to take up the offers that have been made, to ensure that there is consistency throughout the UK.

This is an important Bill, and we will look at it in great detail in Committee. It is long overdue—it has taken 30 years to introduce it—and we need to ensure that it gets on to the statute book as soon as possible. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

CONSUMER CREDIT BILL (PROGRAMME)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 83A(6),

That the following provisions shall apply to the Consumer Credit Bill:

Committal

1. The Bill shall be committed to a Standing Committee.

Proceedings in Standing Committee

2. Proceedings in the Standing Committee shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion on Thursday 3rd February 2005.

3. The Standing Committee shall have leave to sit twice on the first day on which it meets.

Consideration and Third Reading

4. Proceedings on consideration shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion one hour before the moment of interruption on the day on which those proceedings are commenced.

5. Proceedings on Third Reading shall (so far as not previously concluded) be brought to a conclusion at the moment of interruption on that day.

Programming Committee

6. Standing Order No. 83B (Programming committees) shall not apply to proceedings on consideration and Third Reading.

Programming of proceedings

7. Any other proceedings on the Bill (including any proceedings on consideration of Lords Amendments or on any further messages from the Lords) may be programmed.—[Mr. Sutcliffe.]

CONSUMER CREDIT BILL [MONEY]

Queen's recommendation having been signified—

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(a) (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with bills),

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Consumer Credit Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(1) any expenditure incurred by a Minister of the Crown or the Office of Fair Trading by virtue of the Act, and

(2) any increase attributable to the Act in the sums payable out of money so provided by virtue of any other Act.—[Mr. Watson.]

CONSUMER CREDIT BILL [WAYS AND MEANS]

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 52(1)(a) (Money resolutions and ways and means resolutions in connection with bills),

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Consumer Credit Bill, it is expedient to authorise—

(1) the imposition of charges on persons who hold licences under the Consumer Credit Act 1974 or who apply or have applied for the issue or renewal of such licences, and

(2) the payment of sums into the Consolidated Fund.—[Mr. Watson.]

Rail Services (Telford)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Watson.]

6.13 pm

David Wright (Telford) (Lab): I appreciate the opportunity to discuss rail services in Telford. The quality of those services is an issue that local constituents and the business community regularly raise with me and with my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley). It will be useful if I begin by describing the services currently enjoyed by Telford people; I will then outline a set of priorities for future action, which I hope the Government will take up. They fall under two main headings: improving local services, and through services to London.

It is worth pointing out that rail travel is popular, and that people in Telford and throughout the country are keen to use a good service. Indeed, "Transport Trends: 2004", published by the Department for Transport, shows that "since 1980, the number of journeys made by national rail has gone up by 33 per cent., from 760 million to 1,014 million. It fluctuated, roughly in line with the economic cycle during the 1980s and early 1990s, but has risen sharply since 1995–96. The number has risen by 4 per cent. in the last year. Passenger kilometres travelled by national rail have increased by 35 per cent. since 1980, from 30 to 41 billion passenger kilometres. Again, most of the increase has occurred since 1995–96. The effects of the Hatfield crash in October 2000 briefly caused an interruption in this trend, but usage has increased since then."

It is a positive trend in terms of passenger usage.

Thus, contrary to popular belief, more people are using the railways. One only needs to reflect on the number of vehicles parked by commuters at Telford Central railway station today or on any other day, in comparison with 10 years ago, to know that the trend is mirrored by my constituents and those of my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin. That does not mean that the service is problem-free. The railways are suffering from historic under-investment, stretching back for decades, and from the flawed structure that was put in place during the privatisation. The process of reform has already begun and there is now record investment in the industry.

It may be helpful if I speak a little about the services that run to and from Telford. Telford sits on a line running from Wolverhampton through Shrewsbury and on to north Wales. The line has not been electrified, which has caused a number of problems that I shall return to later. There are two stations in my constituency: Telford Central and Oakengates. Oakengates is a small halt-style station of which I am very fond. It is important to the local community and I am fond of it because I commuted from it into the conurbation for many years. The main passenger usage is at Telford Central and at Wellington, which is in Telford, but falls within the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin.

Three operators use the route: Central Trains, Arriva Trains Wales and English, Welsh and Scottish, which runs freight services. Central Trains operates two services an hour—an all-stations DMU two-car class 156 that runs from Wellington to Walsall and a faster DMU class 158/170 service that stops at Wellington and central Telford only and runs from Shrewsbury to Birmingham New Street. Additional services run during peak hours.

Arriva Trains Wales operates one train an hour—a class 158/175 service that alternates from Aberystwyth in one hour and Chester to north Wales in the other hour, stopping at Wellington and Telford Central. English, Welsh and Scottish Trains run coal MGRs—automatic bulk-coal vehicles—into Ironbridge power station along the line, and these run approximately two-hourly on weekdays. A steel train from south Wales to Wolverhampton steel terminal also runs on most days. Telford used to have a direct service to London, Euston, with a changeover from diesel to electric at Wolverhampton and vice-versa on the return journey. The service was finally discontinued in 2001, after being scaled back to one service per day previously.

Now that I have set the scene, I shall move on to my first point about improving local services for Telford residents. The Secretary of State announced last year that the number of passenger rail franchises is to be reduced from 25 to 19 and the industry has made it clear that it is committed to ensuring that those new arrangements drive more effective working between Network Rail and the train companies, in the interests of passengers. When the Central Trains franchise expires, its services will be absorbed, as appropriate, by Virgin Cross Country, Midland Mainline, Northern, Silverlink Trains and Chiltern Railways franchises. That will obviously impact on Telford and will provide us with an opportunity to look at the scope and style of the services that my constituents—and, indeed, those of my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin—enjoy.

In the light of that debate, will the Minister insist that the service is positively reviewed at the time of the transfer to the new franchise companies? The review will focus on four key areas. First, it will focus on more punctual services and fewer cancellations; and secondly, on greater capacity in local services so that passengers do not have to endure the current problem of overcrowding—an issue that also needs to be addressed on the Arriva service. Thirdly, it will focus on providing more regular services from Telford to Birmingham International, which is where the major regional airport is located. Fourthly, it will need to examine the potential for a service from Telford that stops at local stations—such as Tipton and Smethwick, to cite just two examples—in the west midlands conurbation through to Birmingham New Street.

Peter Bradley (The Wrekin) (Lab): It goes without saying that I agree with everything that my hon. Friend has said. May I add a fifth category to his list? We should require operating companies to make a concerted investment in the stations, most of which have been unstaffed for many years and offer a hostile environment late at night, especially to women. If train operating companies want to make a profit on the railways, they need to be able to encourage people back to the stations before they get on the trains. I hope that my hon. Friend agrees with that point.

David Wright: I agree wholeheartedly with my hon. Friend. That is the situation at Telford Central, Oakengates and Wellington. One can arrive late at night, on a local service, and the station is deserted. In the case of Telford Central, people have to walk a long way to reach areas where there are other people, because it is right in the centre of the town and surrounded by offices and hotels. However, I shall return shortly to some of the improvements that have taken place at Telford Central that have made the situation much better than it was 10 or 20 years ago.

Those issues—including the fifth one raised by my hon. Friend—are important because Telford is a housing growth point with thousands of new homes to be built in the next 10 years. Many people will probably move to the town from the black country and other urban areas, retaining their jobs in the short term. Easier rail connections will obviously help encourage more people to move into the area.

We are a growing town which promotes itself for new business start-ups. We also have a large number of long-standing companies. Both of those groups want better rail services. Business and leisure tourism are fast growing and important sectors in Telford, supporting thousands of jobs and generating income in terms of visitor spend. The town is fortunate in having one of the UK's top 10 conference and exhibition venues in the International Centre, as well as several large hotels.

Improvements in services would be relatively easy to achieve. People want to be able to plan their time effectively and turn up at the rail stations at a time that they understand in the timetable, whether it be 10 to or 20 past the hour. They want to know that the train will arrive on time, it will be clean and a seat will be available. That is not too much to ask—indeed, much of the time it already happens—but there are problems, especially at peak times. Those criteria must be met every time a train stops at Wellington, Oakengates or Telford Central.

There have of course been some very positive improvements in recent years. The quality of the trains provided by Virgin to London from Wolverhampton, which are used by Telford residents, has improved significantly. The new platform at Wolverhampton has also improved capacity at that station, which is the main connection point for Telford rail users. I also used to commute on the line some 20 years ago when I was a student—I do not like to think that it was so long ago—and the reliability of the service then was awful. So we have clearly come a long way. The service has improved, but we could do so much better.

There is also now much better integration of transport services at Telford Central station. It was only in the last couple of years that the station was linked to local bus services and this has proved very popular. We have recently had the car park resurfaced, new spaces have been provided—we now have more than 300—and there is a new taxi rank. That all costs money and is often overlooked. Local residents also often overlook the fact that we are investing in the station. However, we could do a lot more, as my hon. Friend points out. We also have a major proposal for a rail freight terminal in the town and I hope that that will move towards completion in the near future.

My second point relates to the resumption of direct services from Telford to London. Direct services from Shrewsbury to London, and from Telford to London, have been tried before but they proved to be uneconomic. The Shropshire chamber of commerce and Business Link have developed a business case for the resumption of services and I know that it was submitted to the Department for Transport last month. Through services were first introduced when the west coast main line was electrified in the 1970s, but the need to change from electric to diesel locomotive at Wolverhampton, in order to connect to Telford and Shrewsbury, was time-consuming, disruptive and expensive. The need to change traction at Wolverhampton not only caused congestion at that busy mainline bottleneck but often allowed the following Central Trains service to overtake, which was illogical.

The chamber of commerce proposes a scheme to place the large conurbations of Shrewsbury and Telford on the west coast main line by electrifying the 28 miles from Oxley to Shrewsbury and revitalising the rail services on offer to London and to Birmingham and its international airport. That would be of direct benefit to Telford residents. The detail of the submission draws on the social and economic factors used in the Strategic Rail Authority's appraisal criteria, and a new timetable for services has been proposed.

A large number of people travel to Stafford from Telford by car to use the more rapid rail service to London. People using the London link from Wolverhampton often experience long waits on the platform, either going down to London or returning, especially in the evening. I know all about that—as does my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin. I have often stood in the cold on Thursday nights waiting for the connection to Telford.

Electrification of the line from Wolverhampton is a major financial commitment, but the Shropshire chamber of commerce has made the case that it will ultimately prove value for money. We must consider that option and we must also look into the possibility of improving diesel services to give through running to London. The chamber has considered that option and we may have to return to it if electrification costs prove prohibitive.

I am not a rail finance expert so I cannot comment on the detailed costings in the submission, but I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will look at them in great detail and that she will meet members of the chamber and Business Link, my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin and me to talk through the scope of the service. A growth point such as Telford deserves a connection to London.

Peter Bradley: As an economic growth point, Telford deserves and demands a through service to London, but so, too, does Wellington. Although my hon. Friend and I are enthusiastic supporters of the chamber's bid, I should like it slightly expanded to include investment in extending the platforms at Wellington to accommodate through services. Wellington is an important community, which has a strong economy that we want further to underpin, so I hope my hon. Friend shares my view that it should be included in the bid.

David Wright: I am more than happy to accept my hon. Friend's comments. I hope that we can come up with a scheme that will benefit all our communities in Telford. If it is not possible to reinstate a direct London service, we need to push hard for better, faster services to Birmingham International, which is a key regional transport node. We need to ensure that those services come online, even if the London service does not come back into use soon.

I look forward to the comments of my hon. Friend the Minister on my two key points and on some of the other points that we have discussed. I fully acknowledge that we have seen major strides forward in the rail service in recent years; the Government are making a tremendous investment in it. The new structures will allow us to prioritise the needs of passengers, as expressed to Members of Parliament and, more generally, to rail user groups in the community. Those structures enable us to listen more effectively, and I hope that the Government will listen tonight, especially to the points about local services.

We are certainly making progress and it would be put at risk if other parties were to get into power, as cuts in the transport budget seem to be one of the main objectives in the Opposition's cuts agenda. I look forward to the Minister's response.

6.28 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Charlotte Atkins): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Telford (David Wright) on securing the debate and providing an excellent opportunity for the House to discuss rail services in Telford. As always, he demonstrates his reputation as a hard-working and focused constituency MP.

There are regular direct rail services from Telford to Wolverhampton, Birmingham, Shrewsbury, Crewe, Liverpool, Manchester, Chester, Cardiff, Swansea, Hereford and Cambrian coast destinations, including Aberystwyth, Tywyn and Harlech. In addition, both Telford and Shrewsbury act as interchange points for bus services to local non-rail destinations. All train services from Telford are currently diesel powered.

A through service to London existed until 1992, when it was withdrawn by British Rail, because of limited demand and the difficulties of changing from electric to diesel locomotives at Wolverhampton. Following rail privatisation, Virgin Trains introduced a limited through service but that, too, was withdrawn by 2000 because it was not commercially viable.

Telford is a large and growing economic centre, and usage of the railway has increased over the past 10 years. The Strategic Rail Authority's forthcoming consultation on the west midlands route utilisation strategy will re-examine service patterns on the Shrewsbury-Telford-Birmingham corridor and will include a consideration of the practicality and value of providing a direct Shrewsbury-Telford-Birmingham-London service. It is planned that the consultation document will be issued in the next few weeks.

Following the expiry of the current Central Trains franchise in 2006, its routes will be distributed between five existing franchises. Where appropriate, those franchises will be put out to tender as soon as possible. Bidders for the new franchises will be expected to demonstrate the reliability and operational viability of their proposals. Any specific improvements to such aspects as rolling stock must of course represent value for money for the taxpayer and be affordable within the context of the franchise as a whole. I certainly hope that there will be real scope to improve existing carriage capacity and reliability, and my hon. Friend the Member for The Wrekin (Peter Bradley) is right to say that more investment in stations is needed.

Electrification from Wolverhampton to Telford and on to Shrewsbury has been considered on various occasions. An independent report has recently been produced by Strategic Transport Solutions for the Shropshire chamber of commence and Business Link, as my hon. Friend the Member for Telford said. The report has been submitted to local stakeholders and the SRA, which is evaluating it.

I should explain that the case for electrification of railways on a strategic national basis appears to be weak compared with that in the last major study undertaken by British Rail in 1981. The priority is to provide additional capacity for both passenger and freight demand while at the same time improving the network to enable train operators to deliver significant improvements to the quality and reliability of their services, which customers rightly expect.

In the 1970s, electrification undoubtedly brought numerous advantages, such as reduced fuel and maintenance costs and rail vehicles with better acceleration, higher top speeds and quieter operation. In the current climate, however, that is no longer the case. Diesel fuel is now much cheaper, so the fuel cost differences have been largely eliminated. The performance characteristics of modern diesel trains are at least as good as equivalent electric units, and although the maintenance costs of electric trains are slightly lower than those of diesel trains, if the cost of maintaining overhead line equipment is added to that, the case for electric trains against diesels does not stack up.

The report is being considered in depth by the SRA at present and will be evaluated as part of the regional planning assessment for the west midlands. However, I shall be happy to meet my hon. Friends the Members for Telford and for The Wrekin about the matter if they wish.

Peter Bradley: I welcome the Minister's offer and I am sure that my hon. Friend and I will want to take her up on it. Does she concede that it is unreasonable to regard Telford and the Wrekin as growth points for housing and the economy without taking the necessary steps to provide the infrastructure required to underpin that vital growth?

Charlotte Atkins: I certainly accept what my hon. Friend says. It is clear that Telford and the Wrekin are growing apace, so we must take that on board when we consider options for transport links.

Capacity enhancements and possible infrastructure improvements that may be needed to accommodate both rail freight and passenger traffic, and to meet the long-term planning needs of the network, will be determined by a series of regional planning assessments that will form the basis for planning the development of the railway over the next five to 20 years. RPAs will consider the function of the railway within current and future land use and transport systems and its role in supporting the economic and wider development objectives of local, regional, devolved and central Government. One of the RPAs' key objectives will be to maximise value for money in pursuit of the Government's objectives for the environment, safety, economy, accessibility and integration.

Concern has been expressed that passengers and intending passengers do not find it easy to obtain information on train services and fares. We are anxious that all rail passengers and intended passengers should be able to obtain rail information easily. The published timetables and those displayed at Telford railway station give information about direct services from Telford to stations in East Anglia, Pembrokeshire and Cornwall. Services to Manchester airport, Birmingham airport and London Euston are non-direct services. I am sure that hon. Members will appreciate that, as non-direct services can involve a number of changes along the route, this information is better provided by the station ticket office staff. The national rail enquiry service is extensively used for the provision of rail information and has a good reputation for both speed and accuracy. Increasingly, rail inquiries are being handled via various websites, and this appears to be both fast and effective, too.

As the House will be aware, the Strategic Rail Authority published its community rail development strategy in November. The strategy aims to put local and rural railways on a sustainable basis for the long term, by increasing ridership, freight use and net revenue, managing costs down, and through the greater involvement of the local community. It is based on the premise that the closure of lines is neither desirable nor a solution to the problems that local lines face. I can assure hon. Members that this strategy is firmly aimed at increasing rail use and developing the railways, to the benefit of the communities that they serve.

The strategy has been developed over a period of some 18 months, involving an extensive consultation exercise in February last year, which drew responses from over 300 organisations and individuals, including local and regional authorities, regional assemblies, regional development agencies, the rail industry, tourism bodies, MPs, rail user groups and a host of other bodies and individuals. By and large, the objectives and approach advocated in the consultation document were supported by the respondents. There was an almost universal agreement that no single approach could be adopted network-wide. Rather, the appropriate local solutions would have to be encouraged within a broad framework.

The final strategy was published in the light of the responses received to the consultation. It lists 56 routes that the Strategic Rail Authority proposes to designate as community rail lines. These local and rural routes make up about 10.5 per cent. of the national rail network, including 390 stations. As hon. Members will know, personal mobility is increasing, traffic congestion is rising and growth is taking place in many areas served by community railways. There is evidence of latent demand for these lines. The argument for their retention and development is therefore compelling, and is fully supported by the Government. To achieve the objectives of the strategy there will have to be active support from a wide range of stakeholders, including train operators, Network Rail, local authorities and local users, working in partnership.

The Heart of Wales line from Shrewsbury to Swansea is an example, as is the Shrewsbury to Chester section of the Birmingham to Chester services that pass through Telford. The aims are to develop new markets, to fill empty seats on current services, to integrate the rail service with local bus and community transport services, to build up relationships with small businesses along the line, and to evaluate the potential for new stations and higher service frequencies.

Telford, as well being a major destination in itself, is an important interchange point between a number of train services and buses to non-rail destinations. The future of rail services from Telford is secure, and the SRA will be working to improve the performance and quality of services to and from the town. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Telford on initiating the debate, and I hope to work with him and my hon. Friend the Member for the Wrekin in future.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Senior Sporting Appointments

1. Tony Lloyd (Manchester, Central) (Lab): If she will issue guidelines to sports governing bodies on the criteria to be used in assessing the fitness of individuals for senior positions. [208449]

The Minister for Sport and Tourism (Mr. Richard Caborn): Sport England does not issue guidelines to national governing bodies of sport for use in assessing the fitness of individuals for senior positions. This should be part of a governing body's own recruitment policies and procedures. However, Sport England has carried out fit-for-purpose reviews that have established a basis on which to provide a degree of assurance that governing bodies are indeed fit to receive public funds, and that includes human resources.

Tony Lloyd: I thank my right hon. Friend. Obviously, control of major sporting bodies, whether in the professional or amateur game, has enormous importance to the sporting public and the general community. Control of a company such as Manchester United, in which I have a small shareholding, would have an enormous impact. There are rumours of a takeover by Malcolm Glazer, who was described in the United States courts as a snake in sheep's clothing when he tried to take over Harley Davidson and who is being investigated by the Securities and Exchange Commission, so is hardly a fit and proper person to take on the governance of a football club. Can my right hon. Friend put a comment on the record that might dissuade Mr. Glazer from his predatory activities?

Mr. Caborn: I cannot comment on the description of Mr. Glazer, but I can assure my hon. Friend that the premier league and the Football League have taken significant strides recently to ensure that there is good governance and that they have fit and proper people on the board. He can be assured in that sense. Company law is now more stringent on the appointment of company directors, particularly concerning the Football Association premier league. I was pleased to read the statement by the chief executive of Manchester United, David Gill, when he said that any decision would take into account both present and future shareholders. That is important for a football club like Manchester United, which plays a tremendous role not just in the game, but in its community. That should be considered by any board that takes the decision.

Ian Lucas (Wrexham) (Lab): The former chairman of Wrexham football club, Mr. Alex Hamilton, described leading the club towards administration as "the most fun I have had with my clothes on."

That was before the 10-point deduction that the club received from the Football League. He was deemed by the Football League to be a fit and proper person to run the club, but the population of Wrexham beg to differ. Will my right hon. Friend have further discussions with the Football League to impress on it that the current fitness-for-purpose test is not sufficient to protect football clubs, which are important community institutions? Football supporters need more support.

Mr. Caborn: I reiterate what I said earlier. Both the Football League and the premier league have taken steps recently to bring about better governance and regulation of the game. They have not got everything right and I think that they would accept that. However, the fact that Wrexham had 10 points deducted for going into administration is a step in the right direction and is a deterrent to trying to manipulate the situation, which would have been unfair to the other clubs in that division. I hope that we are getting better governance and regulation in all our sports, including football.

BBC

2. Andrew Selous (South-West Bedfordshire) (Con): What account she will take of standards of public decency in programmes screened by the BBC as part of her decision on whether to renew the BBC charter. [208450]

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): All aspects of the BBC's organisation, operation, funding and governance are being considered as part of the on-going BBC charter review. The mechanisms for securing appropriate programme standards fall within the scope of the review.

Andrew Selous: While I condemn the publishing of BBC executives' private addresses, does the Minister realise that many people do not consider it appropriate for public service broadcasting to use taxpayers' money to fund programmes such as "Jerry Springer—The Opera", which offend so many people? Does she realise that many licence payers do not believe that the BBC provides value for money in screening programmes that upset so many of our constituents?

Estelle Morris: Of course I accept that people throughout the country may have been offended, but people are offended when we have free speech. I would rather have free speech than try to legislate against people being offended.

What is broadcast or printed is not and never should be a matter for the Government. In our nation, which cherishes free speech—it is so important—there is a legislative framework to which people can appeal, as they have done in this case. Both Ofcom and the BBC governors have that responsibility and no doubt will respond to concerns expressed by the public in due course.

Alan Howarth (Newport, East) (Lab): Is not it better that we choose our own infantilisms like real grown-ups, rather than be infantilised by the censor or even by my right hon. Friend herself?

Estelle Morris: My right hon. Friend is right. Heaven forbid that anyone should dictate what we can see, what we should listen to, or anything else. I would sooner run the risk of being offended than of having artistic performances denied to me.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry) (Con): Does the Minister agree that although the independence of the BBC is important, and although I have not the slightest problem about the BBC giving offence over some tacky American programme, the screening of any programme that gives gratuitous offence to the Christian community or any of the great faiths prevalent in our land is a rather different matter? Does she, therefore, agree that a degree of self-restraint would be appropriate from the broadcasting authorities in that case?

Estelle Morris: What is broadcast is still a matter for the BBC, and that is absolutely fundamental, but because of the importance of free speech and artistic freedom, a legislative framework covers not only broadcasting but theatre and print as well, and it is against that framework that decisions should be made. As far as I am concerned, the BBC will look at the framework and it will make a decision about whether it should broadcast. That is a fundamental principle that in no circumstances should be crossed.

Mr. Clive Soley (Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush) (Lab): This is a good time to remind ourselves that censorship is a dangerous thing for religions generally, especially minority religious views. Whether it be plays, books or operas on television, religionists would be ill advised to go down the road of censorship, not least because although I have not seen the "Jerry Springer" programme, having watched the play about it on the BBC the other week, my inclination would be to demonstrate against the makers of the "Jerry Springer" programme rather than against the BBC, which gave a strong moral message behind that play.

Estelle Morris: My hon. Friend is right. It is interesting that different perspectives can be brought to the issue. Most people of religious belief are well able to stick to their belief and defend it against those who criticise it or disagree. That is an article of faith, and many people who hold religious beliefs are happy to do so in the face of criticism.

Mr. Malcolm Moss (North-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): Following on from the Minister's response to my hon. Friend the Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Andrew Selous), is she aware that the BBC board of governors continues to argue that it has no role in pre-viewing material before broadcast and thus refused to intervene before the transmission of "Jerry Springer—The Opera", despite 50,000 complaints from the public? Given that the job of adjudicating complaints after broadcast has passed to Ofcom, the question arises as to what the point of the BBC governors is. Will the right hon. Lady make that a priority in the review of the BBC's charter?

Estelle Morris: I am amazed that the hon. Gentleman wants to give the BBC governors the power of censorship before something is broadcast. That is exactly what would happen if he had his way. What is clear is that there is not pre-viewing to censor what is broadcast, but that afterwards representations can be made. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman has looked at the range of measures that Ofcom can use if it finds that the boundaries have been crossed. To give BBC governors the power to watch what is broadcast, ahead of Ofcom and ahead of the public, and for the governors alone to decide whether the public are able to see it, would be censorship that is almost worse than the censorship we got rid of between 20 and 30 years ago.

Digital Broadcasting

4. Mr. Derek Wyatt (Sittingbourne and Sheppey) (Lab): When she expects to announce the completion date for digital switch-over. [208452]

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): The Government will confirm the timetable once all the remaining issues relating to digital switch-over are resolved and we are satisfied that the interests of consumers, especially the most vulnerable, are well protected. The timetable will be set on the basis that it can be met by the broadcasters. The House will note—I have placed written statements to that effect—that the BBC and Ofcom estimate that the completion of switchover can be achieved by 2012.

Mr. Wyatt: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. I understand that Wales will be the first area to switch off—

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Switch over.

Mr. Wyatt: Sorry—switch over, not switch off.

Has my right hon. Friend considered that as the south-east is the business engine room for the whole United Kingdom it would be much more sensible for switch-over to be simultaneous for Wales and the south-east so that we could, as it were, make more wealth for the whole United Kingdom?

Tessa Jowell: We have made it clear that switch-off—[Laughter]—just checking whether Members are listening. We have made it clear that switch-over will take place on a region-by-region basis, and no decision has yet been taken about which region will be first. My hon. Friend may be confusing the switch-over with the pilot exercise that is taking place, from which a lot is certainly being learned: it has been successful in demonstrating to sceptics the value of going digital.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire) (Con): A number of my constituents are unable to receive any digital television at all. They very much resent having to pay the full TV licence. Why do they have to do that?

Tessa Jowell: That is precisely the reason why it is important to set a timetable for digital switch-over. Almost 60 per cent. of households have a digital television, and we are very close to the point where the hon. Gentleman's constituents will be left out from the opportunity to upgrade their televisions. That is why we are moving switch-over forward at our current pace, and why it is such a very important consideration in the review of the BBC's charter, to which reference has also been made.

David Cairns (Greenock and Inverclyde) (Lab): For as long as the days of analogue television are numbered, no new investment is going into upgrading the analogue network and analogue receivers, so people in Inverkip and Wemyss Bay in my constituency who cannot get analogue television, let alone digital television, have no prospect of getting a signal in the near future. Does that not indicate that we need to get a move on with digital switch-over, so that more effort is put into ensuring that those areas that cannot get an analogue signal can get a digital signal when the digital switch-over comes?

Tessa Jowell: All those are very good reasons why we need to get a move on with digital switch-over, and we are doing so.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath) (LD): In her answers in relation to digital television switch-over, the Secretary of State has just stressed the importance of a timetable, but is that not equally true of the switch-over to digital radio? Does she recall that, back in the summer, she said that she was considering a date for digital radio switch-over? Can she therefore explain to the House why her noble Friend the Minister for Media and Heritage said at the end of last year:

"We are not considering any timetable for that at all"?

Are the Government considering that, or are they not?

Tessa Jowell: At the moment, we have not yet got the figures for the number of digital radios that were given as Christmas presents, but far less than 10 per cent. of radios are digital, so digital radio is too new a technology—it is too new a domestic accessory—for us to be sufficiently confident about the rate of change to say that we will switch off the analogue radio signal. I am sure that, in future years, precisely the same consideration will be given to the future of analogue radio as in our broad decisions to switch off the analogue television signal, but the important thing is to keep pace with public demand and public enthusiasm for the change.

Mr. Tony Clarke (Northampton, South) (Lab): The role that free-to-air broadcasting plays in ensuring that the digital revolution can be shared by those on low incomes should not be underestimated, but can my right hon. Friend say why people in the middle of Northampton in NN1 and NN2 postcodes are still not able to receive free-to-air digital broadcasts? If we are to get people in those areas—many of them are on low incomes—to switch on, we need to ensure that the town in the centre of the country is not isolated and kept off the network; it needs to be on as soon a possible.

Tessa Jowell: The practical reason why my hon. Friend's constituents are unable to get free-to-air digital television is that we cannot increase the coverage of free-to-air services—freeview—until the analogue signal is switched off and the power of the transmitters is increased. All those considerations are part of the plan for digital switch-over to which I have referred.

5. Miss Anne McIntosh (Vale of York) (Con): What role the proposed public service publisher will have in delivering regional news programmes in relation to digital broadcasting. [208453]

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): The establishment of a public service publisher was a proposal made by Ofcom in phase 2 of its public service television review. Ofcom has conducted a public consultation on all its proposals, and will publish its final conclusions in due course. Obviously, we in government will consider its recommendations very carefully.

Miss McIntosh: Although I thank the Secretary of State for that reply, it does not answer the question. I asked what role the public service publisher would play. Yorkshire Television, Tyne Tees Television and the other regional broadcast stations play an excellent role in fulfilling their public service obligations, and I cannot believe that this new body will add anything. Will she say what role it will play and who will pay for it?

Tessa Jowell: No, it is not yet possible to do that, because final decisions about the nature of the proposal have not yet been made. Ofcom has just completed the consultation on its phase 2 report in which this proposal for a public service publisher was made. My view is that the proposal merits further consideration, and I am sure that if the hon. Lady wishes to make representations to Ofcom on the basis of her regional experience, it will happily receive them.

David Taylor (North-West Leicestershire) (Lab/Co-op): If the Secretary of State means what she says when she refers to the priorities and importance of regional broadcasting—I am sure that she does—how does she think that those areas of the country that are near regional boundaries and that are unable to receive news broadcasting from the correct region will be in a stronger position when digital broadcasting is widespread and the relevant signals can be incorporated? For example, parts of the east midlands receive broadcasting only from the west midlands at the moment.

Tessa Jowell: There are two separate issues. The first is the technology and its capacity to extend the reach of free-to-view television. The second is the current debate about the nature of regional content. One of the conclusions of the Ofcom review is public enthusiasm for even more very local regional content, particularly in news. Broadcasting and free-to-air broadcasting are a fundamental part of our democracy, and I hope that hon. Members will join in the debate about developing regional television that meets the needs and ambitions of their constituents.

Miss Julie Kirkbride (Bromsgrove) (Con): If the Secretary of State, who is in charge of broadcasting in the UK, cannot think of a role for the public service publisher, what is the point of having it? Surely it is just another excuse for Labour to spend other people's money.

Tessa Jowell: With respect to the hon. Lady, that is not the most original intervention. Ofcom has already set out the nature of the proposal, and it is consulting on it. It is then for it to come forward with a final proposal and in a due course—it is certainly not a proposal for the next three or four years—the Secretary of State will take a view on it.

2012 Olympic Bid

6. Jim Knight (South Dorset) (Lab): What discussions her Department has had on cultural activities linked to the 2012 Olympic bid. [208454]

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): In February 2004, my Department appointed Jude Kelly, one of the most respected people in contemporary British theatre, as chair of the culture and education committee for London's Olympic bid. Since then, in consultation with the arts community, she has developed an ambitious and exciting cultural programme for the 2012 Olympiad.

Jim Knight: I thank the Minister for her reply. The 1948 London games was the last time when medals were awarded for disciplines such as art and poetry, as an expression of the importance of the arts within the Olympic ideal. I am not suggesting that we return to that, but may I encourage her to maximise the opportunity of the cultural Olympiad to engage with the public beyond those interested in sport, and particularly in developing cultural exchanges as part of the Olympics with host venues such as Portland?

Estelle Morris: I am most grateful for my hon. Friend's comments. He is absolutely right. The Olympic ideal is about mind, body and spirit, and art and culture has a lot to contribute to that. When the candidate file is looked at and when the bid is closely examined, we will have every right to be very proud of the cultural part of the bid that the United Kingdom is putting forward. If we consider Sydney, we see that what is left of its cultural bid has served that community very well. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments and for the support that he has given to the cultural bid in his constituency.

Simon Hughes (Southwark, North and Bermondsey) (LD): Can the Minister assure us that in the run-up to the selection date in July, let alone beyond, we are selling the point that London is the most cosmopolitan city in Europe and that every cultural community—the four British culture communities and all the others—is engaged as part of the support for the bid? It will be of huge benefit to us as a country and of huge benefit to each of those many, many, many tens of communities that are in this city already.

Estelle Morris: The hon. Gentleman is right. Indeed, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made that point at the conference that was held this morning. The strength of the bid is London at its centre, but it is important not to forget the impact that it will have on the rest of the nation. The diversity and richness of London's cultural activities only enhance the strength of the bid.

Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon) (Con): Is the Minister aware of mounting concern about the cultural implications of the Government's plans to fund the Olympic bid? Even the Chairman of the Culture, Media and Sport Committee says that they are funding it by "raiding the lottery and its good causes for something the Treasury might be expected to finance".

Does the Minister agree on reflection that my party's policy of putting £340 million of Treasury funds into the Olympics by forgoing lottery duty, which would avoid existing good causes such as arts and heritage losing up to £64 million a year, would be a fairer and more transparent way of funding the Olympic bid and the associated cultural events? When, therefore, will the Government commit themselves to funding the Olympics properly and guarantee the cultural sector that it will not suffer as a result of the games?

Estelle Morris: We have been grateful for the support of Opposition parties throughout the Olympic bid so far, but I understand that the hon. Gentleman is volunteering the Exchequer to fund it. It is absolutely right to get resources for the bid from several different sources, and I have no problem with the special lottery game for the Olympics that will be launched shortly. He is absolutely right that some parts of the arts sector might lose money in the long term, but that is only a guess. It may well be that more people will buy lottery tickets, which would mean that there would be sufficient money to support not only the Olympic bid, but the arts.

Sports Governing Bodies

8. Mr. Andy Reed (Loughborough) (Lab/Co-op): What steps she is taking to assist modernisation of national governing bodies of sport. [208456]

The Minister for Sport and Tourism (Mr. Richard Caborn): UK Sport has administered a modernisation programme since April 2001, which was designed to help national governing bodies of sport to become more efficient and effective in all aspects of their work. To date, Exchequer funding of £10 million has been made available to support a number of projects of differing size and complexity across a wide range of governing bodies. From April this year, the national governing bodies of UK-wide priority sports will be invited to embed their modernisation action plans in one-stop plans and will no longer be required to submit separate applications for modernisation funds.

Mr. Reed: I am grateful to the Minister for that reply. It is important for national governing bodies to modernise the way in which they deliver services and look after their athletes. Is he aware of the Loughborough sports project, which would enable many national governing bodies to come together to share services, especially back-room services? Will he comment, and perhaps write to me, to tell me how the bid from Loughborough is going and when we can anticipate receiving money from modernisation funds to match that which we have already secured in the region, especially from the East Midlands Development Agency?

Mr. Caborn: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his role in Loughborough and wider sports, because he is keen to ensure that the modernisation programme is carried forward. It is pleasing that several governing bodies are co-operating and coming together to consider how they can develop sport in a more holistic way. I hope that that will increase participation in sport, which we would all welcome. Of course the big four governing bodies are working together, but for the small and medium-sized governing bodies, I think that the suggestion from Loughborough is imaginative—he knows that I support it. Financing is a matter of priorities. I hope that the project can go ahead, but as I think he knows, the decision is one for Sport England.

BBC

9. John Robertson (Glasgow, Anniesland) (Lab): What progress she has made towards securing a new royal charter for the BBC. [208457]

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): The charter review process was launched in December 2003 and is continuing. It has been open and transparent throughout and has benefited for the first time ever from wide consultation with the public. There has also been consultation with the industry and in-depth research and advice from Lord Burns and his independent panel. I hope to be in a position to publish a Green Paper in the next two months.

John Robertson: I thank my right hon. Friend for her answer. She knows that the BBC's fair trading commitments are regulated internally. However, it has been suggested that that leads to a conflict of interest on occasions, especially regarding the value of the licence fee and getting a fair deal for the contributor or the supplier. There is also unnecessary bureaucratic expense. Does my right hon. Friend believe that external regulation of the BBC's fair trading commitments could solve that problem and, if so, will she consider it as part of the charter renewal?

Tessa Jowell: The answer to the last part of my hon. Friend's question is yes, for all the good reasons that he set out.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire) (Con): How does the Secretary of State think the BBC's claim for a new royal charter is enhanced by a programme such as CBBC's "Dick & Dom in Da Bungalow"? Perhaps, if she is not familiar with the programme, I can invite her back to my office to see the website, where she can join me in playing "How low can you bungalow?", a test to find one's response to grossly embarrassing personal situations, largely of a lavatorial nature. The right hon. Lady can also view "Pants Dancers in the Hall of Fame", which is photos of children with underwear on their heads, and play "Make Dick Sick", a game that speaks for itself. Finally, there is "Bunged Up", in which one plays a character in a sewage system, avoiding turtle poo coming from various lavatories. Is that really the stuff of public service broadcasting?

Tessa Jowell: It is the Government's job to develop a new charter for the BBC; it is then the BBC's job to determine standards of taste, decency and appropriateness.

Mr. John Grogan (Selby) (Lab): Does my right hon. Friend agree that there are many advantages in a 10-year BBC charter, rather than the five years being mooted in some circles, to span digital switch-over and allow the BBC to plan for public service broadcasting in the post-digital world, not least because it takes three or four years of production to get some programmes, such as the excellent Auschwitz documentary on BBC 2, from the ideas stage to broadcast?

Tessa Jowell: I certainly accept that there is weight in my hon. Friend's case.

Amateur Sports Clubs

10. Mr. Clive Betts (Sheffield, Attercliffe) (Lab): what support her Department offers to amateur sports clubs. [208458]

The Minister for Sport and Tourism (Mr. Richard Caborn): The community amateur sports club scheme provides such clubs with a relief of 80 per cent. on their non-domestic rates—mandatory rate relief—and gift aid on donations from individuals, as part of a package of benefits intended to promote community and grass-roots sport. I welcome the fact that more than 2,000 clubs have so far registered with the scheme and received an estimated total of £5 million in tax relief as a result.

I want to put on record my thanks to my hon. Friend, who moved the amendment to the Local Government Bill which brought about that fundamental change.

Mr. Betts: I thank my right hon. Friend for his answer. I welcome the fact that 2,000 clubs have signed up to the scheme and are receiving the benefits. However, I am sure that my right hon. Friend would accept that there are probably many thousands of clubs who are eligible for the scheme but are not getting the money because they have not applied, perhaps because they do not know that the scheme exists. Will he consider increasing and improving the publicity for the scheme, perhaps by launching a campaign involving

hon. Members on both sides of the house so that they can contact the clubs in their constituencies to make sure that they know about it and apply for it?

Mr. Caborn: That is absolutely right. I happen to have to hand one of the 10,000 leaflets, "Growing community sport", which we distributed to the national governing bodies only a few weeks ago.

Mr. Malcolm Moss (North-East Cambridgeshire) (Con): What a surprise.

Mr. Caborn: As my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Betts) pointed out, there may be 40,000 or more sports clubs in this country, and 2,000 of them are now receiving, year in and year out, £5 million of investment in grass-roots sport. Disappointingly, although the press hammered us daily, screaming for mandatory rate relief and support for sports clubs, when we wrote to every national newspaper three or four weeks ago asking it to broadcast the good news about the relief, not one word about it was printed. The Treasury has been very supportive of the move. I call on the national press and everybody in the House to make sure that every sports club in this country knows that there is money for the taking, week in, week out, year in, year out.

Alistair Burt (North-East Bedfordshire) (Con): Bearing in mind the difficulty of finding adults to come forward to lead young people's organisations of all sorts, including those involved in sports, will the Minister commend the activities of McDonald's, which has supported grass-roots amateur football to the extent of 140 coaches in Bedfordshire in recent years? Will he do all that he can to encourage more adults to come forward to lead young people's sporting organisations, and do away with all the unnecessary regulation which makes that so much more difficult?

Mr. Caborn: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point about trying to encourage more volunteers into sport and into voluntary work per se. Undoubtedly, there are some obstacles to volunteering, including some to which the House has agreed. For example, record checks to guarantee the protection of children are right and must be adhered to. However, other serious problems relate to insurance but, as the hon. Gentleman knows, together with the insurance industry, we are trying to find solutions to that. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has instigated a review of volunteering, through Ian Russell. I hope that his report will be out in the next few weeks, and that will give us a platform for debate. Most hon. Members want to encourage more people to volunteer. Of all volunteers, 27 per cent. are in sport, and without them grass-roots sport would not exist.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) (Lab): Is my right hon. Friend aware that in Bolsover they are ready, willing and able to start an amateur swimming club, and they would probably get a grant? We would provide Olympic and Commonwealth swimmers before my right hon. Friend could can bat an eye. The trouble is we have not got the swimming bath yet, so will he meet representatives of Sport England to get the money from the lottery, to get the bath, and then the show will be on the road?

Mr. Caborn: With the guarantee of Olympic swimmers coming out of Bolsover, how can we refuse such a request? As my hon. Friend knows, we are working with the authorities to try to get investment for a 25 yd swimming pool, and we will continue to do so. I hope that the result will be positive.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford) (Con): Is the Minister aware that amateur sports clubs up and down the country face enormous extra bills as a result of the new fees proposed under the Licensing Act 2003? Is he further aware that his predecessor, the hon. Member the Member for Pontypridd (Dr. Howells), explicitly said in Committee that the Government intended to accept our proposal that voluntary sports clubs should not have to pay more than a 10th of the amount paid by commercial organisations, and that the Government have now betrayed that commitment?

Mr. Caborn: I have just said to the House that amateur sports clubs that want money from the Revenue can qualify for mandatory rate relief; people tell me that they have been asking for that for 30 years. There is also gift aid and other tax breaks available to clubs under the CASC scheme. In fact, those options offer far more money to clubs than the hon. Gentleman's suggestion. He does not know what the licensing fees will be, because they have not been announced yet. I hope that that announcement will be made in the next few days. Any sports club running a bar for profit, which rightly brings money into the club, will find that those fees will be small, and so easily absorbed in the running costs and by the prices of the products sold. The gains for amateur sports clubs under the CASC scheme far outweigh any cost that we will introduce through licensing.

Mr. Whittingdale: The Secretary of State said on Second Reading that she was "absolutely determined" that the Licensing Bill would be "welcomed by sports clubs, large and small". —[Official Report, 24 March 2003; Vol 402; c. 53.]

The Central Council of Physical Recreation, which represents those clubs, has said that the new fees

"risk devastating the entire country's sporting landscape".

It says that it has been inundated by correspondence from clubs that risk losing vital income that helps to keep their organisations alive. Will the Government withdraw the proposed fee levels and honour the commitments that they gave?

Mr. Caborn: We consider every word that is said by organisations that represent sports clubs, but only 2,000 clubs have applied for the CASC scheme, out of a possible 40,000. In one year, those 2,000 clubs have received £5 million. At least the CCPR has been one of the more active bodies in promoting the scheme. There is money waiting to be collected by the other 38,000 sports clubs from mandatory rate relief and other tax breaks, especially gift aid, but they have not applied for it. The governing bodies, the CCPR and others should be ensuring that those 38,000 clubs apply. The proposed liquor licensing fees can be absorbed easily into the bar prices or running costs of clubs.

Community Sports Initiatives

11. John Mann (Bassetlaw) (Lab): What recent representations she has received on funding for community sports initiatives. [208459]

The Minister for Sport and Tourism (Mr. Richard Caborn): The Department receives a range of representations on funding for community sports initiatives. By 2006, the Government will have committed more than £1 billion to the development of sports facilities through the New Opportunities Fund for PE and sport, the community club development programme, Space for Sport and Arts, Active England and the Football Foundation. I will place a full update on our sports facilities programmes in the House of Commons Library within the next few days.

John Mann: Does the Minister agree that there is no better way than sport to combine social inclusion, healthy living and increased aspirations? If he does, does he also agree that we need even more flagship community sports projects, particularly in coalfield communities?

Mr. Caborn: Very much so. I commend my hon. Friend for the initiatives that he has promoted in Bassetlaw and his efforts to develop such projects around coalfield communities. Let me put on record the fact that of the 4,000 initiatives that are getting the investment that I mentioned, 1,000 are now on site, 1,200 have been completed—contrary to what some Conservatives have been saying—and £203 million has been spent on the schemes. A further 2,000 are yet to be completed.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con): Separate from the funding available from the Government, would the Minister describe as generous, mean or middling the financial support available for young people to play tennis from the principal beneficiary of the profitability of the Wimbledon championships—namely, the All England club?

Mr. Caborn: I think that about 50 per cent. of the profits from Wimbledon go into the grass-roots sport. The new strategy presented by the Lawn Tennis Association is most welcome and I am hopeful that, combined with the new grass-roots developments that are taking place, we will see a renaissance in tennis in this country. It was disappointing that we did not get one woman tennis player through the first round at Wimbledon last year, but I believe that the LTA's work in grass-roots development and the investment by the All England club of between £17 million and £20 million a year from the proceeds of the Wimbledon championships will reap rewards.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): On Saturday, I went to see Daneshouse football club at Daneshouse community centre be presented with some kit by Barclays bank. Does my right hon. Friend agree that, in many ways, that type of support for community grass-roots sports by commercial enterprises provides better value than some of their high-profile sponsorship?

Mr. Caborn: I agree. Barclays has now invested through the Football Foundation some £30 million over the next two to three years. In addition, the bank is now working with Groundwork—the regeneration organisation—which has several flagship projects that will be up and running within the next 12 to 18 months. Helped by Barclays' investment with the Football Foundation, which receives £60 million a year, and its work with Groundwork, the campaign is reaching into inner-city areas where sport is needed to encourage young people to become more active and to drive our social inclusion agenda.

Darts

13. Bob Russell (Colchester) (LD): Whether it is her policy to support darts being recognised as a sport. [208461]

The Minister for Sport and Tourism (Mr. Richard Caborn): Decisions on whether particular activities and pastimes should be recognised as sports for official and funding purposes are made by unanimous agreement between the sports councils. I understand that the sports councils keep the matter under constant review, but I was pleased to see today that darts has signed up to UK Sport's anti-drugs code, which I welcome.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) (Con): What about drink?

Mr. Caborn: To the best of my knowledge, alcohol is not covered by UK Sport's anti-drugs code. I hope that, in the light of that development, the sports councils will give more serious consideration to bringing darts into the family of sport.

Bob Russell: If the Prime Minister said that he would like darts to become a recognised sport, would the Minister for Sport and Tourism throw a wobbly? Will he make a 180° turn, and throw his full weight behind the campaign to make darts a recognised sport, as millions of players and supporters already believe that it is a sport?

Mr. Caborn: How much further can I go than say that I welcome darts signing up to the UK anti-drugs code? I hope that the devolved Administrations in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, their sports councils and their English counterparts will consider bringing darts into the family of sport, whether the Prime Minister did, or did not say that he wanted that to happen.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION

The hon. Member for Gosport, representing the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission, was asked—

Electoral Registration

21. Mr. Robert Syms (Poole) (Con): How much money the Electoral Commission is spending on encouraging British citizens who are living abroad and are entitled to vote in general elections to register to vote. [208469]

25. Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet) (Con): What discussions the Electoral Commission has had with businesses on encouraging their workers who are living abroad and eligible to vote in UK elections to register to vote. [208473]

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): I understand that the Electoral Commission undertakes a range of activities aimed at encouraging eligible British citizens living abroad to register. It expects to spend approximately £38,500 during late 2004 and early 2005 on those activities, which include specific initiatives such as advertising and leaflet provision. As for contacting businesses with employees overseas, the Department of Trade and Industry has advised the commission that the most appropriate route is via the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. The commission continues to pursue that route, and has also approached the Confederation of British Industry.

Mr. Syms: I am a little disappointed that the commission only spends £38,500 on advertising abroad. There are 15 million British citizens abroad, including many hundreds of thousands who live on the various Costas. A greater effort ought to be made so that they can exercise their democratic rights. I understand that a leaflet is being produced, so will my hon. Friend ask the commission to place it in consulates and embassies as soon as possible? If the Prime Minister were to panic and go in May, the cut-off date for registration would be 1 March, so February is an important month for people who want to register and exercise their democratic rights.

Mr. Viggers: I can reassure my hon. Friend that the Electoral Commission has indeed produced leaflets, and that they will be available from overseas posts. That is certainly in hand. He is right to emphasise the paucity of the overseas registration. When I last answered questions in the House, I reported that only 14,496 people overseas were registered from a total of about 15 million. However, the Office for National Statistics told me today that only 7,850 people overseas are registered, including 25 from the borough of Poole. There is indeed a very long way to go, and we all have a duty to encourage overseas registration.

Sir Sydney Chapman: I am old enough to remember that the turnout at the 1950 election was 84 per cent., but at the last election it was under 60 per cent. Surely the Electoral Commission's principal objective should be to encourage as many people as possible who are entitled to vote to do so. What proportion of the 15 million people who live and work abroad are entitled to vote?

Mr. Viggers: The Electoral Commission does not have a figure for proportion of the 15 million overseas who are entitled to vote. The qualification, of course, is that they should have been on the register within the last 15 years, but the commission does not have an easy way of ascertaining how many people would qualify. I am sure that my hon. Friend is conscious of the fact that only 57 people from the borough of Barnet, in which his constituency is located, have registered overseas, again proving that there is a long way to go.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Would not it make much more sense to allow the 500,000 British citizens who live in Spain and pay taxes there to register to vote in Spanish elections? Similarly, we should allow Spaniards, Italians, French and German people—all members of the European Union—who live in this country and pay taxes here to vote in the UK. Should it not be a question of no representation without taxation?

Mr. Viggers: That is a different point, which I think that I should not pursue today.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton) (Lab/Co-op): Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will not be concerned that I am much more worried about the many more people who are missing from the register in the United Kingdom rather than those who are abroad. Large numbers of people are missing from the register in my constituency, partly because of the inadequate annual canvass that is carried out by my local authority—

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are on questions now. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will be able to catch my eye later.

22. Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): What plans the commission has to recommend that electors be permitted to register closer to the date of a general election. [208470]

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): The commission recommended in 2003 that electors should be permitted to register much closer to the date of an election than is currently allowed by law. The Government announced last month that they intend to act on the commission's recommendations.

Mr. Allen: I welcome that reply. Like the experience of many Members, the turnout of my electorate at the last election was the lowest ever at under 50 per cent.

Will the hon. Gentleman commend the campaign by the Electoral Commission to encourage people to vote following last year's campaign? Will he consider the possibility of extending that to ensure that more people register for the forthcoming election? Will he also ensure that every possible encouragement is given to individuals to register, if possible, as late as the same day as an election, as they do in many states in the United States? That means that people can register at one door of the town hall and vote in the election at the next door.

Mr. Viggers: The commission takes the view that it would not be practical or of great benefit to allow registration up to the date of the election, but it recommends that that date should be carried back to the date of nominations.

As for the hon. Gentleman's point about publicity, I understand that the commission is about to embark shortly—in early February—on a multi-media campaign aimed at encouraging people to register to vote. There has been some speculation already this afternoon that if there were to be an election in May, something about which I have no special knowledge, the cut-off date would be 11 March. It is important that people should register without delay.

The commission's similar campaign during the last election achieved excellent results, with about one in three correspondents who had seen the advertising saying that they had voted on 10 June as a result of the campaign. The commission is encouraged by that.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby) (Con): Regarding a later date for registration for elections, does my hon. Friend share my real concern about the collapse in the number of service personnel registered to vote? Does he agree that there needs to be a determined campaign by the Ministry of Defence to encourage them to register so that the brave men and women who are serving overseas, often in dangerous circumstances, are able to register before we have an election, which is likely to be in May?

Mr. Viggers: My hon. Friend may have noticed a reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) on 10 January, in which the Government announced that there would be a Defence Council initiative, which would be taken shortly, to encourage service personnel to vote. My hon. Friend is on to an extremely good point. As I have said before in the House, I am perhaps more likely to be concerned about this issue than most as the number of service voters registered in the borough of Gosport has fallen from 4,370 in 2000 to 474 in 2004. I think we all should be concerned about that.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): Have Ministers given the Electoral Commission any indication when they will implement that recommendation? Have the Government pledged to do so before the next general election or have they just said that it will happen at some time?

Mr. Viggers: The Government have said that the recommendation will be implemented as soon as possible but that it would require primary legislation. I think that it is most unlikely that it will be before the election, whatever the date of that.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMISSION

The Chairman of the Public Accounts Commission was asked—

IT Projects

23. Sir Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire) (LD): What assessment has been made of the resources available to the National Audit Office to undertake appropriate inquiries into the future procurement of major departmental IT projects. [208471]

The Chairman of the Public Accounts Commission (Mr. Alan Williams): The National Audit Office already examines IT programmes and projects as part of the annual programme of value-for-money studies. The cost implications of the NAO's work are reflected in the resource bids submitted by the Comptroller and Auditor General for consideration by the Public Accounts Commission. The commission will be examining the NAO's bid for 2005–06 at its meeting on 27 February.

Sir Archy Kirkwood: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for that answer and commend the work that he and his fellow commisioners do through the National Audit Office and the Public Accounts Committee, keeping the House informed of historic analyses of public expenditure, which is vital. He has a great deal of experience in this field. Has he any suggestions as to how the House could be better informed about future spend, particularly on ICT projects, which have huge cost implications, as they roll out? The value of the NAO reports and the Public Accounts Committee's valuable work is too historic for the House to be sure that it is keeping in touch with what is happening in some of the big projects currently being rolled out.

Mr. Williams: As the hon. Gentleman well understands, the investigatory role that the NAO carries out on behalf of the House must inevitably be retrospective. In order to retain the independence of that scrutiny, it is important that the NAO does not get involved at too early a stage. Let me report on what I think is a hopeful development, though not yet an achieved result. In November, the Office of Government Commerce appeared before the Public Accounts Committee and outlined to us a programme of gateway reviews—key stage reviews—of IT projects across virtually all Departments. When a project is in trouble, the gateway is graded red and the project does not progress until it has been examined. I suggested at that meeting that the National Audit Office should be notified as soon as a project is classified red, and that the NAO should be able to recommend it to us. A couple of weeks later we had the Ministry of Defence before us, which does not operate quite the same system as the OGC, but has a system of its own. I put the same question to the MOD, which has agreed to speak to the NAO, and I am hopeful that we will be able to develop some sort of early warning system in our next report.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough) (Con): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the question is useful and pertinent, because it underlines the central importance of IT to the political debate? For instance, in the debate on identity cards there was very little mention of the fact that there are huge discussions about whether the costs will range from £1.1 billion to £3 billion, which is the Government's estimate, or £5 billion, which is the estimate of others, solely because of IT. To give reassurance to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Sir Archy Kirkwood), on Wednesday this week the NAO is publishing a report on patient choice—again, central to the policy debate. The cost of that and its effectiveness will depend crucially on IT. The question underlines the importance of the subject.

Mr. Williams: May I agree with the hon. Gentleman in his agreeing with me?

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I agree, too. The learned society, the British Computer Society, offered to give advice to the Government some years ago—an offer that was refused. Is it possible to take up the offer on behalf of the commission and the National Audit Office, to provide expert advice on the construction of IT projects? Could the Home Office be under continual review in that respect, as it is the author of the most spectacular failures of IT and has still not implemented a requirement of section 39 of the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1997 to set up a central register of holders of shotgun and firearms certificates? That was introduced seven years ago and not a single operation or programme has been constructed.

Mr. Williams: It is for the NAO to decide which reviews it undertakes. It is independent in the pure sense of the word and it is essential that it remains so. However, I shall draw to the attention of the Comptroller and Auditor General the points that the hon. Gentleman made.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION

The hon. Member for Gosport, representing the Speaker's Committee, was asked—

Electoral Registration

24. Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire) (Lab): Whether the Commission plans to make proposals for further developing the facilities for rolling electoral registration. [208472]

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): The commission has recommended changes in the law enabling voters to register closer to polling day, and the piloting of online and telephone registration. The Government indicated last month that they intend to act on the commission's recommendations with regard to registering closer to polling day, and will give further consideration to the development of online and telephone registration.

Mr. Barnes: That is a welcome reply. Is not one of the shortcomings of the otherwise progressive move towards rolling electoral registration that it tends to depend on people who have moved home transferring their registration? The last thing that people have on their mind when they move home is electoral registration. The time when they will have it on their mind is when an election is called. That is when they need an opportunity to change their registration through rolling electoral registration so that they can vote in the place they have moved to.

Mr. Viggers: The House always listens to the hon. Gentleman with interest because he does not so much follow this subject as lead it, and many of the details in his private Member's Bill in 1993 have become law. Yes, the Electoral Commission agrees with the thrust of the hon. Gentleman's question. It believes that it should move to individual registration in the longer term, but certainly it should move to registration nearer to the date of the election. However, as I have explained in an earlier question, it is most unlikely that this will be implemented before the election because it will require primary legislation.

Point of Order

3.30 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (Lab): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. At the risk of irritating you, may I ask whether you have had a request from either the Foreign Office or the Ministry of Defence to make some kind of report to the House on the impact of the continuing violence on the elections that are to take place very soon? Apparently, journalists are holed up in the green zone and unable to go out and see what is happening on the streets of Baghdad. I know that it is irritating to go back to this subject, but it is desperately important.

Mr. Speaker: The Father of the House is never irritating, he is just persistent. He asked this morning for an urgent question on this matter and I refused him, but perhaps the Ministers concerned will have heard his plea.

BILL PRESENTED

CROWN EMPLOYMENT (NATIONALITY)

Mr. Andrew Dismore, supported by Ms Karen Buck, Mr. Iain Coleman, Mr. Andrew Love, Tony Wright, Sir Sydney Chapman, Linda Perham, John Austin, Mrs. Annette L. Brooke, Keith Vaz and Mr. Stephen Pound, presented a Bill to make provision for and in connection with the removal of general restrictions as to nationality which apply to persons employed or holding office in any civil capacity under the Crown; and for connected purposes. And the same was read the First time: and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 13 May, and to be printed. Explanatory notes to be printed [Bill 40].

Orders of the Day

Constitutional Reform Bill [Lords]

[Relevant documents: Twenty-third Report from the Joint Committee on Human Rights, Session 2003–04, Scrutiny of Bills: Final Progress Report, HC 1282; First Report from the Constitutional Affairs Committee, Session 2003–04, HC 48, on Judicial Appointments and a Supreme Court (court of final appeal), and the Government's response thereto, Cm 6150.]

Order for Second Reading read.

The Minister for the Arts (Estelle Morris): I have it in command from Her Majesty the Queen to acquaint the House that Her Majesty, having been informed of the purport of the Bill, has consented to place her prerogative and interest, so far as they are affected by the Bill, at the disposal of Parliament for the purposes of the Bill.

Mr. Speaker: I inform the House that I have selected the amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

3.32 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. Christopher Leslie): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

I am pleased that, after much debate and discussion in the other place, the Bill has at long last come to the House of Commons. I shall address the details of the Bill in due course, but we must not neglect the fundamental principles driving the reform, namely, the need to modernise our constitution so that our institutions can serve the public in a clearer, more transparent and more effective manner; so that our courts and justice system can be administered by a full-time Minister clearly accountable to Parliament; and so that the relationship between the three arms of the state—Parliament, the judiciary and the Executive—is settled, clarified and easier to understand, in turn making each better fitted to carry out its vital roles in a modern democracy.

The Bill therefore proposes the reform of the office of Lord Chancellor, removing the blurred lines between political and judicial functions, so that the post holder, as a full-time Cabinet Minister, can concentrate on the administration of the justice system, no longer sitting as a judge, and we hope no longer tied to the Woolsack in the other place as its presiding officer. The Bill sets up a new judicial appointments commission, an independent body responsible for selecting our judges in the future, and it creates a new supreme court, putting beyond any doubt the independence from politics and the legislature of the highest appellate court in the United Kingdom. There will be a clearer separation of the powers of Parliament, the judiciary and the Executive, and greater confidence in the shape and nature of each branch of our constitution.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): It would be appropriate if the hon. Gentleman could tell us at this stage what these changes will cost.

Mr. Leslie: The hon. Gentleman must wait for that section of my speech, when I shall be happy to elaborate on that particular matter—I know that he will wait patiently.

[Mr. Leslie]

There has been wide consultation on the reforms. Many academics and observers of our constitution have long called for a properly independent judicial appointments process and a separate supreme court for the UK. The Lord Chief Justice and members of the senior judiciary support the Government, and a Select Committee of the House of Lords has meticulously scrutinised the Bill.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): I am startled to hear that the Lord Chief Justice supports the Government. I recall the Lord Chief Justice saying that, given the constitutional crisis that the Government precipitated by announcing their back-of-the-envelope changes in summer 2003 without any consultation, certain aspects of the Government's proposals—in particular, the concordat, on which the Lord Chief Justice insisted—make the best of a bad job.

Mr. Leslie: That is not a correct representation of the Lord Chief Justice's views. A lot of time has passed since the Bill was introduced—as I have said, it was debated at length in the other place—and the robust package of measures has wide support, including from members of the senior judiciary. We have responded to the long debate in the other place and have accepted a number of changes.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) (Lab): Will my hon. Friend have no truck whatever with the argument that this is a Johnny-come-lately policy? It is more than 12 years since the party of which we are members agreed the basic points in the package. Some of us think that the process has taken far too long to come to fruition, rather than its having been done on the back of an envelope in the past 18 months.

Mr. Leslie: My hon. Friend makes the reasonable point that the measures are fundamental and overdue. They are important, in so far as they help to clarify the relationship between the different branches of our constitution.

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): Would it not have been easier to maintain the position described by the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) if the announcement had not been made before any consultation had occurred and had not been seen as a fudge? If we were starting afresh, one might believe in the process, but not after the Prime Minister made such a faux pas in the first place.

Mr. Leslie: All good ideas have to start somewhere. This one started with the announcement by the Prime Minister, which subsequently resulted in numerous consultation papers and a lengthy consultation process. The process in the other place was even longer and involved accepting a number of changes to the Bill.

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): This point relates to the argument advanced by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve): on Second Reading, the Lord Chief Justice referred to the Bill as "a piece of great reforming legislation", and said that

"it will rank in importance with the great constitutional instruments of the past."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 7 December 2004; Vol. 655, c. 759.]

Mr. Leslie: My hon. and learned Friend always has the facts at her fingertips, and I am grateful for that quote.

We have reflected on the consideration of the Bill in the other place and have accepted a number of changes. The Government accept the decision of the House of Lords on the retention of the title and formal office of Lord Chancellor. Whether the post holder is called "Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs" or "Lord Chancellor", or whether he has both titles, is not a matter of great significance. What matters most is the substance of the post, the nature of the job and whether the position is reformed so that the post holder's duties are no longer contradictory.

If the role of the head of the judiciary can pass to the Lord Chief Justice, and with it many of the judicial functions incompatible with the role of a political Cabinet Minister, then the office of Lord Chancellor can continue, but in that substantially reformed way. The Bill continues the office of the Lord Chancellor, but in a significantly altered and more appropriate form.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): Does the Minister recall that the Constitutional Affairs Committee indicated that the important point is that the office of Lord Chancellor, which it felt should continue at least for the time being, should be in position firmly to assert and protect judicial independence, particularly when senior Ministers might appear to impair and threaten it, and that the post holder must therefore be someone of considerable seniority who is not looking for further promotion?

Mr. Leslie: I shall comment later on the other protections that we have added, with particular reference to the office of Lord Chancellor and the holder of that ministerial office. We have managed to strike the right balance in having flexibility for the Prime Minister in making appointments while enshrining the independence of the judiciary in its relationship with that post.

Mr. Grieve: I, too, commend the parts of the Lord Chief Justice's speech on Second Reading that the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) commented on, which dealt with the concordat and the manner in which the Government had carried out their proposals. Can the Minister provide reassurance that the Government will preserve the substance of the amendments on the Lord Chancellor that were drafted in another place to ensure that we retain not only the Lord Chancellor's name in carrying out the functions of the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, but the added protections of his sitting in the House of Lords and being a lawyer?

Mr. Leslie: I may be giving way a little too often, because I was about to come to that. Perhaps that is something that I can learn for the future.

Before dealing with the hon. Gentleman's question, I want to restate why these reforms are necessary. Under the current system, the Lord Chancellor holds potentially conflicting judicial and political roles, and sole responsibility for the whole judicial appointments process. In our view, it is no longer appropriate for a Government Minister to have such unfettered discretion in the appointment of judges. The Lord Chancellor also holds a number of outdated, inappropriate and anachronistic functions. Reform of the office will enable that Minister to focus on his and the Government's main priority—the delivery of essential public services.

The Bill gives all Ministers—particularly the Lord Chancellor—and those responsible for matters relating to the judiciary and the administration of justice a statutory duty to uphold the independence of the judiciary. It ends the Lord Chancellor's judicial functions and ensures that his responsibilities for the judiciary are exercised under new transparent statutory arrangements with the Lord Chief Justice.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough) (Con): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Leslie: I wanted to turn to the detail of the Bill, but I shall give way to the hon. and learned Gentleman before doing so.

Mr. Garnier: The Minister says that the Government want to modernise the operation of the judicial appointments system and make it transparent. Why then did the Lord Chancellor for the transitional period, as he likes to call himself, appoint his pupil master as president of the family division?

Mr. Leslie: We have to operate under the law as it stands, but we want to reform it. The hon. and learned Gentleman argues rather perversely that he does not like the existing system yet wants to retain it. I am not sure that he is striking the right chord.

Keith Vaz (Leicester, East) (Lab): I congratulate the Minister and the Lord Chancellor on listening to many people's concerns about the initial package that was put before both Houses last year and on adopting several of the changes. How can he ensure that the Government's commitment to equal opportunities—the Lord Chancellor is of course very committed to equal opportunities—will be transferred to the new judicial appointments commission, since the commission is under no obligation to accept what the Lord Chancellor has said?

Mr. Leslie: As a broader, wider and more diverse body, a judicial appointments commission for England and Wales will have a positive and beneficial impact on the diversity of the appointments that it makes and the range of persons from whom it can select, notwithstanding that all appointments are obviously made solely on the basis of merit. I shall come to some specific points on diversity later.

Vera Baird: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Leslie: I want to make a little progress first.

Part 1 concerns the rule of law and was added in the other place. The provisions ensure that nothing in the Bill adversely affects the constitutional principle of the rule of law. In making these changes, it is important that we do not lose the principles that have served us well in the past. The rule of law is one such area, and the new provisions improve and enhance the Bill.

Part 2 relates to reform of the office of Lord Chancellor. Throughout the Bill's passage in the other place, peers felt extremely strongly about the retention of the title of Lord Chancellor. Amendments were therefore made to facilitate that. As I said, although we believe that our original intention to abolish the office was well founded, we accept that many attach a symbolic value to the title. The Government do not feel that retaining the office and title of Lord Chancellor significantly affects the substance of our reform objectives, so we can accept that change.

Let me deal with the question about the insistence of the other place that the person who holds the office of Lord Chancellor must be a Member of the House of Lords and must have either held high judicial office or been a practising lawyer for at least 12 years. Given the substantially reformed nature of the post, we firmly believe that there is no longer any fixed requirement for the Lord Chancellor always to be a peer and a lawyer.

A Prime Minister should be able to appoint the best person for the job, whether they sit in the House of Lords or the House of Commons, rather than having a restricted choice. It would be perverse deliberately to prevent a person from holding a purely ministerial post simply because they were an elected representative. There will no longer be a need for the office holder to be a peer. Given that the Lord Chancellor is responsible for nearly £3 billion of public expenditure, it is surely reasonable that in future a Prime Minister can appoint a candidate who is capable of being held accountable to either House of Parliament, not just one House.

Chris Bryant (Rhondda) (Lab): Historically, one of the requirements for the Lord Chancellor is that he is not a member of the Roman Catholic Church. Will that requirement remain or change? Why is the Lord Chancellor's oath, unlike the oath in this House, given in only a theistic way? Perhaps a future office holder might not have a religious faith.

Mr. Leslie: On the detailed second point, I understand that the Oaths Acts allow for affirmation and so on. Although the Bill does not deal with that, other legislation does. On the first point, the Bill does not make the change about which my hon. Friend asked, but perhaps he can raise the matter at a later stage of its passage.

Sir Patrick Cormack: If the Government insist on removing the amendment that the House of Lords has inserted, how can they guarantee getting the measure through before the election?

Mr. Leslie: As the hon. Gentleman's party knows, there are no guarantees in politics. If the House of Commons decides to overturn the amendment, it would not be wise for the House of Lords to insist on it, but that is a natural part of the to-ing and fro-ing of the legislative process.

[Mr. Leslie]

On whether there should be a condition such as being a peer or a senior lawyer, the Lord Chief Justice, speaking for the judiciary as a whole, has made it clear that a Minister from either House could perform the functions of the new Lord Chancellor post. The Lord Chancellor will not be a judge and no more needs to be a lawyer than the Secretary of State for Health needs to be a doctor or the Chancellor of the Exchequer needs to be a qualified accountant.

Legal qualifications are not an essential requirement for a ministerial post that will in future act on recommendations from an independent judicial appointments commission, whose job will be to weigh up candidates' precise legal abilities. The Government will also have the Attorney-General to call upon for any advice on legal questions.

Mr. Grieve: I accept that there will be a judicial appointments commission. Indeed, it is the one aspect of the Bill that I am broadly happy to welcome. If the Bill had been confined to that, I would welcome it even more. However, the Under-Secretary will acknowledge that it retains important powers for the new Minister both in making a final selection and in maintaining links with the judiciary to initiate work by the judicial appointments commission in selecting new judges. In those circumstances, is not the other place correct to insist that the Lord Chancellor should be a unique Minister and not simply any Minister?

Mr. Leslie: The Lord Chancellor will be a unique Minister and will have several protections, as set out in the Bill. However, I am not convinced that that extends to the absolute requirement that the Lord Chancellor must be a senior lawyer and a peer. There are no especially strong arguments given the new nature of the ministerial post. The Government will therefore seek to remove the requirements so that the Prime Minister's choice of office holder will not be so restricted.

The time has come for a more appropriate senior structure for our judiciary. The Bill establishes the Lord Chief Justice rather than the Lord Chancellor as the head of the judiciary in England and Wales. We will introduce amendments to provide similar provisions for the Lord Chief Justice in Northern Ireland.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich) (Lab): I hesitate to get involved in this, because I must be one of the few non-lawyers in this place—[HON. MEMBERS: "No!"] Oh, I am glad that some other peasants have got in by accident. Is my hon. Friend the Minister using the theory behind private finance initiatives, which works on the assumption that because someone knows nothing about a particular profession, they should automatically be put in charge of it? Or am I misinterpreting what he is doing?

Mr. Leslie: I am not a lawyer either, but I think that having a fresh perspective on a particular responsibility is sometimes a benefit, rather than a disadvantage. There are pros and cons on both sides of this argument, but we do not feel that the post-holder should be tied to one particular qualification. That would not be justified by the nature of the new ministerial post.

The Bill also makes new arrangements for many of the statutory functions of the Lord Chancellor that relate to the judiciary. These will either be transferred to the Lord Chief Justice completely, or be exercised jointly with the Lord Chief Justice, with requirements for consultation or concurrence between them and their counterparts in Scotland and Northern Ireland as appropriate. This division of responsibilities was agreed between the Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice and is known as the concordat. Reflecting on this historic agreement, the Lord Chief Justice has commented that:

"The judiciary considers that the parts of the Bill that reflect the concordat are a highly desirable package of measures designed to ensure the continued independence of the judiciary."

He added that he "would consider it an unsatisfactory situation if the present position were left in place."

The concordat was presented to Parliament on 26 January last year, and amendments to the Bill were tabled by the Government in the other place to reflect that agreement.

Mr. Richard Shepherd (Aldridge-Brownhills) (Con): The Minister referred to the "continued independence of the judiciary" being maintained. It is independent now. What is the point of this Bill, if we already have confidence in the existing arrangement?

Mr. Leslie: We need to strengthen that independence further, and we are doing that by taking away the judicial role of the legislature and taking away the legislating role of the judiciary. I hope that that explains the measures to the hon. Gentleman in a nutshell.

Mr. Grieve: Will the Minister now take the opportunity to accept that the original proposals did not envisage a concordat, and that the concordat was required because of the alarm of the judiciary, which was reflected in the comments of the Lord Chief Justice that, without it, this measure would constitute a serious transfer of power to the Executive that would affect the independence of the judiciary? That is why the concordat was necessary. This colours the entire nature of this debate and, particularly, the Government's bad faith in respect of it.

Mr. Leslie: I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman thinks that the concordat is necessary. We do, too, and it is now on the table and part of the package that we are offering. I restate the quote from the Lord Chief Justice that he "would consider it an unsatisfactory situation if the present position were left in place." [Official Report, House of Lords, 8 March 2004, Vol. 658, c. 1004.]

We have taken great care to do nothing to diminish the independence of the judiciary. On the contrary, clause 4 of the Bill provides a new statutory guarantee of continued judicial independence. It creates a duty on all Ministers of the Crown and all others with responsibility for the administration of justice to uphold the continued independence of the judiciary.

Vera Baird: Coming back to what the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) said a moment ago, I should like to point out that Lord Woolf said on Third Reading that "even in its original form, the judiciary was supportive of the Bill … as a package of reforms that would significantly improve the protection provided for their independence."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 20 December 2004; Vol. 667, c. 1555–56.]

Mr. Leslie: Yet again, my hon. and learned Friend helps to give breadth and depth to the debate. That was most useful.

Mr. Garnier: I would not like the Minister to ruin a great legal and political career by giving too much praise to the hon. and learned Lady. Will he tell us which parts of the concordat are to form parts of the legislation, and which parts we are simply to rely on by placing our trust in the Government?

Mr. Leslie: Some parts are in the Bill and some are not. That is by agreement, and we shall no doubt go through those matters at great length in Committee, much of which, hon. Members will be delighted to know, will be held on the Floor of the House. The hon. Gentleman will have plenty of opportunities to go into that issue in detail later.

The Bill also places an additional duty on the Lord Chancellor to have regard to defending the continued independence of the judiciary. That duty will also apply, for example, in his handling of the recommendations from the new judicial appointments commission and in funding and running the administration of the courts. Clause 5 amends the Justice (Northern Ireland) Act 2002 to ensure that the provisions made by that Act in relation to the guarantee of judicial independence are consistent with the provision made by clause 4.

Our judiciary will have strengthened independence, but will still have a dialogue with the Government and Parliament. In recognition of the important contribution of the Lord Chief Justice of England and Wales, the Lord President of the Court of Session and the Lord Chief Justice of Northern Ireland, clause 6 provides that they may table written representations to Parliament on matters relating to the judiciary or the justice system. In addition, the Bill recognises the important role of the Lord Chief Justice in respect of the judiciary. It sets out his responsibilities, including representing the views of the judiciary to the Government, and the training, guidance, welfare and deployment of the judiciary of England and Wales.

The role of the Lord Chancellor in delivering the concordat will be fundamental. It has been agreed between the Lord Chief Justice and the Lord Chancellor that functions of the Lord Chancellor that relate to the judiciary and the court system should not, in future, be transferable away from that Minister without primary legislation. That is set out in clause 17. It is another protection that the Chairman of the Committee has mentioned.

I turn now to the question of who will act as the presiding officer of the other place. The Government continue to believe that, for a busy Minister of the Crown, sitting also as a Speaker or presiding officer over a House of Parliament is a heavy burden indeed. We therefore take the view that the House of Lords should have the benefit of a presiding officer who can devote his or her time solely to its service.

Ultimately, of course, decisions on who should be the presiding officer of the other place are a matter for their lordships themselves as part of the Standing Orders of the House of Lords, which currently stipulate that the duties form part of the role of the Lord Chancellor. But it is undoubtedly odd that any House of Parliament should automatically accept the appointee of the Prime Minister as its Speaker or presiding officer, a state of affairs not conducive to the supremacy of Parliament in our constitution. The Bill therefore helps to facilitate the process now in train in the other place about who might take on that aspect of the Lord Chancellor's current functions. The House of Lords has not yet formed its view, nor decided the title of that presiding officer.

Part 2 of the Bill therefore allows the statutory functions of the Lord Chancellor, in his capacity as Speaker of the other place, to be exercised by anyone who fills that role in future.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall) (LD): I hope that Members on both sides of the House will accept what the Minister says. I would put the case even more strongly, because it is surely wrong that a member of the Executive should preside in either House of Parliament. It is important to try to keep apart the roles of the Executive and the legislature, and that proposition should have the support of every right hon. and hon. Member.

Mr. Leslie: I tend to agree with the hon. Gentleman on that point, although he will understand that it is for the other place to decide on the arrangements for its presiding officer.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Should not we put it on record that the so-called presiding officer in the other place fulfils a function wholly different from that performed by Mr. Speaker in this place? The other place is self-regulating and wishes to remain so. Whoever sits on the Woolsack does not exercise the power and responsibility of Mr. Speaker, and the title of that person should not be confused with that of Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Leslie: I understand that there are differences between the two presiding officer functions, but that is not to say that there are not public expectations about the role of the individual who sits on the Woolsack or that he or she will not undertake presiding officer duties in the course of business in the House of Lords. It is not for us to dictate to the House of Lords, at this stage, the arrangements that it should make for its presiding officer.

Mr. Garnier: If the House of Lords decides that it wishes its presiding officer—whatever he will be called—to be the present Lord Chancellor, but the Prime Minister decides that the Lord Chancellor's office should be held by a Member of the House of Commons, how will the Government square that circle? [Interruption.]

Mr. Leslie: As voices off remind us, it would be very difficult to do so. However, it would be a matter for the other place to find an appropriate person to be its presiding officer.

[Mr. Leslie]

Part 3, another fundamental part of the Bill, would create a new supreme court for the United Kingdom, separate from Parliament but with the current appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords and the devolution jurisdiction of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Two principles underpin the Government's proposals for a United Kingdom supreme court: first, the functional separation of the judiciary from the legislature, and secondly, the need for greater constitutional clarity and visible independence for the United Kingdom's highest court.

The ultimate court of appeal is doing something different from the legislature; it should be doing it separately, and should be clearly seen to be doing it separately. Functional separation of the judiciary at all levels from the legislature and the Executive is a cardinal feature of any modern, liberal and democratic state governed by the rule of law.

Furthermore, the Law Lords are judges, not legislators. They are specifically appointed to act as the UK's supreme court

"for the purpose of aiding the House of Lords in the hearing and determination of appeals", in the words of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act 1876. They are there as judges and it is no longer tenable to see those judges act in the legislative role.

I emphasise that the proposals imply no criticism of the performance of the Law Lords. I know that they are admired around the world and have always acted with the utmost integrity, independence and objectivity. However, that is not reason enough to maintain the current position. The very fact that in recent years the Law Lords have had to exercise a self-denying ordinance neither to speak nor vote in the House of Lords on matters that might come before them in a judicial capacity indicates that there is something fundamentally flawed in the current arrangements, however well they may seem to work.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman was at great pains to say that nothing had gone wrong so far, yet he then said that as people do not understand that nothing has gone wrong so far, we have to change things. I do not understand what has happened to our society if we are unable to understand something that we had been perfectly able to understand, and people had been perfectly well able to run, for so many years, and which is, to quote the Minister, well known and honoured throughout the world. Why can we not go on as we have done?

Mr. Leslie: Having the Appellate Committee as the highest court in the legislature has not sat comfortably for more than a century. The Appellate Jurisdiction Act, although it was not commenced, sought to establish a separate UK supreme court. For various reasons, that did not happen at the time. The initiative is not exactly new but it is long, long overdue.

Mr. Clive Soley (Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush) (Lab): It is important to remember that most of us have been dissatisfied with the situation because the Lord Chancellor, who was appointing judges, was an active party politician. Ever since I saw Lord Hailsham on the beach in his bathing costume ringing the bell for the Tory party and then claiming that he was completely independent, I have viewed the system with some suspicion.

Mr. Leslie: Matters of family honour may need defending on that point, but I hear what my hon. Friend says.

Half the Law Lords are reported to be uncomfortable with the present arrangements. If we do not move to reform, how long will it be before a majority are unhappy? The time has come for our highest court to be a separate institution—not only separate, but seen to be separate. By establishing a supreme court, we shall create a visible apex of an independent United Kingdom judicial system, and we shall increase public comprehension of the judicial system, both in this country and abroad.

Sir Patrick Cormack: The Minister is exemplary in giving way, but I must correct one point made by his hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush (Mr. Soley). When Lord Hailsham rang his bell he was chairman of the Conservative party, not Lord Chancellor. As Lord Chancellor, he exercised his functions with great distinction and complete impartiality.

Mr. Leslie: Politicians should stick to politics and the judiciary should stick to judging. That is the clear direction in which we are travelling and there is not a massive amount of controversy about that issue.

Annabelle Ewing (Perth) (SNP): The Minister referred a moment ago to the fact the new supreme court would be an independent UK judicial system—I think that that was the phrase that he used—but given that the funding arrangements for the new supreme court will still be part of the Department for Constitutional Affairs' overall budget, the chief executive of the new supreme court will be appointed by the DCA Minister, and the DCA Minister will retain functions that relate to the judiciary in England and Wales, how can it be argued therefore that all aspects of the new supreme court will be entirely distinct and separate from the legal system south of the border? Surely it therefore falls foul of the 1707 treaty of Union.

Mr. Leslie: The hon. Lady is wrong. First, the Department for Constitutional Affairs is a United Kingdom Department, not specifically relating to England and Wales. Secondly, the post of chief executive of the new supreme court will not be simply a ministerial appointment in the way that she describes. Thirdly, although there must be some accountability to Parliament for the taxpayers' money expended in the running and operations of the United Kingdom supreme court—ministerial accountability is therefore the way to provide that—we will provide protections separate from the normal run-of-the-mill votes and estimates that departmental budgets come under, and those resources will be ring-fenced. That will provide adequate protection for the new supreme court, so that it is seen to be independent, and is given the measure of independence set out in the Bill.

Understandable concern has been expressed about where the supreme court will be located and the cost of such a building. I am sure that Opposition Members are keen to consider that. The building for the supreme court should be a reflection of the court's importance and its place at the heart of the justice system and the constitution, yet simultaneously not excessive or lavish.

The current accommodation for the Law Lords in the Palace of Westminster leaves a lot to be desired. Their offices are cramped and inconveniently located, and constraints on the space available limit the number of support staff. Quite separately from the constitutional principles, there is a strong case for improved facilities. We have therefore considered many different building options over the past year, and after detailed evaluation and close consultation with the Law Lords, our preferred option is Middlesex Guildhall, which is on the opposite side of Parliament square from Parliament, and currently a Crown court building. We believe that it can be adapted to meet the operational requirements of a modern supreme court and provide a building of sufficiently prestigious design and location—all, of course, subject to the normal planning controls.

Mr. Grieve: I certainly agree with the Minister that the Law Lords may have divided views, but before history is rewritten, the Minister must have read the speech of Lord Nicholls in respect of the supreme court and his comments, as a Law Lord, about the adequacy of the accommodation currently available in the House of Lords. Would he like to confirm whether he has done so? In fact, in that speech, the indication from one Law Lord was that he considered that the accommodation provided in the House of Lords was entirely adequate.

Mr. Leslie: We could bandy about various quotes from different Law Lords. Certainly, some Law Lords hold that view; others hold a different view. For example, Lord Bingham said:

"I doubt if any supreme court anywhere in the developed world is as cramped as our own."

He then said that there was an

"acute shortage of space . . . I cannot see why the fourth richest economy in the world cannot" have its own building.

Lord Steyn—another Law Lord—said that "the accommodation available for the final court of appeal" was "not adequate".

Different Law Lords have different views, but I do not think that by any stretch of the imagination, the hon. Gentleman is unable to envisage improvements that could be made to the accommodation for our highest court of appeal in the land—something that he will hold as a respected institution that deserves to be supported in the best way possible, to help to preserve the judiciary's independence.

The cost of establishing the supreme court at Middlesex Guildhall will be approximately £30 million, but we will also need to ensure that the criminal justice system is not adversely affected by the selection of that building. We will therefore provide additional courtrooms to handle the Crown court work currently undertaken at the Guildhall, at an estimated further cost of £15 million.

The Government are committed to implementing the new supreme court properly and to achieving value for money. That is why clause 120 contains provisions to ensure that the supreme court can not be implemented until an appropriate building is ready to receive it. Those provisions demonstrate our pledge that we will not implement the supreme court arrangements prematurely.

Mr. Grieve: The Minister said that Middlesex Guildhall was the preferred option and then went on to say in some detail that, in fact, it was the Government's choice. However, Lord Bingham, who wants a supreme court, has expressed extremely unfavourable views about the Guildhall.

Mr. Leslie: Again, I do not think that is a fair categorisation. No building is absolutely perfect. I have long preferred Middlesex Guildhall, and I know that others hon. Members have reached that conclusion. It is seems an obvious conclusion to draw. The building is already there, we can see it and we know what it looks like. It looks right, it feels right and it is in the right location. It is my preferred option—but of course, it remains subject to the normal planning constraints that we have to go through. It remains a preferred option at this stage while we make sure that all those processes are undertaken properly.

Annabelle Ewing: The Minister is most generous in giving way again. Paragraph 330 of the explanatory notes—I recognise that they are only advisory—states that "it will be necessary to provide additional courtrooms to take on Middlesex Guildhall's Crown Court work."

Will he clarify whether these additional courtrooms will be located in the Middlesex Guildhall or in an entirely different building somewhere else in London?

Mr. Leslie: The latter. The courtrooms would have to be located somewhere else, but they will be in London.

I want to mention briefly other aspects of this part of the Bill. Clauses 22 to 28 set out the arrangements for the selection of members of the supreme court. Clauses 45 to 50 also make provision for the governance of the court to be as independent as possible—I answered that point earlier in response to a question from the hon. Lady—so that it is compatible with its position as a body in receipt of public funds. As a logical consequence of the separation between the judiciary and the legislature, clause 109 restricts the rights of Members of the House of Lords to sit and vote, for as long as they hold full-time judicial office.

Mr. Garnier: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Leslie: Oh, go on. I will give way again.

Mr. Garnier: I know that it is boring for the Minister to have to explain himself, but that is what he is here to do. I want to ask about clause 65, entitled "Exercise of powers to reject or require reconsideration". The judicial appointments commission will be able to put up a name to the Minister and he will be able to reject it. However, clause 65(2) says:

"The power of the Minister . . . to require the selection panel to reconsider . . . is exercisable only on the grounds that, in the Minister's opinion—

(a) there is not enough evidence that the person is suitable for the office concerned, or

(b) there is evidence that the person is not the best candidate on merit."

Those are rather interesting expressions. What sort of evidence is the Minister is likely to have that the commission will not have had or considered? What is it about the merits of the candidate that may not attract the Minister but may have attracted the commission?

Mr. Leslie: I happen to think that the drafting of clause 65(2) is pretty good, in that it does not go unnecessarily into the definition of that evidence, and keeps it fairly broad, but is challengeable also. For example, evidence could be that knowledge of a criminal conviction has emerged that was not available to the judicial appointments commission. That is the sort of issue, but we will go through some of the particulars in Committee.

Part 4 creates a judicial appointments commission and a judicial appointments and conduct ombudsman for England and Wales. Selection must be solely on merit, but this part of the Bill also sets out the process to be followed in appointing judicial office holders and in providing for complaints to be made to the ombudsman. It also makes provision for a new disciplinary process in relation to the judiciary. The Government believe that creating a judicial appointments commission for England and Wales will itself send a powerful message that judicial appointments are to be open, transparent, accessible, and removed from the control of a single Minister. It will also help to promote equality and diversity among those appointed to our judiciary.

Although the quality of our judges is not in doubt, the means by which they are appointed is out of step with public expectations regarding the way in which government should work. Our current arrangements have produced a judiciary that, although excellent in many ways, is startlingly homogenous. There are hardly any solicitors, few women lawyers and only one ethnic minority lawyer in senior judicial posts. I cannot believe that that is representative of the pool of legal ability or talent available for appointment. I am confident that the new judicial appointments commission will provide an appointments system based on merit alone. Crucially, however, as I said earlier, a broader appointments process will help to recognise merit from the wider pool of talent available, thus drawing on the full diverse range of those qualified for judicial appointment, regardless of their gender, or social or ethnic background.

Mr. Grieve: As I indicated earlier, although this part of the Bill will require close scrutiny, we support the broad thrust of it. Given that it is one of the main pillars of an important constitutional Bill, will the Minister explain why virtually none of it will be debated on the Floor of the House?

Mr. Leslie: The aspects of the Bill to be considered in Committee on the Floor of the House and Upstairs in a Committee Room will ultimately be voted on by the House. The House will make its judgment, but I believe that we are following convention.

Mr. Shepherd: The Minister says that merit is the primary consideration, so I am puzzled why there is conflict between that concept and the range of other matters that the Minister particularised, such as diversity. Such conflict does not seem to exist. If the measure is about merit, why is he introducing a wider system because surely that undermines that concept?

Mr. Leslie: I think that I understand the hon. Gentleman's argument, but I hope to persuade him that he is wrong. If one makes a choice from a narrow shortlist, one can make an appointment on merit. However, if the pool of those encouraged to apply were broader and a wider range of applications were encouraged—I think that the judicial appointments commission could help to devise new ways of achieving that—appointments on merit could still be made, while helping to expand the diversity of, and equality of opportunity for, those who put themselves forward for appointment. I do not think that the two concepts are inconsistent. At the heart of the reforms is our drive to build further on people's confidence in key institutions such as the judiciary.

Mr. Oliver Heald (North-East Hertfordshire) (Con): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Of course, it will not be possible for the House to debate the programme motion to which the Minister referred, because of the changes that have been made to our rules. Have you received a request from the Leader of the House to come here to explain why, with his programme motion, he is breaking a constitutional convention that has been in place since 1945 and has applied to every constitutional measure of first-class importance under this Government? This is the first time that the Government have tried to break that important precedent, and they will not even explain themselves.

Mr. Speaker: That is not a matter for the Chair.

Sir Patrick Cormack rose—

Mr. Leslie: I hear what you say, Mr. Speaker, and now give way to the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack).

Sir Patrick Cormack: You have made it clear, Mr. Speaker, that this is a matter for the Minister, so why have the Government broken the convention? It is slightly disingenuous for the amiable Minister to suggest that the House will decide, because the Government have tabled a motion—which means that they have effectively made their decision. What is the defence for such an extraordinary unconstitutional move?

Mr. Leslie: I am afraid that the decision to accept the programme motion will be taken not by the Government but by the House. The House of Commons will decide how to scrutinise its business.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con) rose—

Mr. Shepherd rose—

Mr. Leslie: I shall make a little progress.

We are fortunate that our judiciary has an exceptional reputation for intellectual ability, integrity and independence. Judges play a key role in the justice system and it is vital that the public should have confidence in them. To achieve that, we need to ensure that there is complete confidence in the way in which the judiciary are selected and appointed. Of course we need a system that selects the best people on merit, but it must do that in a modern and efficient way.

Mr. Hogg: May I take the hon. Gentleman back to the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack)? The hon. Gentleman could at least explain why the Government's proposal is inconsistent with past precedent.

Mr. Leslie: I do not accept that our proposal conflicts with past precedent. There will be ample debate on the Bill in the Committee of the whole House and in Standing Committee. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman does not like the programme motion, he is perfectly free to vote against it.

Mr. Shepherd: The Minister made a serious assertion in his last comment to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg). It is unusual for a Minister and a Government to put a guillotine motion on the Order Paper, no less. On a constitutional Bill, there is no opportunity for the House to express any opinion in advance of the vote, which will be whipped, as to the reasonableness of the timetable according to which the Bill is being forced through.

Mr. Leslie: The hon. Gentleman has long-held, strong views on programme motions, and I do not want to rehearse those again. He has his opinion; other Members have theirs. I remain of the opinion that the balance of consideration in Committee of the whole House and in Standing Committee is right, because, as in the other place, the Bill's most important constitutional aspects will be given an ample airing on the Floor of the House.

Sir Patrick Cormack: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view both of your ruling, which we completely understand, and of what the Minister has said, will you make it plain that it will be permissible to refer fairly extensively to the programme motion during the Second Reading debate?

Mr. Speaker: I would say yes, within reason.

Mr. Leslie: What a strange turn of affairs if the main point of contention from Opposition Members is the time allocated to the debate rather than the substance of the Bill. Indeed, we have probably spent more time on the interventions about whether the programme motion has the correct division of time between the Floor of the House and the Standing Committee than we have on the Bill. Conservative Members need to get a little perspective on the issue.

Mr. Heald: Almost everything that the Minister has mentioned, from whether the Lord Chancellor should be a lord, and whether he should be a lawyer, to the transfer of functions—all the points of detail that he has prayed in aid as being of interest to the House—will not be discussed in Committee of the whole House. How can he justify that?

Mr. Leslie: I believe that the Bill's most fundamental constitutional aspects will be debated in Committee of the whole House; the other aspects, which are more appropriate for the Standing Committee, will be debated at length and in great detail by that perfectly capable body.

Mr. Gummer: I thank the Minister, whose courtesy is renowned, for giving way. He has told us that the Bill's purpose is primarily to address the fact that people outside do not understand the complications and what appear to be the contradictions in our present system. Does he not understand that the same is true of what he has just said? People outside will not understand why there is no procedure whereby we will be able to discuss, on the Floor of the House, a major constitutional change. He is arguing one thing in the case of the whole Bill, and exactly the opposite in this case. That is why we have spent so much time on the point.

Mr. Leslie: We will have to agree to disagree on the matter. It is not true that we will have no opportunity to debate the judicial appointments commission on the Floor of the House, because as the Bill progresses through its parliamentary consideration there will, of course, be Report stage, when we will be able to look in detail at many of those matters.

I want briefly to mention the operation of the judicial appointments commission, which will select judges for appointment in England and Wales. It will be composed of 15 members: six lay members, five judges, one solicitor, one barrister, one tribunal member and one magistrate. The chair will be a layperson, emphasising independence both from the judiciary and from the Executive. The commission will recommend to the Lord Chancellor one candidate for each vacancy selected, solely on merit. No one will be appointed who has not been selected by the commission.

The Lord Chancellor will have a very restricted role: he or she will be able to reject a candidate once and to ask the commission to reconsider a selection once, as I said in answer to an intervention by the hon. and learned

[Mr. Leslie]

Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier). The arrangements will ensure that the role of the Lord Chancellor is transparent, but that there is necessary ministerial oversight and involvement to ensure proper accountability to Parliament, which is of course sovereign.

At present, the Lord Chancellor has statutory powers to remove judicial office holders below the High Court on grounds of incapacity or misbehaviour. Those powers will be reformed so that they can be exercised only with the agreement of the Lord Chief Justice. The Bill places all matters of judicial discipline and removal on a transparent statutory footing and provides a structure that reflects a proper balance between the independence of the judiciary and democratic accountability for the judicial system. The current role of Lord Chancellor will be shared with the Lord Chief Justice. No removal or other disciplinary action can be taken by one of them without the agreement of the other. None of those powers will displace the existing role of Parliament in the removal of the most senior members of the judiciary, in those exceptional circumstances.

The Bill will also permit those who are dissatisfied with the administration of the complaints procedure established by the judicial appointments commission to seek review of the operation of the process by a judicial appointments and conduct ombudsman.

Part 5 of the Bill takes account of the reform of the office of the Lord Chancellor in Northern Ireland, building on the provisions already made for that jurisdiction. Part 5 makes provision for the removal of judges in Northern Ireland in the period prior to devolution of justice to the Northern Ireland Assembly.

In Committee, we shall no doubt debate these provisions in much greater detail, but fundamentally, the principles and rationale for the legislation are clear and simple—

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) (Con) rose—

Mr. Leslie: Speaking of which, I give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Bercow: The Minister has sought to deal with the Bill sequentially, but will he press the rewind button for a moment? I would like to take up the issue of the provision in clause 16 for the transfer, modification or abolition of the functions of the Lord Chancellor by order. I am in a difficulty from which I hope the hon. Gentleman will be able to extricate me. Given that the Lord Chancellor has a visitatorial function—a responsibility for interpreting and acting as arbiter in a number of disputes, notably, for example, in universities and hospitals—can the hon. Gentleman tell me how that role relates to and/or differs from comparable responsibilities of the President of the Council, the Leader of the House? What is the nature of the reform that the Government envisage?

Mr. Leslie: Many of the visitatorial functions of the old office of Lord Chancellor are not appropriate to the new ministerial office. Many of those will revert either to universities or to the other appropriate office holder—the Secretary of State responsible for those particular policy areas. That is one of those matters of detail that I again suggest would be better aired in Committee.

Mr. Bercow rose—

Mr. Leslie: Just for fun, I will give way again.

Mr. Bercow: I admit that this is a matter of detail. The hon. Gentleman and others may think that I am being pedantic, but I happen to think that the matter is important, and I do not disagree with what he has just said. In saying what he has about the rather anachronistic character of some of the responsibilities, does he accept that it would be a bit of an anachronism for the Leader of the House, notwithstanding his multifaceted talents, to have responsibility for arbitrating on disputes in universities? Surely the right hon. Gentleman's time would be better devoted to other responsibilities.

Mr. Leslie: The hon. Gentleman may well have suggested a worthwhile debate. I agree that my right hon. Friend has multifaceted talents, and I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has recognised that.

To return to the principles of the Bill, its rationale is clear and simple: a modern footing for the relationship between the Government, the judiciary and Parliament; an end to the potential conflicts of interest between the political and the judicial realm; a restatement and strengthening of judicial independence; better courts administration, with a full-time Cabinet Minister overseeing £3 billion of public expenditure; and clearer responsibilities for the vital functions of a modern democracy.

Our constitutional history is among the longest and most illustrious anywhere in the world. It has evolved gradually but constantly over the centuries. Change and reform is therefore a core feature of our system of governance, not alien to it. These changes, too, will further enhance and improve our constitution so that it is fit for the 21st century. I commend the Bill to the House.

Sir Patrick Cormack: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I apologise for raising this matter, but I wonder whether there is anything that you can do to protect the interests of the House. We have just heard that this is a major constitutional Bill of enormous and far-reaching importance—an historic Bill, whatever one's view of it—yet despite the Minister's assurance, the House will have only three hours on the Floor of the House to debate the most fundamental aspects of the measure. Can you do anything to make representations to those who have brought the Bill before us to ensure that the House—your House, over which you preside—has a proper opportunity to discuss those important matters?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman asks me to do something in which the usual channels should be involved. The Whips are obliged to listen to Back Benchers, especially senior ones. I know that the Government have a majority, but we are in danger of pre-empting the decision on the programme motion, which is not for me to do.

4.31 pm

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield) (Con): I beg to move,

That this House declines to give the Constitutional Reform Bill a second reading because it creates a costly and unnecessary Supreme Court exercising the same functions as the current Law Lords; is based on the false premise that the separation of powers between the judiciary and legislature requires the physical removal of the Law Lords from Parliament; fails to demonstrate how the proposed Supreme Court would exercise its functions with any greater degree of impartiality, independence and integrity than the Appellate Committee of the House of Lords; will deny Parliament the experience and expertise that the Law Lords bring to debates and legislation; and notwithstanding the benefits of a Judicial Appointments Commission, offers no convincing justification for replacing a system that works well.

I move the reasoned amendment with considerable regret, because I am by no means averse to the idea of evolutionary constitutional reform, and certainly not in respect of the judiciary and its appointments system, or of the operation of the House of Lords and the role of the Lord Chancellor. Far from it. As the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) said, it has always been a subject of legitimate public debate. Constitutions will survive the test of time only if they adapt. I have no difficulty with those arguments, but we cannot get away from the fact that the manner in which constitutional reform of a major kind was introduced was disastrous—disastrous for the reputation of the Government, disastrous in terms of undermining the independence of the judiciary, which it involved at its outset and disastrous in the whole manner of its announcement.

In early 2003, we were assured by the previous Lord Chancellor that the Government on whose behalf he was speaking had no intention of changing the current systems in respect of the Lord Chancellor and the Supreme Court. In summer 2003, an announcement was made on the back of a Cabinet reshuffle—an announcement of which, it has become apparent, the Lord Chief Justice was informed only a few minutes before it was made. It was obvious that the Cabinet Secretary, who is supposed to steer Ministers, in particular the Prime Minister, away from serious pitfalls, had not been consulted. The announcement envisaged the immediate axing of the office of Lord Chancellor. It was a back-of-the-envelope job and within 24 hours we had the bizarre scene of the person who had announced that, whatever he was, he was not the Lord Chancellor, having to go the royal courts of justice to take the Oath of Allegiance to fulfil precisely that role. Not only was the spectacle unedifying as a piece of history, but it colours my approach to the Government's handling of the matter and the degree of trust that I place in the Government's delivery of their promises on it.

Mr. Hogg: Will my hon. Friend also point out that the affair showed extraordinary ignorance on the part of those advising the Prime Minister, because there were hundreds of references in many statutes to the role of the Lord Chancellor, which had to be dealt with before the office could be abolished?

Mr. Grieve: I agree entirely. There were, I believe, more than 500 such statutory references that could not be expunged by the executive fiat of the Prime Minister, but whether the right hon. Gentleman was badly advised, I do not know. I have a funny feeling that he was not advised at all. I think that he concocted the change in cahoots with the present Lord Chancellor on the back of an envelope—or certainly over a glass of good claret. I cannot imagine what else what else was going on.

Mr. Garnier: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's opening remarks. Does he accept that the logic of his amendment and what he has just said is that the next Conservative Government would repeal the Bill if it is on the statute book when we return to office?

Mr. Grieve: The position is clear. We are committed to the preservation of the office of Lord Chancellor in a form in which he is both a lawyer and a Member of the Lords. That is fundamental, and I believe and trust that we would take action to restore the office. As for the supreme court, we must see what the position is when a Conservative Government come to office. [Interruption.] I must tell the Minister that our position, too, is straightforward. If the supreme court has not been set up, I assure my hon. and learned Friend that we do not intend to set it up. It is unnecessary, for reasons that I shall explain.

Mr. Gummer: Will my hon. Friend return to his point about the proposal being made on the back of an envelope? Is it not likely that it was introduced in that peculiar way, given that the creation of both the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs was worked out on the back of an envelope to satisfy individuals, rather than for the better governance of the nation?

Mr. Grieve: I agree. A number of people were satisfied with the reform of the office of Lord Chancellor. The present Lord Chancellor seemed to be pleased with his promotion. Notoriously, the previous Home Secretary, the right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), was filmed at the entrance to the Home Office embracing the present Lord Chancellor, who was about to carry out his new duties. The right hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside was overheard to say sotto voce, "Now at last we will get the judges we want." Another reason why I find it hard to trust the Government on this issue is that, in the initial stages of reform in the period immediately after the announcement of the back-of-the-envelope proposals and the ensuing fiasco and back-tracking, the judiciary, who certainly did not wish to be dragged into the argument—none the less, they were—were under the impression that the proposals as they stood were the most serious threat to judicial independence in their lifetime. That was apparent from their response.

I accept that, since then, the Government have taken steps to satisfy many of the judiciary's anxieties, but it is extraordinary that a Government committed to human rights and the rule of law should, in the summer of 2003, have introduced a series of proposals that threatened to undermine both. However, I have ceased to be surprised at the way in which they operate, because although they are loud in their rhetoric about trying to improve and modernise, the reality is a constant accretion of centralising control to Ministers—that has been their absolute and consistent hallmark.

Mr. Soley: Before we leave the question of what a future Conservative Government, if there is one, would do, will the hon. Gentleman explain something? I am not a lawyer but, as I understand it, if we do not have a supreme court and a clearer separation of powers, it is only a matter of time before someone goes to the European Court of Human Rights and argues that case. Is it the intention of a future Conservative Government to take us out of human rights legislation?

Mr. Grieve: The hon. Gentleman has made a perfectly reasonable point, but the problem that he identified is a fiction. Many of the Law Lords who considered that problem decided that it was most unlikely to arise and I believe that, if such a challenge was mounted in Strasbourg, the margin of appreciation allowed for a country's individual judicial system would enable our arrangements to stand the test without difficulty. The only issue that might have presented problems was the Lord Chancellor sitting as a judge, which is why, as the Minister knows, we have always been consistent in the view that that was a practice that could be ended as part of the evolutionary change. I disagree with the analysis of the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush (Mr. Soley) of what would have happened, or what would happen—after all, we have not brought these changes about—if we left the Law Lords as they are at present.

The Minister said that it is wrong that judges should have to exercise forbearance in what they say, but the reality is that judges have to do so at almost every moment, including in private conversations and at dinner parties. I do not think that that made any difference and they succeeded in managing membership of the House of Lords and active participation in it without difficulty. I shall return to that point.

Vera Baird: The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that there is a real academic conflict in respect of what he has said and that there might be something in the assertion of my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush (Mr. Soley). There is a respected school of thought that says that having judges in the legislature at all is capable of breaking the convention.

Mr. Grieve: I accept that the hon. and learned Lady makes an arguable point. We continue to have judges in this legislature. We have recorders who sit in the Crown court. That is a point to be borne in mind. Indeed, we have deputy district judges sitting in the House, quite apart from the other place. I do not believe that that presented a problem. I was sufficiently happy, as I shall explain, with the existing system, not to have wished to see it tinkered with.

Mr. Garnier: I intervene as a Member, not as a recorder who happens to be a Member.

Before my hon. Friend allows himself to be too far seduced by the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush (Mr. Soley) and his arguments, he will remind himself of the European Court of Human Rights case dealing with the Bailiff of Guernsey. He will remember that, while the case led to the change in the arrangements in this country over assistant recorders and so forth, that Court did not criticise the British system of having a Lord Chancellor who happened to be a member of the political class.

It strikes me that we are getting into this groove because we are different and because it is thought that we should conform with everybody else's constitution. I hope that the Conservative party, above all, will ensure that it sticks up for what is good in this country and not allow the Labour party to wash all over us the slack intellectual guff that it seems to be seduced by.

Mr. Grieve: I agree entirely with my hon. and learned Friend. I want to reassure him. I am proud of our constitution and of the fact that it has stood the test of time, worked well and evolved pragmatically.

I say to the Minister that I could not give a fig about the separation of powers. It is an 18th-century concept that was put together by a French philosopher who came over to this country and misunderstood the way in which the system worked. Particularly, he was amazed that members of the judiciary, even then, exercised their powers independently and concluded that they were separate. What is of concern to me and to others is that the independence of the judiciary should be preserved. The separation of powers has nothing to do with it. Indeed, it is a concept that, on the whole, we have ignored and I think that we have been right to do so.

Sir Patrick Cormack: My hon. Friend is making a robust and intellectually impeccable case. Is not the natural conclusion of everything that he says that the next Conservative Government would be exceptionally unwise to proceed to a second House that was 80 per cent. elected, which would, in effect, abolish the House of Lords?

Mr. Grieve: I agree that any step by any Government in respect of the constitution of the House of Lords that erodes its independence, its independence of thought and independence of action would be massively undesirable.

I return to the slightly more restricted area of the judiciary and specifically to the office of Lord Chancellor. The Government proposed its entire abolition. They were then willing to listen to the representations made in the other place on the preservation of the name as the title of the Minister who fulfils the functions, but that is to all intents and purposes a valueless concession. I am interested not in symbols, but in practical reality. The practical reality is that, by a mixture of accident of history and the development of convention, we have succeeded—or had succeeded, until summer 2003—in creating an exceptional institution and one that ensured that, at the very heart of Government and of the operation of the Executive, there was a permanent champion of the independence of the judiciary capable of standing up for its independence and its rights, and it worked.

It did not matter whether Lord Hailsham rang his bell on the beach—I think it was actually on the podium—when he was a party chairman. It did not matter that Lord Gardiner had been an active member of the Labour party prior to his appointment. When somebody was appointed Lord Chancellor, went to the royal courts of justice and took the judicial oath, he was effectively transformed and became in his attitude and outlook quite different, commanding respect to such an extent that every time one asks the question, which the Minister answered earlier, whether actions by previous Lord Chancellors over the past 25 to 30 years in the appointment of the judiciary or their dealings with them have been faulted, the answer comes back entirely in the negative. To take that institution and smash it to pieces, which is what the Government proposed to do at the outset, without providing for an adequate replacement—as I shall explain in a moment, the replacement is in many of its aspects seriously flawed—strikes me as extraordinary.

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend has been referring to the office of Lord Chancellor. He made some very kind remarks about my right hon. Friend, my father. Does he accept that one of the reasons why the Lord Chancellors were always effective in the role that they performed was, first, because being in the House of Lords, they could not look to preferment in this place and therefore were not the subject of patronage in that sense, and secondly, because as a general rule they had come to the end of their political or their legal career and did not give two hoots?

Mr. Grieve: My right hon. and learned Friend is right. Having taken the judges' oath, Lord Chancellors had nowhere else to go. There was no further appointment in Government that they could fulfil that would be of an active political kind, or, short of sitting as a Member of the Committee in the House of Lords, any other function in their profession as lawyer to which they could return. I am convinced that it was a powerful and effective tool in promoting their independent viewpoint. Of course it was always possible that they could be sacked by the Prime Minister and replaced, but their replacement underwent exactly the same metamorphosis when he went down the road to the royal courts of justice to take the judicial oath. This is not just an abstract matter. It worked in practice, as the Minister acknowledged.

When we consider the office of Lord Chancellor and whether it is worth preserving, I point out to the Minister, first, that if it worked well but there were flaws in it—the particular flaw identified by the Minister and some others is that the Lord Chancellor sat actively as a judge, as opposed to just appointing judges—that is a matter that can be remedied. Secondly, as I made clear to the Minister at the outset, if the needs of transparency merit a judicial appointments commission, there was no reason why the Government could not go ahead and create that commission while preserving the office of Lord Chancellor, sitting in the House of Lords, taking an oath of office, not sitting as a judge and remaining legally qualified.

Mr. Bercow: Whether my hon. Friend noticed it or not, the Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, the hon. the Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie) looked genuinely quizzical and even disbelieving at the idea that someone who had once been a party politician and became Lord Chancellor could change in attitude and outlook according to the new post he occupied. Does my hon. Friend agree that it is curious that the Minister should be so disbelieving, for there is an obvious precedent much closer to home? I refer to the fact that in our parliamentary process someone who has long been a party politician subsequently becomes Speaker of the House.

Mr. Grieve: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend.

It is a curious feature of this Government that they distrust and dislike convention. Convention is a system by which people behave in particular ways or do particular things, not because any rule is laid down that they should do it, but because they know that it is expected of them and believe that they would face massive public disapproval, and, quite apart from anything else, a lowering of their self-esteem, if they did not. I happen to believe that that is one of the really remarkable things that we have in this country. It is one of the things that make me proud of being British. I compare that with the situation in other countries, including one with which I am closely linked, where I do not think that such a system prevails. Therefore, it is something to be nurtured, enhanced and celebrated, yet the Government have shown themselves consistently incapable of doing that. We have an example of that today, because it is the convention that a Bill of this importance should be taken on the Floor of the House, but the Government, in so far as they are concerned with convention, could not care less, so we will not do that.

Mrs. Dunwoody: This is an important point. Will the hon. Gentleman therefore tell me why the Conservative party accepted the fact that a major constitutional Bill of this kind, which is very important, should be dealt with in the way that has been proposed by Her Majesty's Government? They must have had talks with the Ministers concerned.

Mr. Grieve: I can reassure the hon. Lady that we have not. We shall vote against the programme motion and if in the course of this afternoon I can persuade the Government by my arguments to revise their proposals, I assure her that I shall be delighted. The entire Bill should be taken on the Floor of the House. It would need about four days, no more. It could be done simply and straightforwardly, and that would allow for the maximum participation by right hon. and hon. Members.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) is herself an example of the importance of convention. The attempt to remove her as Chairman of a Select Committee was clearly unacceptable. The Government behaved perfectly legally, but in a way that all convention spoke against. Is it not true that convention is a civilised way of running a Government and a Parliament, and do we not get rid of it at our cost?

Mr. Grieve: I agree entirely with my right hon. Friend. I commend to the Minister the words of a distinguished Labour Minister, Herbert Morrison, who said:

"You cannot play about with the British Constitution in a Committee Upstairs, to put it colloquially."

Mrs. Dunwoody: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I apologise for interrupting, but earlier

[Mrs. Dunwoody]

Mr. Speaker said that the programming of the Bill was a matter for arrangement between the two Front-Bench teams. Am I to take it that that negotiation has not taken place?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Michael Lord): That is not a point of order for the Chair. I have no knowledge of what has gone on between the usual channels.

Mr. Grieve: I can tell the hon. Lady that the negotiations failed, because our proposal that the matter should be taken on the Floor of the House in the ordinary way was rejected by the Government, who have tabled a motion, on which we shall vote after Second Reading, insisting that large chunks of the Bill should be taken Upstairs. It is of more than abstract significance. It is extraordinary. The Minister spoke earlier about the importance of the new judicial appointments mechanisms in terms of the point at which the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs/Lord Chancellor would have a choice to accept or reject a nomination. The hon. Lady may agree that that is an important point. It is in clauses 64 and 71, but those clauses will not be considered on the Floor but Upstairs. Even now, the Minister has time to change his mind and ensure that those clauses are considered on the Floor.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): I will advise my hon. Friends to vote against the programme motion this evening and was not consulted on whether any or all of the Bill should be taken Upstairs.

Mr. Grieve: I am sorry to hear that the hon. Gentleman was not consulted, because he should have been. I understand that a discussion took place with Government representatives and that no meeting of minds occurred. The sensible course of action is for the entirety of the Bill to be considered on the Floor.

Mr. Garnier: The Government's attitude to the question is exposed by motion 3 on the Order Paper, which states:

"CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM BILL [LORDS] (PROGRAMME) [No debate]".

"No debate" is in heavy type. The Government do not like debate and being held to account. They want to force us to take on everything that they push forward, irrespective of what the public and the House of Commons think.

Mr. Grieve: I agree with my hon. and learned Friend. It is regrettable that we cannot debate the programme motion and, although the situation is still unsatisfactory, that is why we are seeking to touch on the matter here on Second Reading.

Moving on from the question of the Lord Chancellor, if the Minister is prepared to accept the amendments, which were tabled and voted on in the other place, to the effect that the Lord Chancellor should remain in the House of Lords and be a lawyer, a meeting of minds will occur between Conservative Members and the Government on that part of the Bill. The Minister may have great difficulty getting the Bill through Parliament unless that concession is made. The Bill started in the House of Lords, which is a good reason why the House of Lords should have some say on how it is finished.

I hope that we can persuade the Minister to make a small but significant change in Committee to ensure that the Lord Chancellor/Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs is not a politician on the make and not subject to the inevitable political pressures in respect of the judiciary. Such political pressures are generated, often understandably, in this House and they are thoroughly undesirable if they influence the decisions of individual judges. That change would ensure that the independence of the judiciary is maintained. The Minister may argue that the concordat is sufficient, but the concordat is valueless unless good will exists. The best way in which to generate good will is to have the highest standards, which would come from the preservation of a large part of the substance of the office of Lord Chancellor as well as the name.

Vera Baird: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the qualification in clause 3 that the Lord Chancellor must be a lawyer, which is likely to be met most of the time, also requires that person to be a High Court advocate under the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990? I may be wrong, but that seems to be the requirement. That would exclude, for instance, a senior solicitor who has not bothered to obtain that qualification because they are not engaged in that kind of practice. Is that not an undue restriction on the available pool of post holders?

Mr. Grieve: I am broadly content with the legal qualification in clause 3. If it concerns the hon. and learned Lady, it is precisely the sort of area that can and should be examined in Committee, but it is not the main issue.

In a moment, I shall discuss how the judicial appointments commission will function, but the person who fulfils the ministerial office—I shall be interested to hear the Minister's view in Committee—must take a close interest in the judiciary and its career structures, who is doing well, how the judiciary operates on a day-to-day basis and any problems that the judiciary may have. As the Minister will confirm, one of the key roles of the Lord Chancellor that remains in the Bill is that of initiating the process by which the judicial appointments commission becomes operational, as well as having an ultimate power of veto over certain appointments.

Mr. Hogg: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the chief functions of our Lord Chancellor is to constitute a source of advice and influence that can be set against the Home Secretary? As that is usually to do with constitutional or criminal law, is it not rather important that the Lord Chancellor should have some professional expertise in that field?

Mr. Grieve: My right hon. and learned Friend pre-empts my next words. He is of course right.

As I said at the outset, having a judge representing the judiciary in the heart of Government is among the principal important functions that the Lord Chancellor has fulfilled. After the events of summer 2003, the judiciary expressed great anxiety about the political pressures on it that were building up. The downgrading, in effect, of the office of Lord Chancellor into that of a minor Minister was beginning to have an impact on the judiciary's sense of independence. We saw that when the then Home Secretary told the House that magistrates should go to public meetings to be told how to perform their functions, and when, in extraordinary fashion, he started to usurp the power relating to how the Crown Prosecution Service should operate. As my right hon. and learned Friend may remember, that was the subject of a statement or urgent question in this House. The actions of the Home Office gave rise to great concern about whether judicial independence could and would be maintained. These are not just abstract problems.

The Lord Chancellor is not symbolic and his role should be reinforced. I am convinced that if the Government see sense on this, they will have no cause to regret it. I cannot see any problem for them in keeping the Lord Chancellor in a status that means that further preferment will not be open to him. That is advantageous—but substituting a Minister on the make is an enormous mistake.

Mr. Leslie: The hon. Gentleman disparages all Ministers who are neither lawyers of large significance nor peers as "Ministers on the make." Can he justify having this legal qualification for the new ministerial post by explaining why he, for instance, would be superior to, say, his colleague the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis), who does not have such a qualification?

Mr. Grieve: The Minister completely misunderstands my point. There are two separate issues. First, the office holder should be in the House of Lords and should take an oath that disqualifies him from further participation in Government thereafter—that is valuable and has nothing to do with his legal qualifications. Secondly, he should be legally qualified because his role is intimately involved in the selection of the judiciary and the knowledge of how the judicial system works. Thirdly, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) said, he should provide a lawyer's input into the issues of judicial independence that he is there to maintain. For all those reasons, I would keep the office of Lord Chancellor as provided for by the Bill as amended in the other place.

I told the Minister at the outset that we support the principle that a judicial appointments commission should be set up, so many of the comments that I wish to make can be reserved for Committee. However, it is worth bearing in mind one or two key points. If the commission is to work, it must have sufficient flexibility to be able to respond rapidly to any given situation. For example, it is well known that at the end of the Pinochet case, the then Lord Chancellor realised that the House of Lords faced difficulties. He therefore carried out a musical chairs reshuffle, which worked superbly. He appointed a new senior Law Lord and a new Master of the Rolls and the consequences were widely appreciated. I have a concern—which I hope the Under-Secretary will note, even if he does not respond to it later in the debate—that the commission should have sufficient flexibility to act, if necessary, with similar finesse. That is important, because when one examines the bureaucratic structures that are being set up there must an anxiety that, however worthy the aims of the judicial appointments commission, it will not have the ability and flexibility to move in that fashion.

Earlier, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) mentioned the appointment of the new president of the family division. I make no criticism of the appointment, which appears to be unusual and, we hope, creative. However, I am bound to say that it was possible because, for better or worse, of the ability to make decisions in a highly flexible manner. I therefore need reassurance that appointments by a judicial appointments commission can have similar flexibility. I hope that the Under-Secretary will accept that as a seriously made and well-intentioned point. There is no point in our ending up with a rather ponderous organisation that fails to deliver the necessary flexibility to ensure that the higher echelons of the judiciary can be so moved around that people are happy in their jobs, that it functions well and that there is public confidence in it.

Mr. Garnier: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way because he allows me to clarify a point that I made in an intervention. I believe that Lord Justice Potter will make an extremely good president of the family division and I have no criticism of his judicial qualities. However, I am worried about the illogic of the Government's position. On the one hand, they advocate modernisation of the judicial appointments system, yet on the other they appoint a judge—as it happens, an excellent judge—by old-fashioned means. I heard the Under-Secretary's comments, but it is deeply unconvincing of him to try to advance one argument after the Bill is enacted, yet rely on the much-criticised system that pertains before enactment.

Mr. Grieve: My hon. and learned Friend is right that there are strange standards in the Under-Secretary's approach. However, in fairness to him we are considering one argument that shows the merit of a judicial appointments commission and why I support it. However, we need to consider flexibility carefully.

There is another concern. The Under-Secretary said that any appointment would be made on merit. Indeed, it must be on merit. I am not worried about the desire to expand the pool of talent—many people hide their light under a bushel and such talented individuals should be brought forward and considered. However, there is a narrow dividing line between that and engaging in a form of engineering that rapidly leads the public to conclude that appointment on merit is not happening. We need to consider that carefully because although I am as keen as the Under-Secretary to ensure that those with merit who are qualified are appointed from all sections of society, merit must nevertheless be central and any attempt to dilute it must be examined with great caution.

Vera Baird: I was pleased to hear the hon. Gentleman set out the importance of merit and his appreciation, which I am sure was implicit, that the wider the pool, the better the calibre of candidate. Is he ready to confirm that the current system is not the best because, historically, positive discrimination has taken place in favour of white men from Oxbridge colleges and public schools? That is unfair and does not constitute promotion on merit alone.

Mr. Grieve: I hesitate to join the hon. and learned Lady in that criticism. I simply point out that the Under-Secretary appears to take the view that every effort has been made in the current system to ensure appointment on merit from the widest possible pool of those qualified. I have not heard him say that that is not happening. Indeed, it would be surprising if it were not, because that would constitute a criticism of either this Lord Chancellor or his predecessor. Indeed, going back to the Conservative Lord Chancellor before them, I seem to recollect some extremely creative appointments being made, and his not being criticised for that.

Mr. Beith: Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that it is a merit not only to have the highest levels of judicial ability but to add to the bench greater representativeness than it had before?

Mr. Grieve: I certainly agree with the right hon. Gentleman that we should not be doing our job properly if those who were capable of serving were being denied access to the higher ranks of the judiciary, for whatever reason. To that extent, I entirely agree with him that if the system can be improved so that there are fewer occasions on which anyone makes a complaint, that would be a good thing. Appointment on merit is the key criterion that must be observed, because ultimately judges are there to decide issues not because of their background, their race or their faith. The wonderful thing about this country is that that is exactly what has been happening for many years and we must ensure that it is preserved.

If we are to encourage people to go on to the higher benches of the judiciary, we must face the fact that, at the moment, many of them have to be asked to do so. The Minister will acknowledge that the current composition of the Court of Appeal simply would not be as it is if people had not been prodded—at the moment by the Lord Chancellor and sometimes the Lord Chief Justice—into accepting appointments that often involve a substantial diminution in their earnings. That is something that we shall need to consider carefully, because if the appointment system is simply going to involve filling in a form and answering an advertisement, I have a nasty feeling that many people who have the requisite talent and merit will be excluded from applying, either through diffidence or some other reason. This is another area of the existing flexibility that we must not lose through the mechanism of setting up a judicial appointments commission. We can look at that in detail in Committee.

Mr. Hogg: Will my hon. Friend note that a number of hon. Members, myself included, have considerable concerns about the procedure whereby complaints can be made to the ombudsman regarding the methods of selection used by the appointments board? This matter must be carefully scrutinised in Committee.

Mr. Grieve: I agree with my right hon. and learned Friend. Indeed, I apologise for not having touched on that matter. I was conscious of the passage of time and wished to allow adequate time for Back-Bench contributions. He is right—that is another area of detail that we need to examine.

The principle of the judicial appointments commission appeals to me and I am sure that it will lead to improvements, but the detail is important, and the fact that we support the principle should not, and will not, mean that we ignore the detailed problems associated with it. I have read the Bill and looked at the debates in the other place, and it has become apparent that there are complexities involved. Unless we get them right, we could end up with an appointments system that does no better than the present one. Indeed, it could contain flaws that the present one does not.

The Minister tells us that the supreme court will cost £30 million to set up. I suspect that that is a highly conservative figure. If we have understood him correctly, the court is heading straight into the Middlesex Guildhall, which is the one place that the Law Lords who support the idea of a supreme court do not want to go, because it would send out all the wrong signals about what they are and how they operate—[Interruption.] I give way to the Minister.

Mr. Leslie: I was expressing slight surprise that the hon. Gentleman thinks that it is the wrong place in which to have a supreme court. Parliament square represents pretty much the apex of our constitution, so perhaps he could elaborate on why it is the wrong preferred choice.

Mr. Grieve: The valid points that were made were that the building is an old guild hall. A number of its rooms have limitations in the way in which they can be adapted. They are not suitable for the sitting of a supreme court because the judges want to maintain the informal atmosphere that they currently enjoy in a Committee Room in the House of Lords. Most of the other accommodation is similarly unsuitable. Those points were made with some force not by me, but by Lord Bingham and it seems that the Government intend to ignore them. I find it a little surprising that as the new supreme court is supposed to send out a powerful signal of novelty—I mean that in the best sense of a new beginning—it is proposed to house it in a building that is not exactly a symbol of the supremacy of law.

The irony, as Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead made clear in his speech, is that many Law Lords find the setting in which they currently do their work extremely congenial because of both the accommodation and the signal that it sends out of how they conduct their business. It may be a bit cramped, but it is astonishingly cheap with £168,000 a year of overheads, compared with the Government's estimate of £8.8 million a year on overheads for the new supreme court. I shall need a lot of convincing from the Minister that the new idea has any merit.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): Has my hon. Friend attempted to understand the notes on clauses about costs? If he has tried to read them, does he understand, as I do, that the extra capital and running costs will be reflected in higher court fees charged to litigants by the judicial system? Does that not contradict the Government's expressed wish to increase access to the justice system through lower costs?

Mr. Grieve: My right hon. Friend is right. Not only is that contradictory, but it seriously undermines a central activity of government. The original compact between the state and the citizen—the principle by which we become citizens of a state—is that we have access to justice. It is an extraordinary state of affairs. I do not want to widen the debate too much this afternoon, but at present access to justice is becoming harder and harder for more and more people because of increasing restrictions on legal aid. Court costs are another mechanism by which access to justice may be seriously hindered and it worries me that the Government are approaching the matter in what can only be described as a commercial way. Access to justice is not a commercial matter.

Mr. Hogg: On the point about rising court fees, they have been raised substantially at county court level and in the High Court, and are a considerable disincentive to litigation.

Mr. Grieve: My right hon. and learned Friend is correct. It is a matter of anxiety and has been worrying me because, during the past month, I have received letters from solicitors and litigants indicating their level of concern. An extraordinary part of the Government's scheme is their attitude to the privatisation of justice. One inevitable consequence is that more and more matters will be resolved in other forums by arbitration and so on and, inevitably in such settings, it is the weakest and those with most need of access to justice who will be denied the justice that is an essential part of the coronation oath that underpins one of the reasons why this country and state exist.

Mr. Leslie: It is rich of the hon. Gentleman to lecture the House about access to justice on the very day that his colleague the shadow Chancellor proposed axing hundreds of millions of pounds from the legal aid budget. How on earth can the hon. Gentleman square his comments with that sort of removal of access to justice?

Mr. Grieve: The Minister is completely mistaken. The proposals are about the number of people in the bloated office that the Lord Chancellor is running; they have nothing whatever to do with cuts in legal aid. The Minister's comment is typical of the misrepresentation that comes from the Government.

Mr. Leslie: I think I very much understand the shadow Chancellor's proposals, which are to start closing down law centres, withdrawing support for citizens advice bureaux and scrapping the community legal service partnerships. How on earth can the hon. Gentleman get away with lecturing the House about how his party is, supposedly, the defender of access to justice?

Mr. Grieve: The Minister has clearly not read the paper. If he had done so he would have seen that the changes we seek concern particularly what we regard as the waste of money by the Lord Chancellor's Department and the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, in spending money that ought to be spent on legal aid on a series of social projects up and down the country that are an ersatz replacement for the lack of availability of legal aid to individuals.

Mr. Garnier: My hon. Friend may recall the Access to Justice Bill that went through the House between 1998 and 1999, although he was not a member of its Standing Committee. It was a cruelly named Bill—it should have been the denial of access to justice Bill. The Government ripped up legal aid in any accepted and understandable form, denying huge numbers of the sick, the elderly and the poor access to justice. The Government said that they would rely on charities, citizens advice bureaux and law centres, but of course they cut funding to all those institutions. Not only did they deny public legal aid, but they denied any other route that was available to the poor, the sick and the elderly. The Minister then has the cheek to criticise my hon. Friend for advancing the Conservative policies that he has just been pronouncing.

Mr. Grieve: I remember the Bill very well and I agree with my hon. and learned Friend that the Government's comments ring particularly hollow. When they came into office in 1997, 60 per cent. of the population were eligible for legal aid; the figure is now 5 per cent. That is the measure of the change that the Government have presided over. The substitutes they have offered are, in many cases, not adequate.

Mr. Leslie: I want to be clear about what the hon. Gentleman is saying. Is he giving a commitment that a Conservative Government would not scrap any aspect of the community legal services partnership or support for citizens advice bureaux, legal aid work or law centre work? Is he giving that commitment?

Mr. Grieve rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are starting to stray away from Second Reading. The hon. Gentleman may respond to that comment, but we ought to concentrate our minds on Second Reading.

Mr. Grieve: I assure the Minister that under an incoming Conservative Government access to justice, including legal aid for those who require it, will be better, better managed and more extensive than this Government provide at present.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Grieve: No, I really must make some progress.

The Government's argument is that a supreme court must be set up because the position of the Law Lords is so anomalous at present, yet in fact it has unique characteristics that are beneficial to the way in which we do governmental business in this country. It allows the Law Lords to participate in debate in the other place and they have shown themselves—as I said to the Minister and he acknowledged at the outset—perfectly capable of choosing their words with sufficient care and choosing the debates in which they intervene sufficiently carefully to ensure that no criticism attaches to them. That is what the Minister wants to get rid of, but it has real value as a constant reminder in the legislature of the view of the judiciary. The oddity is that, as far as I am aware, instead of the Law Lords being able to express themselves in the House of Lords, the replacement position will be that the Lord Chief Justice will have to do it all for them—and not only there, but in the forum of press releases, for the fulfilment of which role he has already been allocated a press officer. I find that rather odd. We are shutting down what is a very controlled and ultimately beneficial way to ventilate issues of public concern, yet the Government acknowledge that, far from cloistering away the judiciary, they must make alternative arrangements.

Mr. Hogg: Does my hon. Friend agree with the proposition that, probably, in neither this Chamber nor the other place is there any person who has a wider knowledge of current legal practice than the existing Law Lords because they have legal expertise right across the spectrum of current legal problems?

Mr. Grieve: Yes, indeed. Of course, the Law Lords are helped in their work by the fact that they are present in the House of Lords, so they are intimately aware of current trends in the country—[Interruption.] Oh yes, and they have an opportunity to discuss matters informally with others. That is valuable, and I regret that the Government want to get rid of it for such a costly white elephant that, otherwise, will deliver exactly the same service. The Minister is asking us to vote for a Bill that will vastly increase the cost of an institution that will otherwise operate in exactly the same way, save for the removal of the Law Lords' rights to speak and vote, even though they have never been criticised for the way that they exercise them.

Vera Baird: The right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) was incorrect to suggest that the Law Lords have a broad sweep of legal experience. There has not been a criminal lawyer in the House of Lords for quite a long time, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman is aware. Is not what he is saying inconsistent with the fact that half of the current Law Lords first, announced themselves, through Lord Bingham, to be uncomfortable with their current role in the Lords, and secondly, declined to speak at all, going beyond even the self-denying ordinance of 2000 because they simply think it inappropriate to mix their two roles?

Mr. Grieve: The final point reflects well on the Law Lords. The Minister wants to depoliticise the judiciary, but I am afraid that the debate conducted since the summer of 2003 has had the effect of pulling those in the judiciary—much against their will, I suspect—into an arena where they have had to express their views, and they have succeeded in doing so moderately and sensibly. I fully acknowledge that there are differences of view among the Law Lords about the best way to continue, although it is remarkable, given the Government's enthusiasm for this project, that about 50 per cent. of the Law Lords would very much like the Government to drop it. Clearly, there are mixed views and, ultimately, it is for Parliament to decide, but I cannot go back, face my constituents and tell them that the Government are setting up a very expensive institution that will deliver virtually the same service but with some considerable downsides.

Mr. Garnier: Is not the point that the hon. and learned Lady made a moment ago not overtaken by the fact that most, if not all, of the peers that the Prime Minister has appointed to the House of Lords who take the Labour Whip do not appear, speak or vote there? Surely, as they were appointed to do a political job, it is worrying that they simply fail to do it.

Mr. Grieve: My hon. and learned Friend is correct—and he reminds me of the first part of the hon. and learned Lady's question, which I did not answer. Of course, the lack of a suitable criminal judge among the Law Lords is perfectly curable under the existing system, especially as we would be willing to have a new system for the appointment of Law Lords if the Government so wished. That would tie in precisely with our views on the judicial appointments commission generally, although I accept that a separate body would operate. We have no difficulty with that.

We have indicated by our reasoned amendment that we consider that this Bill is not worthy of support in its present form. I heard the Minister's comments about the Lord Chancellor and what the Minister intends to do with the Lords amendments in Committee, and that reinforces my view that the sensible thing to do is to vote for the reasoned amendment.

When the Bill comes to Committee, we will do our best to improve it. I again ask the Government to reconsider, even at this stage, their position on which parts of the Bill are taken on the Floor of the House. If the Government want and are prepared to listen, they could, notwithstanding our reservations, still end up with a Bill that will command widespread approval and stand the test of time. However, the way that the Minister and the Government are going at the moment does not give me confidence that that will happen. The truth is that the Government will have difficulty in the other place when the Bill returns there, and they deserve that. It is a pretty fitting epitaph on the way that they have handled this matter.

5.30 pm

Ross Cranston (Dudley, North) (Lab): I declare my interest as a lawyer and part-time judge. I see one other Member in the Chamber who sits as a recorder.

I want to start with the important principles that are set out in clauses 1 and 4, which deal with the rule of law and judicial independence. It is vital that we focus on principle so as to build a system in accordance with principle. Other important values include equality before the law and access to justice, which has already been mentioned in the debate. There is an issue about whether the clauses would be justiciable, but the fact that they are in the Bill and will therefore be part of the Act is not just symbolic; the clauses are cardinal in our system.

How do we define the principles of rule of law and judicial independence? We can do so negatively. We can look, for example, at Zimbabwe. The Bar Council and other Bars around the world recently published a report demonstrating how there is no longer the rule of law in Zimbabwe. Mugabe has said:

"The courts can do whatever they want, but no judicial decision will stand in our way".

The report sets out how the independence of the judiciary and the rule of law have been corrupted. Judges who have handed down decisions adverse to the ruling party have been arrested, and up to 10 judges have left and hacks have been appointed in their place.

More positively, we have clear definitions in our law. On the rule of law, as lawyers we tend to go back to what Dicey said—that the rule of law means that no person is punishable except for a breach of the law established in the ordinary manner before the ordinary courts of the land. That contrasts with Zimbabwe, where there is arbitrary power and wide discretionary authority. Secondly, no person is above the law—the principle of equality before the law. Thirdly, the general principles of the constitution are the result of judicial decisions determining the rights of private persons.

In modern language, the rule of law means that the system has to accord with certain formal criteria. The law has to be promulgated to the public; it has to be prospective and not retrospective; it has to be possible to comply with its provisions; it has to be clear, coherent and stable; and the persons who make and administer it should be accountable for the way in which they administer it. One aspect of the rule of law these days is also said to be judicial independence.

As the criteria tend to be formal, some have said that we must also take account of substantive principles. Modern accounts of the rule of law thus include not only formal criteria, but the content of the rules themselves and the nature of the system. When the World Bank recommends new judicial systems to countries, it talks about the rule of law and tells them that they need democratic, open and transparent systems in which several political parties can contest elections. Additionally, public officials must be aware of the limits of their powers and act accordingly.

Judicial independence is mentioned in clause 4. At a basic level, that simply means in some countries that one should be able to buy goods and services, but not judges. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) mentioned the separation of powers, and I agree with him that Montesquieu got it wrong. It was interesting that he was concerned about the separation of powers because he did not want Executive and judicial power to be coupled to oppress citizens. Even in the United States, the separation of powers does not exist in a pure form because, for example, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court would have presided over an impeachment trial of President Clinton. Bagehot was right—we have a fusion of powers. The fact that I sit as a recorder and a Member of Parliament shows that this country does not have a strict separation of powers.

None the less, the notion of judicial independence has force. That independence has individual and institutional aspects. The individual aspect is mentioned in clause 4(5), which provides that the Government should not seek to influence the specific decisions of judges. That is absolutely right because courts must be protected from actual or apparent interference by the Executive—there should be no back-door influence. Lord Mackay, a former Lord Chancellor, was right to say that the independence of the judiciary denotes not only independence from the Executive, but the independence of one judge from other judges. Clause 4(5) reflects the international consensus on the meaning of the independence of the judiciary that is set out in international instruments such as those promulgated by the International Bar Association and the United Nations.

There is a question about whether independence includes the concept of impartiality. Article 6 of the European convention on human rights uses the words "independent" and "impartial". Although some people have suggested that they are separate principles, I prefer to regard impartiality as an aspect of independence. Impartiality means of course not only that judges must not have personal biases or prejudices, but that they must exclude considerations that are not relevant.

A judge must mediate in disputes between citizen and citizen, and the citizen and the state. The institutional aspect of independence is recognised in clause 4(6). It says that a Minister or the Lord Chancellor "must have regard to . . . the need for the judiciary to have the support necessary to enable them to exercise their functions."

Such support is absent in Zimbabwe because some of its judges have no facilities—several reports suggest that they sit in rooms without electric lights. Governments have an obligation to provide the administrative and financial support that is necessary for the judiciary to do its work.

An independent judiciary does not mean that judges come in with a blank sheet of paper, which is especially important when we consider widening the pool and increasing diversity in the judiciary. We want judges to have varied experience and a range of expertise. They must, of course, act in accordance with law and, according to the judicial oath, without fear, favour, affection or ill will, but that does not mean that they come without any views at all. In fact, it could be argued that the wider the range of experience that judges have when they come to the job, the better.

Judicial independence does not mean that judges are not accountable. The most important way in which they are accountable is that they have to give reasoned decisions, which are available to the parties and the general public. Judgments can be criticised, which is an important aspect of accountability. These days, judges have to be aware of the importance of acting efficiently; time is an important resource. Returning to the principle of access to justice, which I mentioned earlier, the fact that disproportionate resources are given to a few cases means that many outside the system do not get access to justice. Judges also have to be accountable if they are rude to litigants or counsel.

Independence does not mean that judges can decide what they want. They have to act in accordance with the law. Lord Scarman, one of the most prominent Law Lords of the 20th century, who recently died, said that it is not just a matter of deciding what is right; judges have to act in accordance with statute and the common law. If neither statute nor common law gives a clear answer, it is possible to reason by analogy. One cannot simply decide issues without any guidance from law whatsoever.

Mr. Garnier: The hon. and learned Gentleman is giving a very interesting talk. I wonder how far what he is describing of the current state of the judiciary and its independence will be changed, positively or adversely, by the Bill.

Ross Cranston: It seems to me that the Bill will provide a firm underpinning, especially in the principles set out at its very beginning, for the standing of our judiciary. I will come on to that in a moment, and I will acknowledge that the standing of our judges is unrivalled, both in their merit and in the quality of their decision making.

I have said in earlier debates that there has to be mutual respect between institutions. Judicial independence does not mean that judges can completely neglect what Parliament, for example, says. Parliament, of course, has to respect judges' decisions, and we have rules about what we can say about judicial decisions and how we can criticise judges. Judges have to respect legislation, and there is no criticism of the position at present. In 2003, Mr. Rusbridger of The Guardian brought a case under the Treason Felony Act 1848, arguing that if he advocated republicanism he might be in breach of the Act. The House of Lords said that it was not for it to say that the Act was no longer extant.

There is also an obligation on judges to make decisions in accordance with law, even controversial law, and to respect institutional expertise. The recent case law on the Human Rights Act 1998 is very interesting. Judges have developed a notion of judicial deference in relation to some decision making by the Executive, especially when moving away from article 6 on purely judicial functions to some of the other articles, saying that they have to respect the Executive and Parliament. In the recent Belmarsh case, Lord Bingham said in relation to the notion of whether there was a public emergency to satisfy article 15 that great weight had to be given to the judgment of the Home Secretary, his colleagues and Parliament, because they were called on to exercise a pre-eminently political judgment.

Other aspects of the independence of the judiciary came up in debate in the other place. Should judges be appointed to inquiries, for example? I do not take any strong view on that. Recently, the Lord Chief Justice came to an agreement with the Lord Chancellor on how judges should be appointed to inquiries, so as to ensure that the standing of the judiciary is not undermined.

Once we have the principles right, we can move on to discuss in a more informed way some of the Bill's specific provisions. Let me come first to the supreme court. I confess that, initially, I had some misgivings about its creation. As I have said, the House of Lords is highly respected in its judicial capacity. No one could suggest that it has not been independent, even though those of their lordships acting in a judicial capacity have been Members of the House of Lords as a legislative body. If there were concerns, they could have been dealt with by, for example, the Lord Chancellor not presiding over the Judicial Committee or by the Law Lords not participating in debates in the House in its legislative capacity.

Having listened to the debates and having heard evidence given to the Constitutional Affairs Committee, I have been persuaded by what the Lord Chancellor has said, as I have by the comments of Lord Bingham and Lord Woolf. The creation of a supreme court, as Lord Steyn put it in a lecture a couple of years ago, is a "badge of judicial independence". The institutional separation that the supreme court represents minimises the risk of any public perception that judicial independence is compromised. Like the hon. Member for Beaconsfield, I do not give great credence to the article 6 argument. Although that argument might ultimately have been lost, I do not think that we should have regarded it as especially persuasive. However, in terms of the basic principles inherent in our common law system—the rule of law and the independence of the judiciary—a supreme court is an eminently sensible idea.

Of course, even if we get that far, that is only the start of the debate. What sort of body are we talking about? We are not talking about a constitutional court. We are not talking about something like the Bundesverfassungsgericht, the German federal constitutional court. The history and institutional arrangements there are quite different; there is a written constitution and a federal system. Similarly, in the United States, there is a mainly constitutional court. With more devolution and human rights cases coming up, the House of Lords or the new supreme court will deal with more constitutional issues. None the less we are not establishing a purely constitutional court, which would be concerned only with constitutional issues. Our tradition has been that constitutional issues are decided by the ordinary courts, which also decide matters of common law and statutory interpretation. It is absolutely right that that continue to be so.

There is an issue about whether we have a UK court. We now have a clear statement that we indeed have a United Kingdom court. As I understand it, the decisions of the court on cases from England, for example, will not be binding in the other jurisdictions—in Scotland or Northern Ireland. Of course, their persuasive force will be great—I need only remind the lawyers present of the important Scottish case of Donoghue v. Stevenson, which was accepted as binding in all jurisdictions.

Resources have been raised as an issue. We members of the Constitutional Affairs Committee were impressed by the system that governs the High Court of Australia—not only the resources available to the court, but the control that the court itself has over the allocation of resources. The supreme court must have a building appropriate to its status. Although it would be an inconvenience for the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) and for me to be unable to sit there as recorders, it seems to me that, when refurbished, a building on Parliament square would be most appropriate to a supreme court.

Hon. Members have spoken about fees. I am not especially concerned about fees in a supreme court. The legal costs in most of the cases that go to such a court are so great that—unless someone has taken the case pro bono—the fees are infinitesimal. None the less, there is an issue about the principle of full cost recovery, which has not been debated by the House since it was introduced in the early 90s, and it would be appropriate to return to the subject at some stage.

The supreme court will not sit en banc. That is partly because judges, in the past, also had to sit in the Privy Council, and partly because there was a separate panel to hear leave applications. I have no difficulty with that continuing.

It is no secret that I have not been completely happy with the approach to appointments. Although it is not enshrined in the Bill, it is accepted that there has to be geographical representation: just as in Canada there are always three judges from Quebec, it is acknowledged that there will have to be representation on our supreme court from Scotland and Northern Ireland. My concern centres on the fact that the appointments commission is to put only one name forward. I have argued in the Constitutional Affairs Committee—I divided the Committee, and it accepted the view—that a number of names should be put forward. That is because the judges who are appointed to the supreme court will make extremely important decisions on tax, civil liability and contract as well as on constitutional issues. In my view, greater democratic input is needed. I agree with Professor Robert Hazell, who gave evidence to the Lords Select Committee. He said:

"I strongly believe that ministers should continue to be involved in judicial appointments and have a bigger say than is now proposed and so should Parliament in its classic scrutiny role. On the executive having a choice, it is very important for the executive to retain a role in senior judicial appointments primarily so that the Government itself should retain trust and confidence in the judges."

An additional argument is that such an approach offers additional protection for judges: if they are appointed by politicians, politicians might be inhibited from criticising them too much, whereas if, in effect, judges are appointed by the commission—the Minister will have only a veto—they might be subject to greater criticism.

Before I discuss the judicial appointments commission, I should declare the interest that I was a member of the Commercial Bar Association group that made a detailed submission on the subject last year. I was pleased to hear that the hon. Member for Beaconsfield is generally happy with that part of the Bill. I was not surprised to hear that, because we have reached the present position through evolution. The Law Society called for reform in the early 90s. Lord Mackay as Lord Chancellor opened up judicial appointment by advertising for circuit court judges. Lord Irvine appointed a Commissioner for Judicial Appointments, and Sir Colin Campbell has reported on a number of occasions. The system has been brought generally into line with modern principles of appointment, with equal opportunities and feedback for those who are disappointed. Lord Irvine also instituted the annual publication of a report on appointments. In a way, the proposals in the Bill build on the principles of openness and transparency that already operate. Scotland has a judicial appointments body and Canada has commissions that recommend appointment in some of the provinces and at federal level.

There are issues surrounding composition. The Constitutional Affairs Committee took the view that the commission ought to be chaired by a lawyer, but the concordat between the Lord Chief Justice and the Lord Chancellor concedes that a lay member should chair the body, so we have to accept that. There has been some discussion about the extent to which the Lord Chancellor can issue guidance, and the Joint Committee on Human Rights states, at paragraphs 1.54 and 1.55 of its report, that guidance by the Lord Chancellor would breach the independence of the judiciary. I reject that view. There can be no human rights-based objections to the Lord Chancellor giving guidance to the judicial appointments commission.

Merit is the cardinal principle. We cannot have a representative judiciary. Just as I want the best person to do brain surgery on me, I want the best judges. None the less, diversity is not inconsistent with merit. The excellent 2004 consultation paper "Increasing Diversity in the Judiciary" demonstrates the increase in the number of women and ethnic minority lawyers appointed to the judiciary—for example, Mrs. Justice Linda Dobbs was the first black female appointee to the High Court. I commend my right hon. and noble Friend the Lord Chancellor for quickening the pace of increasing diversity.

I take the point made by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield, but I would put it more colloquially: we have to beat the bushes—we have to encourage people to apply. Some people might, for some reason, be dissuaded from applying. My concern about the judicial appointments commission as proposed is that only one name will be put forward. My argument is the same as I advanced in relation to appointments to the supreme court: it seems to me that democratic accountability would be better served by more than one name going forward to the Minister or the Lord Chancellor.

Both in terms of the principles that I outlined at the outset of my speech and in terms of the bulk of its details, I think that the Bill is an appropriate measure to put to the House. I shall certainly support it tonight.

5.59 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome) (LD): It is important for Members who are not lawyers to contribute to the debate; otherwise, there is a danger that it will become a dialogue between hon. and learned Members, and the measure is far too important for that to happen.

At the outset, I should say that the Liberal Democrats support the Bill—but, my goodness, the Government have made it difficult for us to do so during its genesis. I do not accept the enormity of the problems portrayed by the Conservatives, and I do not believe that the supposed furore extends far beyond people with a particular and special interest in the proposals. Indeed, although excellent points were made in the debates in another place and by the Committees that considered the Bill, there was a great deal of trade unionism—people protecting their own interests rather than looking at the wider aspirations of the proposals.

The Bill is an important measure in anyone's book. The Lord Chief Justice, Lord Woolf, has been cited a couple of times already, but it is worth underlining what he said on 7 December in the House of Lords:

"the Bill marks a gigantic step forward in our constitutional arrangements. Above all, it means that the future independence of the judiciary will be safer than it has ever been."

We support that important aspiration. Lord Woolf went on to say:

"if we value an independent judiciary and its task in protecting our personal freedoms, we should ensure that this Bill reaches the statute book."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 7 December 2004: Vol. 667, c. 759.]

That does not display the doubts which, it was intimated earlier, the Lord Chief Justice entertained. Of course he had doubts in the initial stages, but they have been resolved by patient consideration of the Bill in another place.

Mr. Grieve: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Lord Chief Justice was concerned that there was a serious risk that there would be no end to the legislation? A hiatus was created when the Prime Minister tried to strike off or delete the post of Lord Chancellor in summer 2003. That was, and is, one of the major concerns of the Lord Chief Justice, and it may be one reason why he wanted to bring the matter to a conclusion.

Mr. Heath: I do not think it is for the hon. Gentleman or me to ascribe any further motivation to the Lord Chief Justice, and it would be unwise to do so. I am quite sure, however, that he shared the widespread concern about the way in which the proposal was introduced. The hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) said in an intervention on the Minister that the Government had been urged to introduce the proposal for a long time—it had been subject to undue delay, but it was not a back of the envelope job. The sad news, however, is that it was both. Yes, the proposal was long overdue, but equally, it was produced on the back of an envelope, because the Prime Minister chose to make fundamental changes to the structure of government on the basis of poor or non-existent advice.

In my capacity as Liberal Democrat spokesman on constitutional affairs, I often ask people two questions. First, what is the link between the highest levels of the judiciary and my constituency? The answer is that the statue of justice on top of the Old Bailey was made in Frome. Secondly, who was Lord Chancellor in 1075? I am relying on various websites for the answer, as I cannot find any historical details about the brief occupancy of the Lord Chancellorship in 1075 by Baldrick. Everything about the introduction of the proposals smacks of the character of Baldrick in "Blackadder". As hon. Members will remember, he always had a cunning plan. This was the Prime Minister's cunning little plan, but it was rather a bad one, as it involved announcing the abolition of the post of Lord Chancellor without, apparently, a single thought about what would happen next. Indeed, the announcement was made on 12 June 2003, but it was not until 14 July 2003 that we finally had a White Paper that gave substance to the Prime Minister's spurious suggestions.

Mr. Gummer: Has the hon. Gentleman not underestimated the difficulty? When Baldrick had a cunning plan, he usually gave some evidence of thinking it out. The problem with this cunning plan is that when it was announced, there was no evidence that anyone had given it any thought at all.

Mr. Heath: I agree with the right hon. Gentleman, but I fear that I will become lost in a metaphorical wilderness if I pursue the Baldrick theme too far, so I hope that he will excuse me.

Not only did the proposals lack any substance other than a relabelling, which was palpably inadequate to deal with substantial constitutional change but, even worse, people who should have been consulted were not aware that an announcement was about to be made. The Lord Chief Justice had clearly not been consulted, and neither had the senior judiciary. No one in Scotland was consulted at all, despite the fact that the proposals had implications for Scottish constitutional arrangements. That is a serious criticism both of the way in which the machinery of Government operated under the Prime Minister's edict and of the readiness to put into effect a fundamental change to our constitutional arrangements.

Consultation has now taken place, and it has been extraordinarily productive. We should give credit to everyone who has been involved in the discussions. In particular, the senior judiciary have been remarkably sensitive to the intentions of the Government, who have made a sensible response to those concerns. The concordat, which has been mentioned several times, is crucial, and it underlies our position on the Bill.

I do not wish to speak at inordinate length in a debate that has already taken up considerable time, but I shall look briefly at the proposals. The first does not concern the Bill itself, but the Department for Constitutional Affairs, which we christened "Decaff". People in the Department do not particularly like that abbreviation—which only encourages me to use it—but it is apt, because of its "justice lite" brand, as opposed to the full-bodied equivalent . We have argued for a long time that we need a proper Ministry for Justice, which would encompass the responsibilities of the Department for Constitutional Affairs but would also go much further, taking a large chunk out of that monolithic bailiwick, the Home Office. Responsibilities that are not appropriate for a Minister with executive responsibility for the police and investigative services would be removed to a protected area, where the proper concerns of justice and the relationship between the citizen and the Executive could be taken into account. Our principal criticism, therefore, is not about the establishment of a new Department but about the fact that it does not have the scope to do the job that we would like it to do.

Secondly, we are anxious about the constitutional position of the Lord Chancellor—a post that was abolished in a day, but is now to be restored and maintained in perpetuity. There has been a great deal of debate about the doctrine of the separation of powers and, as hon. Members on both sides of the House are aware, such a doctrine is not current in our political philosophy, although it is in other countries. Surely, however, we have a concept in our political affairs of the de facto separation of matters that are properly the province of the judiciary and those that are properly the province of the Executive and the legislature.

It was an anomaly of staggering proportions to have in one person a Cabinet Minister with executive power—a member of the Executive—as both the head of the judiciary and the Speaker of a House of the legislature. We only have to imagine for one moment arguing in a newly formed democracy that that was the right way for it to organise its affairs to realise what a constitutional anomaly it was. I am personally glad that the anomaly has at last, partially, been resolved. That is something that I have called for over many years, and I shed no tears for the judicial role of the Lord Chancellor, which I think was largely illusory in any case.

I part company with those who say that Lord Chancellors have never exercised their powers in a partisan way. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) was right to say that over the past 25 to 30 years we have had excellent Lord Chancellors who have not exercised their powers inappropriately. However, I am sure that he would agree that in the early part of the 20th century there were Lord Chancellors who were anything but entirely open and transparent in the way in which they exercised their powers.

Mr. Grieve: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman. Until after the second world war it was considered perfectly proper for a Lord Chancellor to exercise a degree of political patronage in judicial appointments. Times have moved on. That shows how evolution can take place within existing structures in our constitution by convention that subsequently become irreversible.

Mr. Heath: If it is irreversible, let us make that clear in our statutes. That is an argument for the measure, and I think that there was scope for abuse.

I have difficulties with the notion that the Lord Chancellor has to remain as the Secretary of State in charge of a major Department of State, in the House of Lords. I have problems with that on a number of fronts. I think that as a matter of principle, Secretaries of State should be answerable to this House. I am sorry that not everyone agrees with that, but I think that that should be the position. With all due respect to the Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs, the hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Lammy), who is sitting on the Government Front Bench, I do not think it is right that this major Department of State can answer to this House only through the person of a junior Minister. The Secretary of State should be available to us for questioning.

I find it difficult to countenance any Secretary of State being in the upper House. That is my personal view. I cannot understand the position of those who criticise the present Lord Chancellor by saying that he is one of the Prime Minister's cronies and used to be his flatmate, which played a part in his appointment. I think that the present holder of the position often does a very good job, but that is a common criticism. Why, then, would he want to institutionalise that arrangement, so that every future Lord Chancellor—every future Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs—had to be a crony of the Prime Minister of the day, because only by that patronage does anyone appear in the other place?

That is an extraordinary anomaly. There is a further anomaly, and I have to say that the hon. Member for Beaconsfield rather ducked it when he was intervened on by one of his hon. Friends. If the Conservatives wish to see an upper Chamber that is 80 per cent. elected, why is it all right to have a Secretary of State—a Lord Chancellor—who is elected and sits in the upper House, but not all right to have a Secretary of State who is elected but sits in the lower House? Where is the constitutional logic of that position? I do not think that there is any logic.

Mr. Grieve rose—

Mr. Heath: I give way to the hon. Gentleman. Perhaps he can persuade me.

Mr. Grieve: I leave to one side the composition of the upper House after any reform that a Conservative Government might carry out, but the hon. Gentleman is missing the point. By virtue of taking the oath, irrespective of whether the Lord Chancellor is elected or not, he will not be able to have a further career in politics thereafter. That is the central point: the Government do not wish to see that happen. It is a question about the career of the person who holds the office, and the sensible place for him to be is in the House of Lords.

Mr. Heath: I am much more content to ensure that the Lord Chief Justice is genuinely independent of the Executive, is genuinely independent of the legislature and carries out many of the functions that give rise to concern in the hon. Gentleman's scenario, rather than being Secretary of State for what I would wish to be a Ministry of Justice. Under the present arrangements it will be a Department for Constitutional Affairs.

Mr. Hogg: I do not want to disparage the Lord Chief Justice or other holders of that office. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will recognise that much of the debate is essentially of a political character, as between the holder of the office of Lord Chancellor and the Home Secretary. The problem is that the Home Secretary's office is extremely powerful. What we need to set against that office is the authority of somebody else who is in a position to bear down on the Home Secretary, and persuade his Cabinet colleagues to disagree with him. There are advantages, therefore, in adopting the suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield.

Mr. Heath: I am grateful to the right hon. and learned Gentleman for his comments. I listened to him with a great deal of respect. It is precisely for that reason that I do not want to see a Lord Chancellor without any great status within the pecking order of the Cabinet because of the relatively junior status that has been accorded to the Department for Constitutional Affairs—and without the merits of an electoral mandate, too—being bullied by a Home Secretary. I take exactly the point that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has made. I think that we would be better served by having a strong Cabinet Minister answerable to the elected House with a mandate of his or her own to counter the weight of the Home Secretary. We should also rearrange the functionality between the two Departments so that the Home Office is cut down to size and the Department of Justice—as I would have it—is a much more significant body. That is a genuine disagreement that we can hold. I think that we can both agree that there is a need for the person who heads the Department to have sufficient status and weight to be able to hold their own.

I shall now move on to the Supreme Court—

Mr. Kidney: To be clear, before the hon. Gentleman moves on, given the Liberal Democrats' support for a full-blown Ministry of Justice, may I take it that he believes that the Lord Chancellor does not need to be a lawyer to hold that position.

Mr. Heath: That is my view. That is the view that I will express in Committee when we reach that stage. I do not want to mislead the hon. Gentleman, and I will make it plain that some of my noble Friends, many of whom have legal qualifications, take a different view. However, from this Bench in this place, I shall express the view that the legal qualification is not a necessary part of the equation.

I now move on to the proposals for the Supreme Court. This is a significant move but not a revolutionary one. It is absurd to suggest that it is. It is confusing and pointless that we have a Supreme Court already, with absurd names such as the Appellate Committee of the House of Lords and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council acting in its constitutional role, and we choose to call the members of the Supreme Court the Lords of Appeal in Ordinary. Lords of Appeal in Ordinary is exactly what they are not, and nobody should suggest that they are.

We have a senior court which is not the House of Lords despite the fact that people think that it is. It is a separate body of judges that happens to sit, rather uncomfortably, within that edifice. It has an entirely different function, as has already been argued in this debate, and very often Law Lords do not exercise their role within the legislature, and nor should they because that puts them in an invidious position in dealing with their primary responsibilities.

We have fictions built on fictions built on fictions. Because I believe that we should be a modern democracy where things are as clear as possible—although nothing in the law can be entirely clear—it is helpful to the general public to understand that we already have a Supreme Court that is a separate entity and fulfils a particular function, and that the members of that Supreme Court are the senior judiciary of the land.

As regards judicial appointments, I wholly support the proposals, with one caveat. In Committee we need to do justice to the concerns expressed by Sir Colin Campbell and the Commission for Judicial Appointments about the structure and role of the proposed judicial appointments commission. We ought to be careful to assess the validity of those concerns.

In general terms, there is much to support in the proposals. I welcome the enhanced role of the Lord Chief Justice. As I said, I should like to explore whether the Attorney-General should have further express duties. The holder of that office sometimes plays a more significant constitutional role than we give credit for. It is a developing role, and transparency and clarity about what is expected of the Attorney-General, particularly in giving unequivocal advice, perhaps when that is not sought, on the appropriateness or legality of Government actions, might be an enhancement of the role.

Mr. Grieve: The role of the Attorney-General as the sole proper legal figure in Government has clearly been enhanced by the fact that the Lord Chancellor's role has been so dreadfully diminished. The two go together, which is one reason why the Lord Chancellor's office should be preserved.

Mr. Heath: Or the Attorney-General's office enhanced, as I said. There is more than one way of achieving the same objective.

Mr. Hogg: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heath: I was trying to be brief, but I shall give way one last time.

Mr. Hogg: I would not want to discourage the hon. Gentleman from being brief, but does he accept that there is in principle much to be said for the Attorney-General sitting in this House, and that whenever possible the Government should appoint as Attorney-General someone who is in this House?

Mr. Heath: It will not have escaped the notice of the right hon. and learned Gentleman that I believe that all Ministers should be appointed from this House. That is not my party's position, but it is my position. An upper House should be free from any patronage in the form of ministerial preferment, and ministerial appointments should be drawn from the elected House. Accountability is important, but that is not the situation at present. It could be argued that ministerial appointments solely from this House would limit the number of potential applicants for the role. This will not happen in my lifetime, but there could be a Parliament in which no legally qualified Members were returned by the electorate. That would cause the Government some difficulty—although it has not happened yet, and I doubt whether it will happen in the immediate future, judging by recent experience.

I have long advocated Middlesex Guildhall as the right place for the supreme court. I do not understand why anyone should consider it so self-evidently the wrong place. I understand that there are issues concerning the internal decorations of the place, difficulties with its listed building status, and the fact that the potential members of the supreme court will want a level of informality that is not entirely consistent with the rather austere and formal trappings of a court. Nevertheless, there is considerable symbolic importance to the fact that the court would be situated in Parliament square, in the centre of our democratic system, so that Parliament square would be flanked by at least four of the great estates of the realm—the House of Commons on one side, the Church in the form of Westminster abbey on another, the supreme court on another and, God help us, the Treasury on another.

Mr. Garnier: I intervene not because, like the hon. and learned Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston), I from time to time sit as a Crown Court recorder in the Guildhall, but to ask the hon. Gentleman whether his views about the suitability of the Guildhall have been informed by a visit to it. Has he been round it inside, as opposed to simply looking at it from the outside?

Mr. Heath: I do not deny that there are difficulties, but they can be overcome. That is the position that the Government have now adopted. The debate has been wonderfully amplified by having a recorder on each side of the Chamber, acting in stereo. I hope the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) will have a chance to contribute to the debate formally.

Will the Minister confirm that under the Bill as it is formulated there will be two supreme courts—the supreme court of the United Kingdom and the Supreme Court of England and Wales? Will he confirm that he will remove one of those nomenclatures before the Bill reaches its final stages, as there is the potential for confusion with two "supremes" in one statute.

It is extremely important that we get the funding right. I will not tease the hon. Member for Beaconsfield about how he would achieve cuts in the Department. That was dealt with in an earlier intervention. We cannot allow the important process of justice to be curtailed by a lack of funding. The funding must be predictable, so that those who administer the court can do so with certainty.

Mr. Grieve: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heath: I was trying to take less than an hour over my contribution, but I will give way.

Mr. Grieve: Clearly, savings will not be achieved by spending an extra £8.8 million a year funding a supreme court which, as I explained, is not necessary.

Mr. Heath: The hon. Gentleman has his view. He also has his calculation of the marginal costs after the establishment of the supreme court, as opposed to its predecessor bodies. I am not convinced that that is an accurate representation. The Conservatives may be putting together figures that are not realisable, in a desperate bid to find potential savings in order to present themselves as a tax-cutting party. There is a danger that the debate will become overly partisan, which is not my intention.

Mr. Kidney rose—

Mr. Heath: I shall give way for the very last time to the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney).

Mr. Kidney: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making me the last person to whom he gives way. This is the intervention that the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) would not take from me. Do not the Conservative costings deliberately exclude the staff and judicial salaries costs from the present system, but add them on to the costs of the new supreme court? They should, of course, be in both calculations.

Mr. Heath: That is precisely the point that I was making about the marginal cost increase. The hon. Gentleman is right. We can all do fuzzy maths, but it achieves nothing and people see through the credibility or otherwise of such proposals.

On full cost recovery, the hon. and learned Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston) was wrong. We have debated the matter. I tabled amendments to the Courts Bill, now the Courts Act 2003, to deal with full cost recovery, which is a serious matter. The idea that litigants in civil actions must pay, for instance, an apportionment for the upkeep of the royal courts of justice is an absurdity that we need to address. I, for one, am not prepared to see the costs of court action being put beyond the means of most ordinary people seeking justice. There is a real fear that that will happen, and the same will apply to cases that are brought to the supreme court under these proposals.

There is much to welcome in the proposals. There is certainly much to welcome in the concordat that was arrived at with the senior judiciary, and it would be foolish of us to seek to unpick that concordat in Committee or during the Bill's later stages unless we have very good reason to do so. I shall not resile from my position that the Department for Constitutional Affairs should take a greater role—a matter that I shall debate further—but we shall support the Bill, although not the time allocated to debate it, and we shall resist those who oppose it, either through blind reaction or sectional interest, which are unworthy of the considerable constitutional advance that the Bill represents.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. Let me offer a word of comfort to right hon. and hon. Members. Provided that everyone does not take a minimum of 29 minutes, there will be ample time for contributions to be made to the debate. I call Mr. David Kidney.

6.31 pm

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford) (Lab): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, especially for that advice.

If anyone looks at the Register of Members' Interests, they will see that I have only one entry, which is as a non-practising solicitor, so I have no practical interest in the debate. However, as a former solicitor, I strongly support the Law Society's long-running campaign for more judges to be appointed from the country's body of solicitors. If I mention that from time to time during my contribution, that is the reason. It is certainly not from any personal expectation of reward if more solicitors become judges.

I welcome the Bill's commitment to the rule of law, which my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston) dealt with at some length in his contribution, and the statutory pronouncement of judicial independence, which is an improvement on the present status of the law and gives a statutory underpinning to the safeguards that we enjoy—the safeguard against arbitrary government, the safeguarding of our human rights.

On the separation of powers, those hon. Members who have mentioned Charles-Louis de Secondat, Baron de Montesquieu (1689–1755) have been unfair to the gentleman, who was an influential philosopher and a judge—as it happens—in France and whose influence was sufficiently long-lasting for his views on the separation of powers to be accepted quite fully in the writing of the original American constitution. It is true that he had an idealistic view of the benefits of the so-called separation of powers in this country at the time that he viewed it, which I think was in 1748, but he probably was not that far wrong at that time in the development of our unwritten constitution. As a snapshot at that time, the Executive were very much represented by the Crown and the Ministers who advised the Crown, the legislature was a nascent and growing House of Commons and, effectively, an established House of Lords, and the judges were independent of both, which was what impressed him in his thinking and writing. Time has moved on and he did not foresee the growth of an Executive with the legislature in this country. What is so different here today is the way in which the Executive dominate the legislature. Happily, the Executive do not dominate the judiciary, and the Bill is here to ensure that no future development in our unwritten constitution changes that. That is why the Bill is welcome.

Just to finish with the Baron, he did say:

"The political liberty of the subject is a tranquillity of mind", and on the loss of liberty he said:

"there is no liberty if the power of judging be not separated from the legislative and executive powers."

I agree with him on that.

Mr. Jonathan Djanogly (Huntingdon) (Con): I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way. Did he not also approve of the American system where the separation of powers goes somewhat further than the Government are proposing, particularly in relation to the Executive and the legislature?

Mr. Kidney: I take it that the hon. Gentleman is asking whether I approve of the American constitution. I am simply happy to say that I prefer living in this country and I enjoy its constitution much more.

It is right that the position of Lord Chancellor should be filled by someone who no longer sits as a judge, no longer acts as the Speaker of the House of Lords and no longer carries personal responsibility for the appointment of members of the judiciary and Queen's counsel. It is right to impose a duty on the Lord Chancellor, whoever that may be in future, to uphold judicial independence. It is brilliant that the Bill goes beyond that and imposes the same duty on all other Ministers and all other persons who may have an influence on the administration of justice, but I see no reason why we should require the Lord Chancellor to have a legal qualification or to sit in the House of Lords. I am absolutely with the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) in thinking that it is far more desirable in terms of democratic accountability that a Minister of State should be in this House at this Dispatch Box facing questions from elected representatives of the people.

In future, judicial appointments will, by statute, be required to be made solely on merit and to require good character. That incorporates in statute what we presently practise, so that is correct and desirable. The statute is welcome because it includes those words, but a system of appointment must also be transparent, fair, efficient and independent to command widespread public confidence, so it is essential to ensure that the recruitment process itself attracts the broadest possible field of candidates. The judiciary tends to continue to attract those who look like the present incumbents. There are too few women, too few lawyers from ethnic minorities and I repeat that there are too few solicitors.

I give credit to those who have steered the process to reach the point that we are at today, beginning with Lord Mackay, who was mentioned by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North, who introduced the advertisement of vacancies and competition for appointment in 1994. That was a welcome first step in a process that has since moved on. Hon. Members will appreciate that Lord Mackay was a member of a Conservative, not a Labour, Government, so I like to think that there would be cross-party support for the development that has since taken place.

By 1998, Lord Irvine, as the Lord Chancellor, was able to end the invitation-only system of appointments to the High Court bench. He was able to change the age limits for applicants and some of the sitting requirements for part-time judges—for example, block sittings—so as to be more flexible in accommodating people who would have found the previous system too restrictive for them to apply to be judges. He was also able to introduce the requirement that allegations of misconduct or serious criticism against an applicant had to be specific and backed by evidence or be ignored. He was able to introduce a lay input into the recruitment process itself, and, as my hon. and learned Friend said, he introduced the annual report to Parliament about the appointments process—again, desirable developments moving in the right direction. When he was still Lord Chancellor in 2001, it was Lord Irvine who introduced the present independent Commission for Judicial Appointments.

In terms of the continuation of the development and praise for it, I should add that the present Lord Chancellor has introduced the proposals in this Bill, themselves subject to widespread consultation before their introduction, showing that we continue to move in the same direction.

The existing commissioners for judicial appointments support further progress in this direction. In their last annual report in October 2004, they called for the continuation of the independent audits of the recruitment process, and both I and the commission look forward to a speedy extension of the new system to more of the appointments to lower judicial offices. The significance of that is that the commission could be criticised for not understanding what is going on in the legal profession lower down if it has no responsibility for the appointment of those judges. Broader experience and knowledge of the developing pool of judicial talent would help the commission to make future appointments higher up the judicial system.

I hope that the judicial appointments commission will make further improvements on fairness and transparency, continuing the good work that has been done to date. I hope that it will integrate diversity into its recruitment work, because I strongly believe that diversity reinforces merit and does not detract from it. I hope to see continued structured and accountable methods of collecting views from the judiciary on candidates who are suitable for office. I also hope that it will introduce further audit trails on how selection decisions are reached. Parliament and the Lord Chancellor can help to secure improvements such as helping to ensure diversity, consistent with merit, in the future judiciary.

Clause 58 covers the guidance that may be given to the commission and to selection panels for the most senior judges. Guidance may be issued on identifying persons who are willing to be considered for selection and on assessing them. The Bill states that the purposes for which guidance may be given

"include the encouragement of diversity in the range of persons available for selection."

My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Keith Vaz) asked the Minister whether he will assure the House that the good progress that I have recounted will continue. The best answer that the Minister could give would be that the Government will be active in using guidance to ensure that such work continues.

On the procedure for issuing guidance, which involves not only the Minister but Parliament, clause 59 requires the Minister to "consult the Lord Chief Justice" and

"lay a draft of the proposed guidance before . . . Parliament."

The guidance must be approved by affirmative resolutions of both Houses of Parliament before it is given to the commission and to the selection panels. Clause 58 states that the panels and the commission must have regard to any guidance given. For the sake of completeness, the guidance may be revised and reissued too.

After the change from the present voluntary commission to the statutory commission, the old voluntary commission will be left with complaints, which will be dealt with by a new judicial appointments and conduct ombudsman, who will, to all intents and purposes, cover the commission's present complaints role.

One worrying omission, which I hope is put right in Committee, is that the Bill does not include a provision covering the voluntary commission's current role in auditing future judicial appointments competitions. Part of operating fair recruitment processes will be understanding what is going well and what is going wrong, which will require somebody to continue the audit practice of the present voluntary commission in the new system, because the Bill does not charge anyone with that responsibility.

I welcome the Bill and the proposal to introduce a new supreme court. I agree with the Joint Committee on Human Rights that a supreme court with justices barred from sitting in the House of Lords will make it less likely that violations of the European convention on human rights occur in practice. I hope that Middlesex Guildhall becomes the home of the new supreme court and look forward to 2008, when the collection of buildings in Parliament square will become even more impressive, demonstrating in both the geographical and political landscapes that the tranquillity that Montesquieu discussed in 1748 has come to Westminster, the home of democracy.

6.44 pm

Mr. John Gummer (Suffolk, Coastal) (Con): When the Government propose a major constitutional change, they must first explain that the problem is real and that it is worth taking such trouble over. The Minister is always charming and careful when he puts the case to the House, but he found it difficult to bring together two contradictory concepts. He wanted to assure us that everything has been okay for some time, that the judicial system is fair and that the judicial system has not been affected by party political considerations. Although such an example would have been to some extent anomalous, he could not point to any particular uncertainty in the law because of political involvement.

The Minister went on to say that the structure has caused discomfort and a lack of entire happiness for many years and that it needs radical modernisation. I am sure that one could make the case for tidying up most things, but we should be concerned with priorities and my worry is that the matter is not a priority. Given that the judicial system is right in principle, it is not the issue to go for, given the large number of other things that I can recommend the Minister to do, although, in fact, he himself would not have to do most of them. I would like a considerable extension of environmental policy to do something about climate change rather than talking about it. I can suggest a range of real priorities—we could, for example, improve the standard of our built environment, given that we are building so many houses.

The Minister has not established the fundamental basis for the Bill or explained the real reason for it. He said that the matter is difficult and that people misunderstand it. He said that, if one were to introduce a new constitution, it would be jolly difficult to argue that it should be the same as our system, but he would also find it difficult to argue for a constitutional monarchy or an established Church. I have no interest in those two subjects and no interest in the Bill, because I am not a lawyer—I have never wanted to be a lawyer and think that there are too many lawyers in the House. I am perfectly happy to discuss the matter and am not arguing on behalf of a vested interest.

It is peculiar to argue that everything has been okay, but we must have radical change because we cannot export our constitution to the rest of the world. The Minister has missed the fundamental nature of our constitution—that it is evolutionary, that it produces over time a series of checks and balances and that it is not written because it largely relies on conventions that people continue to observe.

Mr. Garnier: I do not want to interrupt the flow of my right hon. Friend's speech with an indelicate intervention, but legal services are a successful invisible export from this country and overseas litigants are encouraged to come to our British courts in London to litigate their disputes. There is no guarantee that the great kerfuffle caused by the Government will enhance that invisible export one jot.

Mr. Gummer: I am not expert on the size of those exports or their invisibility, but the present situation does not seem to put off people from abroad who ask for British law to be the basis of the interpretation of contracts and the like; indeed, the system appears to work quite well. On the question of practicalities, the people whom the Minister prayed in aid—the people from far beyond the seas who supposedly would not understand it—have not found it difficult to see that the system works. Indeed, only last week I perused a contract signed by a previous chairman of the company on behalf of somebody whom I employed. Although the company was French, the contract was to be understood in the context of English law and any argument about it was to be heard in the English courts. As the French today—leave alone Montesquieu—find it easy to understand that the system works pretty well, it is reasonable to think that it is not too bad. It may not be perfect—I am sure that the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) will mention several aspects that she would like to improve—but that is true of most of life. The Minister has not explained why this change, with all its ramifications, is a sufficiently necessary or successful alternative to be considered by this House.

The Minister has not established the first point—that there is a real problem that needs immediate and fundamental resolution in this House. The second point that he must establish is that, having identified such a problem, he has made a considered response. Here, I very much sympathise with him. He had obviously thought carefully about how to deal with the fundamental difficulty that the issue was not introduced in the most felicitous of manners. I am sure that deep in his heart he said to himself, "I wouldn't have done it this way myself. I wouldn't have suddenly announced something that I had not talked to anybody about, not thought about much, and did not know much about, and then found myself in a mess so that my best friend had to go off and explain to people that what he had said was not quite what he had meant." This started off in a very embarrassing way—"back of an envelope" would be putting it politely.

Perhaps that would not matter so much were not this part of a pattern. Lord Butler restrained himself for many months before making his recent comments about the nature of this Government's approach to institutions of state. He argued, as an independent voice who was at the heart of Government, that this Government make decisions on the sofa. Very often, they do not act properly and sensibly by listening to people, finding out about the various views, and trying to use the institutions of Government better to serve the people, but by changing the institutions of Government ad hominem.

Let me give two examples that parallel what we are discussing. We have an Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, as we previously had the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, that is based not on making Government more efficient or effective, but on providing what was thought to be a suitable job for the Deputy Prime Minister. His first Department did not provide him with a suitable job because he mucked it up considerably, so the Government created another Department based upon the same principle.

Perhaps I would not mind that happening on one occasion, but I was very upset when the Government decided to abolish what everybody had seen as the best and most powerful Environment Department of either party or of any European country. They took it away from planning and local government, where it had the power to act, and shoved it in with the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs, as though the environment were something to do with rural development and woolly animals. It is not surprising that since then the environment has had no influence on any of the Government's decisions. When they introduced a planning Bill, the Minister responsible for the environment was never consulted.

Mr. Hogg: I suggest to my right hon. Friend that there is another ad hominem change in which we might both have an interest. Following the foot and mouth debacle, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food was destroyed and responsibility for agricultural matters was pushed right down the pecking order.

Mr. Gummer: My right hon. and learned Friend has been an Agriculture Minister. The Secretary of State who runs DEFRA has done a remarkably good job with the tools that she was given. The Department was created to give her a sufficiency of power to make up for the fact that she was going to be moved to make space for the Foreign Secretary. That was done over lunch—it was not back of an envelope, but back of a menu.

My point, Mr. Deputy Speaker—lest you should be hovering in your seat, about to suggest that I must concentrate on the Bill—is simply this: one does not arrive at good institutional solutions by making suitable packages for one's friends, but by doing the job properly and allowing the Government to function. That is why this issue is so serious. This Government are often characterised by saying the right thing and wanting to do the right thing, but very rarely achieving it. They are a Government of words, not action, and they have shown throughout that they cannot make the Government system work.

In saying that, I am citing the Prime Minister. After the first period of Labour Government, he admitted, "When we started we thought that when we said something, it would happen. Then we found that it didn't happen, so we would have to make it happen." Four years later, he still has not made it happen. The Government still do not deliver, even in areas where I support them. I support most of their aims on the environment, but I can no longer pretend that they have delivered any of them. Now, because the European Union has pointed out that we have not brought down our emissions as we promised, they are going to sue the EU to prevent it from capping those emissions.

In this case, the Government do not say, "There is a problem, we will prove that it is there and provide the institutional solution", but, "We don't really have a problem, there isn't really much to do, so we will make a fundamental change, but we can't prove to you that it will work in practice." The Minister did not explain how it would work. Indeed, he was at his weakest when he tried to argue that he could not do so because the other House had not made its decisions about whom it was going to call what to do which, and that there were problems about what would happen if the Prime Minister appointed as Lord Chancellor someone who did not sit in the House of Lords or, if he did appoint someone who sat in the House of Lords, whether he might chair its proceedings. As the Bill started in the House of Lords, it might have been helpful to have had answers to such questions.

We do not have those answers because the Minister started off on the wrong foot. The Bill did not come forth as the result of proper discussion and the serious involvement of all the appropriate parties, but because somebody wanted to shift people around on the board and make Cabinet changes without thinking about the results. The Minister may shake his head, but no one but he believes that we are here because of logical Government decision making. We are here because the Prime Minister made a mistake and had to cover it up by producing a Bill that would otherwise not have been introduced. I can imagine that, at some time, the Government might have believed that the Bill was a convenient measure to introduce when they did not want to present anything too controversial with the public to make up for the Hunting Bill, but that is not the reason for our debating it now. We are debating it now because the Prime Minister shot from the hip and found that he had shot his fox.

Mr. Leslie: I would understand if the right hon. Gentleman disagreed with the proposals, but it does him no credit to belittle the logic and the rationale that I believe that I presented to justify a significant change in our constitution. Let us consider, for example, his point that the Lord Chancellor should be a lawyer or a peer. Does he claim that he is not sufficiently capable of undertaking that ministerial post and that he is somehow not qualified or capable of being appointed to it in future?

Mr. Gummer: It is not among my ambitions. However, if the Bill had been approached by trying to find a consensus for change rather than pre-empting it, it would have been more logical and not open to the specific worries that now beset the Under-Secretary. I do not believe that I belittled his arguments. He is here, although not a lawyer, as an advocate. We know why he is here—he has been presented with a Bill and he has to do the best he can with it. In general, with his normal charm, he has done a great deal of good, but he cannot get away from the problem.

The problem is that the Bill exists not because of a concerted and sensible approach to the constitution, but because the Prime Minister made a bodge-up. To try to overcome that, it was thought better to try to produce something that might at least stand up, by which time he was in no position to gain a commonality of view. A considered response is crucial on constitutional matters. It would not matter if we were discussing a less important subject, but it matters not to have got a considered consensual response on a question that lies at the heart of the relationship between the powers of Government, the House of Commons, the House of Lords and the judiciary.

Now that we are here we must ask for the third point that is necessary for good legislation. We should demand proper scrutiny. If the problem has not been properly adumbrated and the response is far from considered, the House should demand at least proper scrutiny. I should like the Under-Secretary to reflect on the way in which he answered some of the questions that were put to him. I believe that future generations will speak harshly of the way in which the current generation has damaged the nature of Parliament.

The guillotine, without debate, that is compulsory for every Bill is a fundamental constitutional outrage. It means that the Government not only control the agenda, but decide the length of time that they believe should be devoted to any aspect of a Bill. As we witnessed earlier, the Government also decide whether a matter should be debated on the Floor of the House or Upstairs. The Government, with a majority, do all those things irrespective of any longstanding convention of the House. We heard from the Speaker that there was no position from which to defend the rights of Back Benchers because the debate is subject to a vote and not to his prerogative.

Given that the Government have started on the wrong foot, have experienced some difficulty in proving the need for the changes and have had great difficulty in providing a considered response or a proper consensus, I would have thought that they would at least ensure that the whole Bill was debated on the Floor of the House, as constitutional Bills should be, and that enough time was provided for that. The deal should have been done by the Government and the Opposition, with the involvement of the Liberal Democrats in the discussion. The Liberal Democrats take a different view from mine, but I believe that we have let the nation down by not enabling the country to understand how we have limited our ability to deal with legislation.

There is more bad legislation than ever on the statute book because there is more undebated legislation on it. To make life more convenient for Members of Parliament, we have become more convenient for the Executive. To make our sittings times shorter and our hours more social, we have brought about a position whereby our constituents are faced with largely undigested Bills. Without the House of Lords, legislation would be impossible for the judiciary to interpret or tackle. I feel ashamed in my surgery when constituents approach me and say, "Mr. Gummer, how could anyone pass that clause?" I look the matter up and find that that clause has not been discussed. The compulsory timetable—the guillotine: that foreign invention that the Government have forced upon us—is intolerable.

Mr. Hogg: To reinforce those views, I invite my right hon. Friend to read the law report in The Times today on the case of Bradley. The court has been making similar points to his about the torrent of ill-considered and ill-drafted legislation.

Mr. Gummer: I am glad that that is the case. The fact that a court has made the point explains why the problem is at the heart of the Bill. The relationship between the law makers and the law interpreters is necessarily uneasy—there is bound to be tension; there always has been—but such tension can work creatively as long as both sides remember their purpose. Our purpose is to produce good law so that judges can make good judgments. We have allowed the Government to emasculate us.

I stress to my hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Djanogly), who is on the Front Bench, that before he gets too enamoured of the wholly alien United States system, we have a parliamentary democracy and a key point in it is the ability of the legislature to keep the Executive under scrutiny and control. That means that the opposition—in the Government, of which there is a good deal, and outside the Government—must have the time to do that.

My worry about my party is that when we return to power we will say, "Well, they did it to us, so we won't give the powers back to the Opposition." I want to stress now that when we return to power, some of us will insist that our first action is to give back power to the people. That means that this House must have the opportunity to debate issues, such as the subject of our discussion, in the way in which we always did formerly, and thus produce legislation that is the envy of the world.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet) (Con) rose—

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley) (Lab): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Gummer: I shall do so shortly, but first I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Sir Sydney Chapman).

Sir Sydney Chapman: I agree with my right hon. Friend's comments. Earlier, he mentioned the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Bill. He may be interested to know that of the 92 clauses in the first measure, only 26 were discussed in Committee. That resulted in the vast part of the Bill having to go to the other place to be considered, probably in a rather rushed manner, before the Government decided—uniquely, in my political career—to recommit a Bill to another Committee. That is the method of the madhouse in dealing with legislation.

Mr. Gummer: I know that my hon. Friend—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I say to the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet (Sir Sydney Chapman), the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer) and to the House as a whole that we are now straying somewhat from the Bill.

Mr. Gummer: I will not pursue my hon. Friend's point about the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Bill. He did, however, draw our attention to the crucial issue that, if we are to agree to the major constitutional changes in the Bill, we should have time to discuss them. I say to the Minister that it would help to regain a consensus on an issue that really matters if, even from his relatively junior position, he could convince the powers that be that showing courtesy to the House by giving us time to debate the whole lot on the Floor of the House would help considerably. It would also mean that many, like myself, who have doubts would find themselves much closer to where he wants us to be—even though I do not think that we should be discussing this because we have other things to do.

So, is there a real problem with the present system? No, that has not been shown. Has there been a considered response? Manifestly not. Will there be proper scrutiny? Not unless the Minister is able to convince the powers that be that there should be. Lastly, there should be an effective outcome. I do not know whether the Minister has looked at the notice outside the new Constitutional Affairs Department. It bears an interesting, if ungrammatical, slogan: "Justice, rights and democracy". There is no comma after "rights", so we must think of rights and democracy together. I am not quite sure why, but there we are.

The slogan was invented by the present Lord Chancellor; I found that out because I asked a lot of questions about it. The interesting thing about it also illustrates part of the problem with the Bill: it mentions rights but not duties or obligations. I wrote and asked representatives at the Department whether they could explain why, when we are to have a new Department, we are for the first time creating a society in which we talk about rights but not obligations. Some of us believe that no human being—no creative being—can have rights, but that we can only have obligations. Our rights are found in the obligations of other people and institutions towards ourselves.

The problem with Tom Paine was that he was wrong. He did not understand the nature of obligation. The great advantage of emphasising duties and obligations is that we remove the selfishness that comes with people who say, "I've got my rights!" If we all thought a bit more about our obligations, perhaps we would understand that a society run on that basis would be much more likely to be one in which the rule of law would be the representation of our duties, and that the more fortunate we are, the greater those duties and obligations become. To set up a Department that refuses to include in its slogan the word "obligations" or "duties" is to set up a Department that starts by being fundamentally flawed.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs (Mr. David Lammy): I hesitate to intervene, but I remember answering an earlier question on this matter from the right hon. Gentleman. We cannot have justice or democracy without responsibility. That is the thing that connects citizen to citizen; we cannot have democracy or justice without it, and he knows that.

Mr. Gummer: Then why does the Minister refuse to put it in his Department's slogan? This country is filled with people, both rich and poor, who believe that they have rights but not responsibilities. The only way to change the nature of our society is to make all of us insistent about obligations, starting with our own—with mine and the Minister's—and moving on to everyone else's. This is at the heart of the Minister's missed opportunity. I gave him the opportunity to change this. I asked him a question and waited for his response. It would not have cost much, when we are spending £30 million, to replace the word "rights" with "obligations" in the little slogan outside his new smart offices.

That brings me back to my final point. The effective outcome will have to be paid for. I began by suggesting that it had not been established that there was a real problem. Indeed, the Minister waxed so lyrical about the excellence of the system, the honesty of the judges, the independence of Lord Chancellors and the reticence with which the Law Lords behaved during debates in which they might have an interest, that he was unable to argue much of a case for the need for the Bill. He was therefore even less able to argue the case for the cost involved.

I know many people who would say that if we have £30 million, we should spend it on giving people more access to justice. There are people who cannot get their case heard because of the slashing attack on legal aid over which this Government have presided. It now takes people longer to get into the courts, and it is more expensive for them when they get there. This Government have achieved that. That £30 million could be very much better spent. I do not know whether the Minister is married—

Mr. Leslie: Nearly.

Mr. Gummer: Then this is an ideal opportunity for someone who has been married for 27 years to give the hon. Gentleman a small piece of advice. When one's wife asks, "Can we afford to do this?", the one argument that one can never put forward is, "Yes, but only if we don't do that." That cannot be part of the argument. The argument is always about doing both. That is a necessary part of life. The trouble with Parliament is that we are acting like that. The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) got up and said that we had to have the best legal system in the world and that if it cost a certain amount of money, that would be the amount we would have to spend. The Liberals are well known for doing this, as they have no hope of coming to power. However, if we spend it on that, I am afraid that we cannot spend it on anything else.

We have created a Bill whose justification has not been made out. It is not a considered response to a proper discussion. It will not be given proper scrutiny, and it will use resources that would be better used elsewhere. I am sorry that it has been brought before us and I wish that we were spending this time dealing with the issues that really matter, such as climate change or the way in which people who were already very poor have become poorer under this Government. The Government are not prepared to discuss those issues. Perhaps we could even have a debate about the Iraq war—an unnecessary and unacceptable war that we should have debated properly. We spent seven hours discussing it, yet we spent 200 hours on the Hunting Bill. This Government have no priorities and, above all, they do not know how to do things. They should not institutionalise the means of achievement, and that is why the Bill should be opposed.

7.18 pm

Vera Baird (Redcar) (Lab): It is a pleasure, as ever, to follow the right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer), although I am baffled by a number of the things that he said. I am left almost speechless by his comments about this Government putting people into poverty, when in fact we have rescued more than 1 million children from the poverty in which they were left by his Government, and by his complaint about cuts in legal aid, when we are spending more on it than ever before and are distributing it better.

I should like to get to the point of this debate—something that the right hon. Gentleman did not do to a great extent—and say that this is an excellent Bill. Its main provisions will bring about a long-overdue modernisation of our constitution and start the process of making the courts and the legal system citizen-centred public services, which, to be consistent with a thoroughgoing democracy, is what they should be.

I applaud the Bill's long-overdue commitment to the rule of law and judicial independence, and I congratulate the Government on introducing it.

I strongly support the substantial change to the office of Lord Chancellor. In particular, he will no longer sit as a judge, he will not act as a Speaker of the House of Lords and he will no longer carry personal responsibility for the appointment of members of the judiciary and Queen's counsel. One could say that the main need for the Lord Chancellor to offer a separate personal guarantee of independence of the judiciary has been much reduced. I will not repeat the two quotes that I have already given from the Lord Chief Justice, whose negotiating skills with the Bill must be applauded, but he said that the Bill offers a better guarantee of judicial independence. I agree with him. However, there continues to be a requirement that the Lord Chancellor should—indeed, must—defend judicial independence and ensure that the judiciary has the resources to exercise its function and in government to represent the public interest in the administration of justice. That clearly requires the Lord Chancellor to be a senior Minister, but it certainly does not require either of the two restrictions that have been put on it in the Bill: notably that the Lord Chancellor must come from the Lords and that he must be a lawyer—not a bit of it. A Minister in the Lords is no more and no less secure in a ministerial post than a Minister in the Commons. He is no better and no worse equipped to take a strong stance in Cabinet than a Minister in the Commons.

I take the point made by the Constitutional Affairs Committee that if someone at the end of his career is Lord Chancellor, as in the past—not least because he sat as a judge in the House of Lords, and such seniority is usually accompanied by maturity of years—he will not have a future to be interrupted if he defends the rule of law against his patron's displeasure. Another argument, of course, is that being Lord Chancellor in this place would be the pinnacle of anyone's achievements, but if he disagreed with his patron he could easily have that career ended, in suddenly imposed obscurity, instead of staying in that high-status, top-performing, challenging role. There is still a great deal of pressure, and while Ministers are appointed as they are there is no structural answer. There is only the integrity of the appointee and his or her strength of character. Those characteristics are to be found in this House every bit as much as in the other House.

No one who takes on the role now can be under any illusion: there will be a statutory duty on them to guarantee the independence of the judiciary and the rule of law. They will be called to account for their conduct of that duty and they will be called to account for any dereliction of it as severely in this House as they would be in the other place. This House is as quick as the other place to see any such dereliction. There is no justification for requiring the Lord Chancellor to be a Member of the House of Lords and there is an overwhelming argument the other way. He must be accountable for his departmental budget, which is more than £3 billion and approaching £4 billion now. He must be accountable to the electorate through this House as every other Minister is. I want to be able to hold the Lord Chancellor to account when a constituent is kept waiting in the courts because a rape case has inconsiderately been listed as a floater. I want to be able to call the Lord Chancellor to account when my local magistrates court is under threat of closure or to raise the thorny issue of anonymity in family court proceedings when legal aid is not available. I cannot do that if he is in the Lords: I should be able to do so. I have great respect for my hon. Friend the Minister, but the proper situation is that the Minister in charge should be in this House and a more junior Minister in the Lords.

Mr. Beith: May I suggest that the hon. Lady seek membership of the Constitutional Affairs Committee, which is currently discussing several of the issues she raises? She would then have the opportunity to question the Lord Chancellor on them.

Vera Baird: Sometimes life is simply full of exciting invitations and I shall put that one next to the others. I am grateful for that kind offer.

My last argument is surely the unanswerable reason why the Lord Chancellor should be a Member in this House. The Tory proposal, as well as being impossible, is crazy. It is crazy to suggest that we should legislate to ensure that a Minister cannot be a Member of the House of Commons. It defies all sense. I might add that the Judges Council sees no reason why the Lord Chancellor should be a Member in the Lords rather than in this place. The judges are the very people who might feel undermined if it were necessary to have a Lord Chancellor in the Lords as a guarantee of their independence, so no one else has a leg to stand on in making that argument.

It is not necessary to provide that the Lord Chancellor should be a lawyer. One guesses that the next few post holders are likely to be so: it is a huge step to take. However, the composition of the job will change hugely. The equivalent of the Lord Chancellor in the Scottish Executive is not a lawyer, but she is doing the job very well. Of course, it is important to have close relationships between the Lord Chancellor and the senior judiciary, so that the Secretary of State can be well informed by them, but with that help he or she would assimilate the job in the same way—the example has already been used by my hon. Friend the Minister—as the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (David Davis) has assimilated all the intricacies of the Serious Organised Crime and Police Bill. He is not a lawyer, but he has managed that. My hon. Friend the Minister frequently shows his sophisticated grasp of complicated legal issues, but he is not a lawyer. One has to work hard, but it can be done. I do not buy the notion that the law is so arcane that no one but a lawyer can ever understand the Department, let alone be able to defend it in Cabinet.

The Law Society has said, and I agree, that requiring that the post holder should be a lawyer could create the perception that the Secretary of State's primary purpose was to protect lawyers, judges and legal interests, rather than the public interest. Lawyers are rarely seen as the voice of the people.

The Tories would require that the post holder should be a lawyer, and a particular kind of lawyer. He should have held high judicial office for two years, which I think means he should have been a High Court judge or more, or should have had at least 12 years' experience under section 91 of the Court and Legal Services Act 1990, which I think means he has to be a High Court advocate. That would restrict the pool of candidates for Lord Chancellor considerably. In any case, that pool is occupied by those chosen from the uniform elite whom we hope will be widened by the advent of the judicial appointments commission. To suggest that even as we try to open up the pool to academics, solicitors and the lower judiciary, we should preserve the top man's job for that little phalanx of people who already have higher court advocacy certificates is breathtakingly to miss the point. It simply does not take on board the urgent need for modernisation. I oppose totally both of those proposals and hope that the Government will see them off straight away.

I am pleased that most people now welcome the changes to the judicial appointment process. Such measures are not new. In 1972, a justice committee recommended changes. In 1992, I was privileged to serve on another justice committee, chaired by the eminent Professor Robert Stevens, which recommended change. It is 14 years since Lord Rawlinson proposed in the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990 that there should be change, so the idea is not at all new.

It is wholly inappropriate for a member of the Executive to continue to be responsible for selecting members of the judiciary. That is the real threat to judicial independence. Yes, people have behaved well, but shot through debates on the subject, both here and in the other place, have been comments that individual Lord Chancellors made characteristic appointments. Lord Mackay, it is frequently said, showed his independence of judgment by appointing Stephen Sedley to the High Court bench—a significant left-wing figure. Lord Elwyn-Jones appointed Sir Morris Finer to the High Court bench but did not appoint Lord Donaldson to be Master of the Rolls because in the 1970s national industrial relations court he fell foul of the then Labour Government.

The appointments are made by a party politician, whether he is in the Commons or the Lords, and some of them are good. The independence shown by some of our Lord Chancellors has been good but some of them are bad, and the basis of making those appointments will not do. An individual can make a good or a bad appointment and it is individual instinct to try to be fair or to stick resolutely to political patronage, but the way in which it is being done is unacceptable. Judicial appointments at all levels must be made on merit, on a transparent, fair, efficient and independent recruitment process that draws appointees on merit from the broadest possible field of candidates.

Modern recruitment procedures must be at the forefront, as must be modern recruiters. Of course, the judiciary must be heavily involved, but only within the modern framework of objectivity and neutrality. The judiciary must not dominate the process because it is the homogenous elite that has run the system for so long. It is no joke to say that there has been positive discrimination in favour of public schoolboys and Oxford graduates since appointments began.

I cringe and worry when people talk about the dangers of positive discrimination, as though we had started from some perfect position where people are selected only on merit. The opposite is true. I am not saying that appointments have been universally bad—not a bit of it. Most of them have been very good, but they have been confined to one class, which has repeated and repeated and repeated itself by selecting those who resemble it. That is not good enough for a modern and diverse state.

There have not been many serious mistakes. The calibre of the judiciary is generally extremely high—at least in the High Court. There have been mistakes; there have been people who were not up to the job intellectually. There have been people, too, who have no respect for the public who come before them, who think that it is their prerogative to sit in court and demonstrate how clever they are. They do not understand hardship because of their privileged background and demonstrate their cleverness by speaking in an arcane way, to the dismay and misery of people whose future depends on their decisions. Those are bad appointments not because those people are necessarily poor intellectually, but because of those characteristics. Some of those bad appointments would not have slipped through in a proper rigorous procedure.

Mr. Grieve: As I have said on previous occasions, I worry far more about the quality of appointments to the Crown court bench than to the High Court and above. The irony is that at present those appointments have, on the face of it, little or no political input and are likely to have little political input, because they are carried out within the Department. Certainly if the situation is improved by a judicial appointments commission, I shall be delighted. There may be more criticism of those appointments than higher up the hierarchy.

Vera Baird: There is certainly a qualitative difference between some of the people appointed to the Crown court bench and the usually very good people who are appointed to the High Court. None the less, when we talk about the calibre of appointees, we tend to mean intellectual capacity. Of course that is hugely important, but so, too, is being considerate to the public and having the understanding necessary to explain at the highest levels of our court system in plain English what one is discussing and, when addressing someone's counsel, trying to speak not in code, legalese or Latin, but in a way that the people who are paying for it and are entitled to it can understand. Having an understanding of that aspect of the judiciary job is not as universally available as good intellectual calibre, yet it is certainly a key skill. There have been some notable failures of that kind, while some potentially good appointments have stalled through the prejudice implicit in the current appointments system.

The right hon. Member for Suffolk, Coastal says that nothing in the Bill is urgent. I ask him to reconsider. Senior appointments—High Court and above—tend to come from QCs. I want to tell the right hon. Gentleman some of the things that Sir Colin Campbell and his commissioners unearthed in the process for appointing QCs. There are what we call secret soundings that are now not so secret; Sir Colin Campbell can get hold of them. Indeed, people who have been refused appointment to silk—a necessary gateway to achieving higher judicial appointment—can ask for feedback on what has been said about them.

What about the woman who found that a factor sufficient to merit inclusion in the feedback she was given was that one of the higher judiciary had referred to her having poor dress sense? Is that a qualification for becoming a QC? Another woman was told that she had done something lamentable in court. In the feedback interview, she said that she had not done it and that the claim was not true. The response was, "Well, gossip creeps in sometimes." That is not very satisfactory.

A woman was told that an affair that she had had 10 years before was still talked about by the judiciary and that she would not be welcome. They should not have been talking about the affair in the first place, but to talk about it 10 years later and to hold it against her as a reason for not appointing her was utterly absurd. Indeed, it is invidious. In the secret soundings, someone's marital status was said to be a problem—Sir Colin Campbell is discreet about exactly what that was. Someone else was described by a judge as not a leader of the profession, so they should not be appointed. What on earth does that mean? What we think of as a leader may not be what someone else thinks. If one does not obtain silk, one cannot get on to the High Court bench. Even if one manages to get through the gateway of discrimination once, one has to face it again from the same people next time around.

Mr. Garnier: I am sure that those examples are interesting. Such cases are bad and ought not to have happened. We can all agree about that, but clearly such cases are not in the majority, bad as they are individually. I am concerned about the future. By and large, we agree that the judicial appointments commission is a good thing, although we need to worry about the detail. Can the hon. and learned Lady move away from the points that she was making about previous mistakes or bad policies and urge us to support the Bill in relation to the question of the Lord Chancellor or the supreme court? I fully sympathise with her concerns, but they will not help us to be persuaded about the overall merits of the Bill.

Vera Baird: I shudder at the utter complacency of that intervention, which suggests that those atrocities of injustice do not merit being dwelt on and that one should hurry up and get on with something else. I know that the hon. and learned Gentleman comes from a party that does not welcome women to its higher roles, but it is really time that the Conservatives appreciated the need to come into the modern era and to understand that if they—like this system—sanction discrimination against women, not many women will vote for them.

When such things are known about how the process works, it is not surprising that many people hide their merits under a bushel. It is pretty well known that it is much harder for women, and certainly much harder for people from ethnic minorities, to get into the judiciary. Surely, it is obvious that the wider the pool of qualified people, the better is the calibre of the appointees.

I have heard it argued, too—in fact, I am vaguely surprised that the hon. and learned Member for Harborough (Mr. Garnier) has not said it—that women have only fairly recently come to the Bar, so we cannot expect many of them to have filtered through to the top. That is certainly the Tory argument in the Lords to try to justify what occurs because of the discrimination to which I have referred. Women have been allowed at the Bar since 1922, so someone with 70 years' call could be present at the Bar at the moment.

[Vera Baird]

In 1992, when I was on the committee for justice, there were disproportionately too few women in high office for the number of women who had 15 to 20 years' call at the Bar then, and we are now 12 years on. So that is not an argument either—sheer discrimination is the argument, and I make no bones about saying that. I know senior people at the Bar who are black, who are female and who are gay who are better in many ways than some of the people who are currently on the bench, but they have not been put on to the bench. That is bound to be so, as long as there is discrimination.

I applaud the introduction of a system that has every hope of finding the means of fairer selection, to draw from the array of diverse talent that is available and increase the calibre of our already respected judiciary. That is the last point that I want to make about the urgency of the judicial appointments commission, given what has been said by the Opposition. Our judiciary is very good, but we must make it better and this is how we can do so. At last, we might start to have selection for the judiciary on merit.

I strongly support the Government's decision to establish a supreme court separate from the legislature and in place of the Appellate Committee of the House of Lords. It is undesirable for members of the highest court in the land to serve as members of the legislature. The Joint Committee on Human Rights said that the creation of the new supreme court and the disqualification of judges from sitting in Parliament makes it less likely that violations of the European convention will occur in practice. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) is right to say that there is controversy in legal circles about whether there is any problem under the convention, but surely the Committee is right to suggest that such violations would be less likely.

Professor Jeffrey Jowell has said that the EU would not now accept for admission a nation that had its senior judges in its legislature. It is a marker of how far out of step we are with international thinking that we have allowed that obvious anomaly to linger so long. No Commonwealth country has adopted that curious structure, although many base their legal systems on ours. Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa do not have working judges in their legislatures. The hon. and learned Member for Harborough referred to that aspect of the Bill as intellectual guff, suggesting that we should stand our individualistic ground and not be pulled into some sort of cheap version of a constitution by trying to resemble other people.

Mr. Garnier rose—

Vera Baird: Of course I will give the hon. and learned Gentleman a chance.

Mr. Garnier: I thank the hon. and learned Lady for politely giving way. I am prepared to withstand her insults; I am prepared to withstand her arguments; but I am not prepared to accept her utter failure to understand that what I was talking about in relation to intellectual guff were the arguments proposed by the hon. Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush (Mr. Soley), who is no longer here. The hon. and learned Lady may make her arguments if she wishes, but will she please base them on what I said, not on what she thinks I said or on what she likes to assume all Tories, Conservatives or men say. It would have made for a better argument if she had listened to what I said, rather to what she thinks I said.

Vera Baird: The hon. and learned Gentleman must grow up or get out of the kitchen. He said that moving towards other constitutions by removing the judiciary from the legislature, as proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush (Mr. Soley), was intellectual guff. I do not mind learning from Canada, Australia, South Africa or any other Commonwealth jurisdiction. The hon. and learned Gentleman really must learn to control his words.

The supreme court is a very good and important development. The ending of the system whereby members of the senior judiciary have seats in the Lords requires the establishment of an effective channel of communication between the judiciary and the legislature. There may well be times when the legislature wants directly to benefit from the experience and expertise of the judiciary.

I support clause 6, which will enable the chief justice or his equivalent in Scotland and Northern Ireland to lay written representations before Parliament, and a parliamentary Committee through which the judiciary can maintain a dialogue with Parliament might also be appropriate. The Constitutional Affairs Committee has furthered such relationships. Its Chairman, the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), enjoys good relationships with members of the judiciary, who feel free to give evidence and make their views felt. I do not regard that as a problem, but it necessary to ensure that those channels exist now that the Law Lords will disappear. That change is good constitutionally, and good, rational channels of communication can be set up.

There are also practical reasons for such a change. First, as the senior Law Lord has said, it makes the position much clearer, particularly for the public who find it difficult to understand and can muddle the role of the House of Lords as part of the legislature and as a court. Let us consider the Hunting Act 2004 for a moment. Deciding whether the Parliament Act 1949, by which the Act was passed, is lawful will ultimately be decided by the House of Lords. Do people understand that that judgment will be made by people who could have voted against the Hunting Bill in the first place because they technically remain members of the House of Lords? Let us consider how undesirable and confused that position is.

Let me give two practical bits of evidence to show why the change is important. All the lawyers present and many others will know about the doctrine in Pepper v. Hart, which allows the courts to look at Hansard to understand the purpose of any legislation if it is ambiguous. I was involved in a House of Lords case in which a colleague and I were trying to persuade the House of Lords to consider Pepper v. Hart, but after suitable argument the House of Lords declined to do so. Those involved did not want to be influenced in their interpretation by what appeared in Hansard, but three of them were there when it was said, taking on the role of helping to sculpt the legislation, so presumably they were taking it seriously. Does that not make a pretty powerful point?

In a further House of Lords case in which I was involved the then senior Law Lord came in after the luncheon adjournment and said that he had to make it clear that he had been lobbied on how he should vote on a part of a certain Bill. Just before lunch, I was taking their lordships through that Bill to try to make a point that the legislative thinking in the Act in force must have been A because the new Bill was carrying on that line. He was considering a Bill as a guide to interpreting another Act, while being lobbied politically to vote against it. That is an extraordinarily complicated and tortuous position for anyone to be in. Of course, the Law Lords can set aside what they hear in one role and compartmentalise their thinking—frankly, there are such good people in the House of Lords—but there is a danger that they can over-compensate for having heard what they feel they should not have heard.

It is an extraordinarily unhappy situation in a whole variety of ways. I agree thoroughly with the senior Law Lord, Lord Bingham, that a modern, clear and quite separate supreme court is very important. About half the Law Lords feel unhappy to be in the Lords now. They think that it is an inappropriate location and they will not speak at all in debates. They therefore play no useful role.

The House of Lords is an excellent judicial tribunal. It shows every sign of wanting to get to the right result. It does not, as many other courts do, merely play and argue with counsel; it argues among itself and is truly intellectually stimulated by an argument. This court can play a great role in our democracy whether it agrees with the Government or, as it has done recently, disagrees with them. It should be freed and clearly seen to be having that role, with due standing, its own building and due respect for its calibre being judged on the merits.

I support Lord Bingham, Dame Brenda Hale and Lord Steyn who are in favour of the supreme court. I support Lord Woolf, who in evidence to the Select Committee about the Lord Chancellor as now configured, said:

> "I see no difficulty with a Government Minister exercising any of the functions assigned to the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs by the concordat. I do not consider that such a Minister requires any enhanced status or any particular title to enable him to exercise these functions."

I agree with most of the people who have expressed support for the judicial appointments commission. This Bill was rightly described by the Lord Chief Justice in the other place as a > "piece of great reforming legislation",

I agree with him that

> "it will rank in importance with the great constitutional instruments of the past".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 7 December 2004; Vol. 667, c. 759.]

7.51 pm

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham) (Con): I sympathise with the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird). Her voice is clearly failing her, and I sympathise, not least because I am in a similar position. I am rather glad that this is not one of those occasions—at least, I fancy not—when I shall have to shout down hon. Members, on either side of the House.

There are clearly aspects of the Bill that can properly be supported. It would be rather surprising if that were not the case. It is not, in fact, the Bill that the Government first introduced in the other place. Indeed, I think that some 400 amendments were made there. I can therefore say that within this Bill, there are substantial aspects with which we can associate ourselves.

The reasoned amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) seems to encapsulate the criticism of the Bill remarkably well. It was echoed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal (Mr. Gummer). I happen to think that the Bill is largely unnecessary; it is most certainly bureaucratic and expensive.

I want to say something about the Lord Chancellor, something about the supreme court, something about the establishment of the judicial appointments commission and, briefly—Mr. Speaker made it plain that we could do this—something about the timetable motion.

I do not know whether I have to declare an interest in that both my father and grandfather were Lord Chancellors. I certainly accept that the role of the Lord Chancellor has changed and is bound to change to take account of the change in circumstances. The role and office cannot be frozen in aspic. There have, in fact, been huge changes since my grandfather first came to this House in the 1920s and shortly afterwards went to the Lords as Lord Chancellor. I suppose that the most important change has been the desire for much greater openness than was then the case. Moreover—I think that this was important for the role of the Lord Chancellor in connection with appointments—there were far fewer judicial appointments in those days. I think that in my grandfather's day the King's bench division had 12 members; it has nearer 100 now. It is also true that in those days, the Lord Chancellor knew, or had access to those who knew, most of the people who were likely to be applicants for judicial office.

The legal profession is now not very well represented in this place or in the other place. There are not many practising barristers in the House, and most of those who practise—I am one such—practise largely at the criminal Bar. It is therefore increasingly difficult for Governments to find either Attorneys-General or Lord Chancellors who can be appointed from Members who have served in this place. However, I happen to think that there are substantial advantages in having as one's Lord Chancellor or Attorney-General someone who has served in this place.

I certainly accept that a number of the roles of the Lord Chancellor must change. I shall come to the judicial appointments commission, but I do not think that the Lord Chancellor should be responsible for appointments to judicial office. It would be a serious mistake, as a general proposition, for Lord Chancellors to sit judicially, although it is true that my father sat judicially on a number of occasions, and attached a very high importance to that role. He was probably wrong, but his judgments were, on the whole, rather good ones.

That point does not address the role of the Lord Chancellor. That role is extremely important because over 10 years—in fact, more than that—there has been a whole flood of Home Office-driven legislation that has had a great impact on the rights and liberties of the citizen. I do not want to go over disputed ground about the previous Home Secretary. I regarded him, and I said so many times in this place, as a deeply illiberal Home Secretary. Much of the Home Office legislation that we are currently contemplating, and that we have contemplated in the lifetime of this Parliament, has been deeply illiberal and deeply authoritarian. I have opposed it and I deplore it—including, incidentally, the Identity Cards Bill, on which I had the misfortune to disagree with my own party's line.

It is of critical importance that within the Government, there should be another source of influence and authority to set against the policies of the Home Office. If I ask myself where that person can be found, the answer is that he or she has to be found within the office of the Lord Chancellor. I cannot easily identify any other source of comparable influence and power. It is important therefore that the person who carries out the functions of the Lord Chancellor should have as much status as we can give him or her, and as much independence as well.

I understand the argument of the hon. and learned Member for Redcar and of the hon. Lady for Stafford.

Mr. Kidney: Hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Hogg: I am sorry—the hon. Gentleman.

I understand the argument to the effect that it is a good thing for senior Secretaries of State to be in this place. In principle, I agree with that. However, I ask myself a different question: what is the likely relationship between the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs sitting in this House and the Home Secretary? The truth is that the Home Secretary will always prevail.

When I look back, however, on the Lord Chancellors whom I have known or have been faintly acquainted with during my political life, who sat in another place, that has not been the case. On the Labour side, there were Lord Gardiner, Lord Elwyn-Jones and, of course, the previous occupant, Lord Irvine of Lairg. On the Conservative side—just to cite a few—there were Lord Kilmuir, Lord Dilhorne, Lord Mackay and, of course, my father. All these were people of a very considerable authority, which they could set against the power of the Home Secretary. Most of the debates—this goes to the question of accountability—occur within the Government, not on the Floor of either Chamber.

My worry is that if we insist on the purist doctrine that Secretaries of State should sit in this House, we could be dealing with a Minister on the make—to adopt the phrase used by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield. There are huge advantages to there being a requirement for the Lord Chancellor to be a lawyer and a Member of the other place who is at the end of his or her political or judicial life, because he or she will thus have nothing to gain and nothing to fear.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Is there not rather more to this than my right hon. and learned Friend suggests? There is not only the question of duelling with the Home Secretary when necessary; the Lord Chancellor is someone who can stand up to the Prime Minister, which is the most important thing of all.

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Not one of the Lord Chancellors whom I cited would have been described as a cheerful chappie. We do not want Lord Chancellors who are cheerful chappies, but people who bring real authority, pre-eminence and distinction to the role, because only in that way can an overbearing Home Secretary be faced down.

I hope that the House, in its Committee form, will insist that the Lord Chancellor be a lawyer, that the role of the Secretary of State for Constitutional Affairs should always be designated as one that the Lord Chancellor should perform, and that the Lord Chancellor should be a Member of the other place, so that he or she will by then be beyond fear or favour. We need to make every attempt to reinforce the status of the Lord Chancellor.

Like so much done by the Government, the words "supreme court" mislead. The title suggests a genuine separation of powers, and in particular, although this is not stated, the power to strike down primary legislation. As a general proposition—we will see what happens during the challenge to the Hunting Act 2004—the supreme court will not have the power to strike down primary legislation. In truth, the supreme court as described in the Bill will largely be the Judicial Committee as it now sits, but sitting in a different, more expensive place and underpinned by an extremely expensive infrastructure. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal implied, if it is not broke, why seek to mend it? There is no overwhelming requirement for change, so I would not change the structure.

I regret the prohibition on members of the supreme court from speaking in the other place, although I am assuming that we will not have a wholly reformed other place. I hesitate to say this in the presence of my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack), but I am in favour of a wholly or largely elected second chamber.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Very unsound.

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend thinks that my point is unsound, but he and I have always disagreed about that.

Within the parameters of the other place as it now is, I want members of the supreme court to be able to speak. I appreciate that Lord Bingham has constrained the circumstances in which such people should speak, and that there is a division of opinion about that. It is certainly the case that the Law Lords should be careful not to express themselves in a partisan manner. They must always express themselves temperately and bear in mind the fact that they might have to adjudicate on matters that are discussed in the other place.

Of all those in this House or in the other place with judicial experience, the Law Lords have the most current expertise across the broad spectrum of legal issues that Parliament must discuss, ranging from the complex commercial questions to more humdrum issues of family or criminal law. They have knowledge of great constitutional issues, such as the impact of the European convention on human rights on the way in which the courts operate. The truth is that the Law Lords have greater current expertise than anyone else, because as I have already said, most hon. Members who are practising barristers or solicitors practise at the criminal Bar. Although there are competent barristers in the other place, they tend to have rather specialised practices. For example, Lord Grabiner, for whom I have high regard, has a specialised commercial practice. Of course if we rely on ex-Law Lords, we are dealing with individuals with experience that is not quite as current as one might wish. I greatly regret the prohibition on justices of the supreme court from speaking in the other place, and I hope that the House, in its Committee form, will reconsider that.

I turn to the judicial appointments commission. The role of appointment should not be performed by the Lord Chancellor or his officials, although I accept that there was a jolly good case for that in the days when the Lord Chancellor knew most of the applicants, or could at least have a private word with the heads of division who did. However, those days have gone and one cannot hark back to them. I agree with the principle of the judicial appointments commission. It is undesirable for the Lord Chancellor's officials to perform the functions that were historically performed by the Lord Chancellor, because they are not well placed to determine the merits of a, b or c. However, we have chosen one of the most remarkably bureaucratic and complicated ways of making appointments that I have ever read. There is a powerful case for depriving the Minister—or Lord Chancellor—of any residual power and giving the power exclusively to the commission, but that is a matter for debate.

I have two real worries about the role of the ombudsman. I doubt whether people who are dissatisfied with the decisions of the judicial appointments commission should have the right to apply to an ombudsman for remedy. I remark in passing that Back Benchers with desires that remain unfulfilled, or Ministers who are disgruntled because they have been passed over or sacked—I am casting no personal aspersions about any hon. Member in the Chamber—do not have the right to appeal to an ombudsman.

Let us consider what is being suggested. If people were to make a complaint about process, I wonder whether the cost and inconvenience of the ombudsman would be proportionate. Indeed, the matter could probably be raised with the parliamentary ombudsman as is. Is it suggested that the ombudsman should be able to express a view on the merits of an appointment? At that point one enters a difficult area, because when one makes appointments of any kind, one's judgment is often subjective. One might have real doubts about a person's integrity, competence, good manners or judicial temperament. It might be difficult to make such subjective judgments stand up evidentially, but they may none the less be real and well founded. I fear that if we set up a process that allows people to challenge the merits of judicial appointment, we will find ourselves landed with many appointees who should not be appointed, because the commission will play for safety and rely only on reasons that can be evidenced.

The question of merit and diversity is related to that matter, and although it is a small point, it causes me considerable concern. I entirely endorse a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield: merit should be the only criterion for appointments. By all means let us enlarge the pool as much as possible. I agree that it has been artificially constrained for many years. We should have a wide pool, but by goodness, let us stick to the criterion of merit and no other. The power that the Bill gives the Minister, or Lord Chancellor, to give guidance—for example as to diversity—could be misused.

As to disciplinary functions, this is an enabling Bill. It enables the Minister, or Lord Chancellor, to set out processes for disciplining members of the judiciary. Again I preach caution; we need to look at this more closely in Committee. It is perfectly true—the hon. and learned Member for Redcar knows this as well as I do—that historically there have been some pretty eccentric folk on the bench. In my professional lifetime I have known some, and even since I went back to the Bar in 1997 I have come across one or two very odd figures who probably should not be there. I hope that the judicial appointments commission will prevent that from happening. In any event, peer pressure and the word from the senior judiciary can be brought to bear.

I would, however, be very sorry if a disciplinary process curbed the independence of the judiciary. The hon. and learned Lady adduced from one Minister—I forget which one—the fact that each year there are between 1,000 and 1,200 complaints about the judiciary. We all know from our constituency experience that litigants, whether male or female, are frequently dissatisfied by the result. Very often they express their dissatisfaction by saying, "It was unfair," or, "He"—or she—"behaved badly. It was judicial misconduct." I do not want to see the judiciary cowed in any way. We look to it, in part at least, to defend the citizen against the over-mighty Government. Let us then be cautious about the disciplinary process.

I turn briefly to the timetable. Mr. Speaker was good enough to say that we could speak about it, provided that we did not go on too long—and my hon. Friend the Member for Aldridge-Brownhills (Mr. Shepherd) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Coastal have made the points that I would have made. This is a very important Bill. On the Floor of the House, where these things are traditionally discussed, we will be able to discuss only fragments of the Bill, and those fragments have been selected for us not by discussion between Front-Bench Members, but by the proposal of Ministers.

I acquit the Under-Secretary of State of responsibility. I suppose that he did not know; it was not his decision. [Interruption.] No, I see, it was not his decision. I do not blame him; he is only an Under-Secretary. However, it is not right. If the proceedings were to be timetabled, there ought to have been discussion between Front-Bench Members of all the major parties and the minority parties. The House is being impoverished by the process. Not only that, but democracy itself is being impoverished. I hope that the House will rally, and vote, against the timetable motion.

8.13 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed) (LD): I am not sure that today's debate is a very good example of the stewardship of time. I like to think that we could have more time for these proceedings on the Floor of the House, but with discipline in how efficiently we used it to ensure that a number of important detailed points are considered.

I want mainly to refer to what the Constitutional Affairs Committee has said and done on the matter, and the extent to which our concerns have so far been met. As several hon. Members have said, the problems go back to the way that the matter was introduced, as a back-of-the-envelope decision in a reshuffle. When one is reshuffling one's Ministers, one does not call them in a fortnight before and say, "I'm planning to do this. What do you think? Will you get your officials to do me a paper about it?" The previous Lord Chancellor was no doubt told at 3 o'clock in the afternoon that his services were no longer required and that his advice on the proposals or that of his officials was not needed.

That is a hopeless way to embark on constitutional reform and it was particularly galling for those of us who broadly support the measures that the Government want to take. They managed to convey the impression that the proposals were designed to weaken and politicise the judiciary, which is precisely the reverse of the intention and, I hope, of the effect. The way that the matter was introduced made it much more difficult to argue for the reforms in principle and then get the detail right.

The problems that the Bill is designed to solve are primarily ones of principle and perception, not of practice, except in judicial appointments, to which several references have been made. I welcome the agreement that has now emerged on the necessity for a form of judicial appointments commission. Even in that case, no one is arguing that the most senior judicial appointments in recent years have been other than very good, or that the quality of our judiciary is not envied around the world, but we can still make improvements and there are certainly people who are excluded from the judiciary.

That was the main motivation for changing the system in Scotland, which took on a judicial appointments committee under the guidance of my friend and former parliamentary colleague, the Deputy First Minister, then the Justice Minister, Jim Wallace. That was partly because there was a feeling in many parts of the Scottish legal system that people were overlooked for judicial appointments because they were not part of the Edinburgh mafia, as it tends to be called, and partly because Scotland had a more recent history of political appointments to the judiciary than England and Wales. When we examined the system in an earlier report, we found that it was working reasonably well and were hopeful that an appointments commission, admittedly on the much larger scale required for England and Wales, would be of real benefit.

When the reforms were announced, the Select Committee set about working and reporting on them, building on the work that we had already done on the judicial appointments commission. Most of the Committee's recommendations have been taken up by the Government, some willingly, some reluctantly in response to further pressure in the Lords and some on the basis of defeats in the Lords, a number of which the Government do not propose to reverse. Some of what we were saying was bolstered by the concordat between the Lord Chief Justice and the Lord Chancellor, which the hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) said was a successful piece of negotiation. Indeed, it has been referred to with a degree of envy by the Lords Chief Justice of several other countries as an impressive example of how to play one's cards effectively. The Lord Chief Justice did us all a service by getting certain things firmly clarified and accepted on all sides.

Among the things that we said was that the Bill is so important that it should be introduced as draft legislation and given proper consideration. The Government rejected that, but the objective was achieved by the decision of the House of Lords to set up a Select Committee and the decision alongside that, by all parties, to allow the Bill to be carried over into this Session. If that had not happened, it would have been rushed through, if the Lords had agreed at all, in the previous Session, and that would have been bad news. I have to say that I disagreed with my Front-Bench colleagues on that. In their determination to support the proposals, they felt unhappy about supporting the motion to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. The end result of the process is that the Bill has had much better consideration and can still be introduced within a reasonable time.

Another recommendation that we made related to the fact that the court is partly a United Kingdom court and partly the final appeal court in the separate jurisdictions of Scotland and Northern Ireland. None of that had been thought through when the proposals were first produced. I do not think that a moment's consideration had been given to that. We asked many questions and produced a lot of detailed information, and, to be fair to them, the Government responded fully, made significant amendments to the Bill and clarified a number of matters crucial to Scotland and significant also in Northern Ireland.

We also argued not only that supreme court judges should not be in the Lords—that is certainly my view—but that if there was any prospect of retired judges being appointed to the House of Lords while it continues in its present form, either all of them should be so appointed, or none of them. There should be no question of the Government picking those supreme court judges that they liked for preferment to the House of Lords. That would be undesirable and the Government accepted our view on that, too.

We stressed heavily the importance of the court's independence, including its financial independence. We felt that its financial and operational independence needed to be guaranteed and that its budget needed to be secure. We looked at examples, and at Australia in particular, to see how that could be done. To a large extent, that has been accepted. The Department for Constitutional Affairs is still involved, but the chief executive will be an accounting officer in his own right and several detailed improvements have gone some way to meet the Committee's recommendations.

We also felt strongly that the court should not operate until it had its own premises. The problem of perception could not be dealt with by having roughly the same people sitting in the same building—the House of Lords—being served by the same staff, and by saying that some new supreme court had been created. We therefore welcome the fact that the Government accepted that the court needs its own building before it can start work properly. My view was that, if everything else could be settled, Middlesex Guildhall was the right place. I disagreed with Lord Bingham on that, but he is getting much of what he wants anyway, so we can reasonable argue with him on the merits of which building to use.

The Committee felt that the Lord Chief Justice should be primarily responsible for discipline and that that should not be a role for the new-style Lord Chancellor or whatever kind of Minister was to come. That, too, has largely been accepted and to a significant extent was sorted out in the concordat.

We strongly recommended an appointments commission, but even we did not anticipate how many versions of judicial appointment would emerge at the end of the process. Effectively, we have a three-tier process—an appointments system for the supreme court, an appointments system for the higher judiciary and an appointments system for all the lower ranks of the judiciary. For the first two, judges are very prominent indeed. Again, the Lord Chief Justice's negotiating skills played a significant part. That will have met, to a degree, the concern of the majority of my Committee that the commission should be chaired by a judge—not a view that I shared. It is a rare occasion on which my view is defeated by a Committee that I chair and a situation that I try at all times to avoid.

The Committee expressed some strong views on the role of Lord Chancellor. We said that part of that role "is the protection of the judiciary from political pressure in Cabinet and, when necessary, in public."

The previous Lord Chancellor was prepared to act in such a way, and did so on one occasion in front of the Committee. In paragraph 13 of the report, we said:

"There is a radical difference between on the one hand a Lord Chancellor, who as a judge is bound by a judicial oath, who has a special constitutional importance enjoyed by no other member of the Cabinet and who is usually at the end of his career (and thus without temptations associated with possible advancement) and on the other hand a minister who is a full-time politician, who is not bound by any judicial oath and who may be a middle-ranking or junior member of the Cabinet with hopes of future promotion."

The Minister smiles—whether he sees himself in that position in future, I do not know.

The Committee felt strongly that such independence was important and we were regularly confirmed in our views by outbursts from Ministers that seemed to some of us to be somewhat threatening towards the judiciary. There was a classic example of that from the previous Home Secretary, who when addressing the Police Federation—a good occasion on which to get a cheer from the gallery—said, "We only want judges who will help us to do our job." That was not a good basis on which to set out the proposals. It further underlined—certainly in my mind—the importance of retaining a Minister who accepted responsibility in Cabinet for sometimes slapping down other Ministers who did not recognise the importance of judicial independence.

We anticipated something that the Government did not anticipate: how important the issue had become. The Government did not seem to think it terribly significant, even as the consultation went on, but it became clear that among members of the judiciary in particular the status of Lord Chancellor was regarded as an important safeguard for their position. We recommended that the office of Lord Chancellor should remain, at least for the time being, in its more restricted form—shorn of judicial appointments and, almost certainly, of responsibility for chairing proceedings in the House of Lords. I welcomed the Government's ultimate acceptance of that when it came by way of amendment in the Lords.

I personally do not think that it is essential that the Lord Chancellor should either be in the House of Lords or be a lawyer, but I am still concerned about how we achieve the Committee's objective of ensuring that the Lord Chancellor is not awaiting further political advancement and has the authority to challenge other Ministers on this most fundamental issue. I can think of many people who could do the job who are neither lawyers nor Members of the House of Lords, so I am not especially attracted by the amendments that their lordships passed as a result, to a large extent, of such motivation. Ministers must think further about the matter, so that we can ensure that the person who holds the office of Lord Chancellor and is responsible for relations with the judiciary has the status, authority and independence that he needs to be able to do that job.

I shall mention one other area that has not attracted much attention. The proposals on ecclesiastical appointments arose out of the original intention to remove the Lord Chancellor altogether. At the end of the day, the Government decided to move the appointments to the Crown, thus allowing them to continue to be made by the same people who are making them at the moment in No. 10 Downing street. That reflected the evidence session that the Committee held on the subject. We did not make any recommendations, but we had an interesting evidence session in which much of the weight of the evidence was to the effect, "Do not disturb this system, it is working very well." Those who wanted to change it could not agree on what to change it to. The argument that the matter should be left in the hands of public servants, who were unusually highly commended in the Committee's proceedings, clearly weighed with the Government.

On a large number of issues, the Committee's work was well justified, because it influenced the course of events. Many of our recommendations have been accepted, either willingly or slightly unwillingly by the Government, and we shall consider what happens in Standing Committee with the hope of reporting to the House prior to Report any further conclusions that we might reach.

8.26 pm

Annabelle Ewing (Perth) (SNP): I preface my comments by saying for the record that, like the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney), I am a non-practising solicitor, albeit of the Scottish variety.

I shall focus my remarks on the detail of part 3, which deals with the proposals for the new so-called United Kingdom supreme court. Much has been said about the way in which the proposals came forth. It is certainly true that their timing was the direct result of the botched reshuffle in June 2003. As the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) said, at the time of the announcement of the creation of a supreme court, it had been forgotten that final appellate civil jurisdiction—appeals in civil matters—still lay with the House of Lords. That fundamental issue had been entirely forgotten down here in Westminster.

There was no prior consultation with the Scottish Parliament and Scottish Ministers, which was a breach of the devolution concordats, which exist to deal, inter alia, with issues such as the important proposed changes to devolved areas of Scots law. At the time of the furore in Scotland when the proposals were first announced, the Scottish First Minister was asked his views on the failure on the part of the Prime Minister and the Westminster Parliament to consult him. He said simply that there was "absolutely no reason whatsoever" for the Prime Minister to have consulted him on such a major constitutional change. That says an awful lot about the limited lengths to which Scotland's First Minister will go to stand up for the Scotland's interests, a key aspect of which is the independence of the Scottish legal system.

The substance of the proposals has caused much controversy in Scotland. On the one hand, the proposals represent a missed opportunity to end the 18th-century anomaly whereby final appellate jurisdiction in civil cases lies south of the border, while on the other, serious questions remain about the compatibility of the proposals with the founding constitutional document of the Union between Scotland and England—the 1707 treaty of Union. On the first point—that an opportunity has been missed to repatriate to Scotland final appeals in civil cases—in post-devolution Scotland, where the Scottish Parliament has jurisdiction over both criminal and civil law matters, why is it deemed necessary, desirable or logical that final appeal in civil cases lie south of the border? There has never been a final appeal to the House of Lords in criminal cases in Scotland and it does not seem sensible to continue the anomaly in Scottish civil law. That is especially important when seen in the context of the specific proposals made in the Bill, which states—probably for the first time in statute—that the final judgments of the new supreme court are not to be binding outwith their respective jurisdictions. It has been said that the judgments will enjoy persuasive effect, but if they are not to be binding outwith their respective jurisdictions, why on earth do we need to go to London to have a final appeal heard in a Scottish civil law case? That makes no sense in post-devolution Scotland.

The fact that civil appeals lie with the House of Lords is simply an historical quirk. Now, in 2005, we have the ideal opportunity to end the anomaly and repatriate to Scotland final appellate jurisdiction in civil cases. That view has been echoed by many in Scotland both within and outwith legal circles. Professor Black, the renowned and respected professor of Scots law at Edinburgh university, described the present system of sending final appeals in civil cases to London as "crazy". He added:

> "I've always thought that civil appeals should be decided in Scottish courts . . . A UK supreme court should only be for constitutional issues".

I agree entirely, with the proviso that, when Scotland reclaims her independence, there will be no need for so-called devolution issues to be dealt with by a UK constitutional court—the UK supreme court—which is to take over jurisdiction in such matters from the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. When Scotland reclaims her independence, the writ of the UK supreme court will not run in Scotland.

Mr. Beith: Presumably, the hon. Lady's proposal is for a further tier of appeal in the Scottish system to replace the supreme court.

Annabelle Ewing: Because Scottish law is devolved to the Scottish Parliament, it would be for the Scottish Parliament to decide whether and in what way any appeal in civil matters should lie from the inner house of the Court of Session. I am sure that it is not beyond the Scottish Parliament's wit to come up with a satisfactory solution.

I mentioned concerns about the compatibility of the proposals with the treaty of Union. A post facto consultation process was embarked upon but, in effect, the decisions had already been taken: the consultation was not on whether appeals should lie south of the border, but in what form the appeals should be made, whether there should be an automatic right of appeal or leave given to appeal, and so on. The fundamental issue was not addressed because the Government had already made their decisions. During that consultation, concerns were expressed by senior Scottish Law Lords, including Lord Hope of Craighead. The Faculty of Advocates in Scotland made a detailed submission, which was a devastating critique of the consultation document. I am sure that the Minister is aware of that and that he read it assiduously. However, if the Bill is not to fall foul of the treaty of Union, any appeal in a Scottish case south of the border must be heard in a court that is entirely separate and distinct from the English legal system. Having seen the detail of the proposals on the supreme court in the Bill, I am not satisfied that the requirements in the treaty of Union have been met. Key concerns about the funding arrangements, as well as the administration and operation of the supreme court, were raised by the Faculty of Advocates.

The funding of the supreme court will come out of the overall budget of the Department for Constitutional Affairs. When I asked the Minister about that, he simply said that the DCA was a UK Government Department. That was not the best answer to give, as all Whitehall Departments for the Westminster Parliament are viewed as UK Government Departments, and the DCA has little writ in Scotland, given that it is concerned mostly with the justice system in England and Wales. He therefore did not convincingly rebut my point. As for the administration of the new supreme court, we know from the Bill that its chief executive will be appointed by the successor to the Lord Chancellor—a DCA Minister—who will retain some functions relating to the workings of the judiciary in England and Wales. It cannot be argued, therefore, that the supreme court is entirely separate and distinct in all aspects from the English legal system, which raises serious questions about whether the Bill's proposals for a UK supreme court are compatible with the founding constitutional document that thirls Scotland to control from London.

In conclusion, we have heard much tonight about the separation of powers which, for the record, I favour. I also favour a written constitution and a Bill of Rights.

However, the key provisions of the Constitutional Reform Bill on the UK supreme court are unacceptable to my party not only because they represent a missed opportunity to end an 18th-century anomaly and repatriate final appellate jurisdiction in civil cases to Scotland but, given that they provide for a system that is not entirely separate and distinct from the English legal system, because they impinge on the integrity of Scots law. I was elected to Westminster to stand up for the interests of my country and, as a result, I cannot vote for a Bill that will do down the integrity of the legal system of Scotland.

8.38 pm

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire) (Con): I am sure that the hon. Member for Perth (Annabelle Ewing) will forgive me if I do not follow her Scottish remarks in detail. Her speech and that of the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) were extremely fine, as they were of an exemplary length, and I shall try to emulate that.

I begin with an apology to the House and an expression of regret. I apologise for missing some speeches. As you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am a member of the House of Commons Commission, and I had to attend an important meeting with Mr. Speaker. I was therefore undertaking House business, so I hope that colleagues will understand why I missed one or two speeches. I regret the fact that few Members are present in the Chamber to debate an issue of such extraordinary importance. It is particularly regrettable that the Government have run out of speakers.

Those of us who care about the Chamber—the forum and cockpit of the nation—will have to address this issue extremely carefully. What we need in the new Parliament—I suppose, as most of us do, that the present Parliament is nearly at its end—is a real determination to have the Chamber populated for major debates. When I first entered the House, and for many years afterwards, any major debate, especially a major constitutional debate, would have seen the Benches if not packed, at least respectably full throughout.

The Bill began in a most unfortunate way, as many right hon. and hon. Members have said. It was classic back-of-the-envelope stuff. A major constitutional reform of this nature should have been preceded by a White Paper, and preferably by a Green Paper before that. There should have been a draft Bill for both Houses to consider in detail. The proposals should have been clear, coherent and deliverable. What happened in the wake of that extraordinary reshuffle a couple of years ago did none of those things. So we were left, especially in the House of Lords, with a dog's breakfast.

We all owe an enormous debt of gratitude to the other place for the way in which it has tackled the Bill. It went through its own special procedures and it has now produced something for us that is, to a degree, coherent. We owe also a particular debt of gratitude to the Lord Chief Justice. The hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) has cited him on a number of occasions. I do not think that his enthusiasm was necessarily quite as great as she said, but he has behaved in an impeccably constitutional manner. Like the famous Irishman in the story, he would not have started there. However, confronted with what was a potential constitutional crisis he brought to bear his patience, his wisdom, his determination and his eloquence. He has played a major part in creating the Bill that is before us. It is very much a curate's egg of a Bill, in that it is good in parts.

Mr. Garnier: Does my hon. Friend accept that one of the reasons why the Lord Chief Justice was able to be so effective in influencing this debate is because he has been able to speak and participate in the House of Lords?

Sir Patrick Cormack: My hon. and learned Friend anticipates my arguments to some degree. Had we not had Law Lords in the House of Lords and had we not had the Lord Chief Justice in that place, goodness knows where we would have been.

I am sorry that the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed has had to leave the Chamber briefly. He gave an admirable exposition of his Committee's views, especially in regard to the office of Lord Chancellor. He slightly distanced himself from those views, but when he said how crucial it was that the Lord Chancellor should be a figure of eminence, somebody who was not in any way influenced by his own political ambition, he described the sort of figure that the Lord Chancellor, as envisaged in the Bill as it stands, would be.

Unlike the hon. and learned Member for Redcar, to whom I listened with great respect—as always, she spoke persuasively and eloquently—I accept the logic of the argument that the Lord Chancellor should be in the House of Lords and should be a lawyer. In particular, he or she should be in the House of Lords. I would be delighted to see a woman Chancellor. We have had a woman Speaker and a woman Prime Minister, so why should we not have a woman Lord Chancellor—somebody who could do that job?

We need someone who is no longer motivated by political ambition and who, as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) said—or my noble Friend—can stand up to the Home Secretary and, as I said in an intervention, stand up to the Prime Minister, as well. Looking back over my years in the House, I can think of a number of Lords Chancellors who did that. I think of my dear friend Lord Elwyn-Jones, for instance, from the other side of the House. I think of the last Conservative Lord Chancellor, Lord Mackay, whose quiet, avuncular wit, but firm authority, enabled him to say things that others perhaps could not say. Of course I also think of the wonderfully rumbustious and very wise Lord Hailsham—and there are others.

If the Government of the day have a large majority, we need someone in the Cabinet who can stand up to the Prime Minister. It was Lord Hailsham who coined the phrase "the elected dictatorship". In whichever part of the House we sit, we must all accept that when a Government have an enormous majority, as the present Government enjoy, they can do pretty well what they want and what the Prime Minister wants. I was critical in supporting Lord Pym, who was sacked for his pains, when he spoke of not wanting too big a majority in 1983. Things began to unravel for the Conservative Government when the overall majority of 140 or so was attained. I believe that many poor and even bad decisions have been made by the present Government mainly because of their huge majority.

[Sir Patrick Cormack]

In such a situation, someone at the Cabinet table who enjoys enormous respect, who is not ambitious, but who has an innate authority and who can speak up, is a great safeguard of many of our constitutional liberties. So yes, I am perfectly happy to see the Lord Chancellor shorn of some of his powers and responsibilities, as the Bill proposes, but I want the Lord Chancellor to be a man or woman of real authority, transparent integrity, wisdom and experience. I accept that it may not be necessary for the Lord Chancellor to be a lawyer, although I would prefer that, but he must have the attributes that I described.

I very much hope that as the Bill goes through the House there will be no attempt to take out those parts of the Lords amendments. I am glad that the office of Lord Chancellor, ancient as it is—it has changed many times over the centuries; it used always to be a bishop—is not be removed from our constitutional history.

Vera Baird: I am following with great interest what the hon. Gentleman is saying and I agree wholeheartedly that the Lord Chancellor needs to be a person of substantial integrity and authority, for the very reasons that the hon. Gentleman set out, but it is difficult to put that in legislation. Why does he think that it a sufficient proxy to say that the Lord Chancellor should be a lawyer and a peer?

Sir Patrick Cormack: I said that I had a slight preference—perhaps it is a prejudice—that the Lord Chancellor should be a lawyer. Why should he be a peer? I address that directly. I am one of those who believe in the House of Lords more or less as it exists. I do not want to see an elected second Chamber. One of the great attributes of a senior peer is that he or she has no fear or favour as regards party considerations. It is important that the Lord Chancellor is somebody who is not dependent upon patronage, who is there—not in the office of Lord Chancellor, of course—for life, and who brings a great deal of experience from previous jobs to the office of Lord Chancellor.

We are speaking in the context of our present parliamentary system. I have made my position plain. Unlike my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham, I do not want to change it. In our present system, it is far better to have the Lord Chancellor in that place than in this place. Most hon. Members who aspire to high office have ambition. Ambition is not always a grievous fault, as Mark Antony satirically had it. Ambition is a decent motivating force, but it is not the best motivating force of a Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Garnier: May I provide another reason and see whether it attracts my hon. Friend? The Lord Chancellor not only has to command the respect of his Cabinet colleagues, particularly the Prime Minister and the Home Secretary, for the reasons given by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg), but in so far as he is the voice of the judiciary in Cabinet and of the legal system, he must also command the respect of those whom he is representing from that constituency. My fear is that a Minister in the Commons, who was seen to be looking at the job as merely a stepping stone to greater things, would not command the respect that would be required of him in the judiciary and the legal profession as a whole. That is open to criticism and to argument, but it is certainly a reason that is worth considering.

Sir Patrick Cormack: It is. My hon. and learned Friend makes an extremely valid point, and it is one with which I find myself in very real sympathy. The Lord Chancellor of the day, even if he is not of the judiciary, should be regarded by it as a peer in every sense; somebody for whom it holds respect; somebody whom it can look up to. I beg the Minister not to close the door when he is talking about those amendments that would require the Lord Chancellor not only to remain as a title, but to be a Minister in the other place—and, frankly, preferably, a lawyer. Even the hon. and learned Member for Redcar, who does not particularly want the holder of the office to be a lawyer, admitted that the next three or four probably would be.

I conclude by referring, as others have, to the manner in which the Government are presenting the Bill to the House. There was quite a little uproar this afternoon, in which I took part, over the Bill's timetabling. I am one of those who do not like the automatic guillotining of Bills, which is what we have when we have a programme motion at the end of every Second Reading. We now have the programme motions without any debate, which was why Mr. Speaker, when I raised the point of order, said that it was entirely permissible to make some of these points on Second Reading. We learned to my horror and, frankly, to my disgust today that there had been no agreement between the three major parties, let alone the minor parties, on how the Bill should be taken.

It is the tradition that constitutional Bills are taken on the Floor of the House, and that is a good tradition, not only because it focuses the nation's attention on this Chamber, but because every Member of this Chamber can come and take part in debates on amendments when it is appropriate to do so. The whole of the Bill should have been taken on the Floor of this House of Commons. However, real insult has been added to parliamentary injury by the way in which the Bill has been carved up, because whatever the Minister's extremely amiable and very patient ministerial colleague might have said this afternoon, and indeed his hon. Friend admitted as much during an intervention earlier this evening, the fact is that it is the Government who have broken off negotiations with other parties and who have decided how the Bill should be divided up and which aspects debated on the Floor and which in Committee.

That is bad. It shows a disdain for and a disregard of Parliament, which is insulting to us all—not just those who sit on the Opposition Benches, but those who sit on the Government Benches as well. Although there are not many of them here tonight, there is one who knows what it is like to sit on the Opposition Benches. If we have any length of time in this place, we all learn what it is like to sit on the Opposition Benches. Parliament itself, holding the Executive to account as it must, must be allowed the leeway to do so by the way in which legislation is considered.

In the beginning, I said that the Bill should have been started as draft legislation, but that did not happen—this is where we are; I wish that we were not. As we are here, however, the Government should relent and say that the whole of the Bill will be considered in a Committee of the whole House. That would save the Government time on Report and would not add a great deal of time to the consideration of the Bill. In so doing, the Government would earn back a little of the respect that they have forfeited from all who hold the parliamentary system in high regard.

8.55 pm

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells) (Con): I am pleased to follow my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire (Sir Patrick Cormack). I entirely agree with the wise remarks about how the Government have presented the Bill to the House. For that reason, I will not dwell on those points, except to endorse them wholeheartedly.

I am drawn to this debate not as a lawyer, but as part of the lay element—I have always regarded constitutional matters as being of supreme importance. The longer that I am a Member of this House, the more regard I have for constitutional issues, because they concern where power resides in the country, who exercises it and who is accountable, and to whom those people are accountable, how they can be removed and how they are appointed. Those issues transcend the temporary decisions of passing majorities in this House and lay down the ground rules under which future decisions will be taken.

What I have just said is disguised by the fact that we do not have a written constitution in this country. If we were in the United States, Australia, India or anywhere else with a written constitution, it would almost be certain that the issues before us today would be subject to constitutional amendments and would therefore require super majorities in the relevant parliamentary Houses and possibly a referendum too.

Under the unwritten British constitution, however, no Parliament can bind its successors, and no law or Act, whether constitutional or otherwise, is entrenched. Some disagree with that statement and claim that the Bill of Rights after the Glorious Revolution has an overwhelming status in our constitutional history to which we must refer, but the Dicey doctrine holds sway among most constitutional lawyers in holding that there is legally no such thing as a constitutional Bill and that any future Parliament may therefore repeal any previous Act, whether it is constitutional or not. That is the British system and the British way. It follows that the Government of the day may introduce or amend any Bill that they like in exactly the same way as any other legislation.

That is the legal position, but politically successive Governments have approached those matters with a good deal of caution and forethought, and even with humility. That makes it doubly disappointing that, in promoting the Bill, the Government have, as my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire said, denied us the possibility of debating which clauses should be decided on the Floor of the House and which should be decided Upstairs. That is a monstrous denial of parliamentary powers and rights.

I have something even more troubling to say: the Government are serial offenders on constitutional reform and seem to regard the British constitution as something to be tinkered with as a matter of passing convenience. They lurch from one ill-thought-out proposal to another without any real understanding or analysis of the underlying principles and accumulated wisdom that is personified in that collection of statutes and conventions that we call the British constitution. They resemble a blind monkey trying to do a jigsaw puzzle. We have had the botched and uncompleted reform of the House of Lords; the fiasco over regional assemblies; and the proposed European constitution, which will be this country's written constitution if the Government get their way, and is being introduced without any plan or any real understanding of the implications of what is at stake.

So we come to the attempt to abolish the office of Lord Chancellor, which, as we have heard several times today, was done as part of a reshuffle. The office of Lord Chancellor is older than this Parliament, and it is outrageous that the temporary Prime Minister of the day should, as a matter of passing convenience, announce its abolition as part of a reshuffle without any consultation. There was no White Paper, nor were the Queen, the senior judiciary, the Cabinet or the House consulted or informed in any way. There was nothing about it in the Labour manifesto; no mandate whatsoever exists for these reforms. It was simply a way of conducting an awkward reshuffle, getting rid of one friend of the Prime Minister and replacing him with another.

That is a shameful way of approaching matters of such importance, particularly given that as recently as 2003—the year of the notorious reshuffle—the Government defended the position of Lord Chancellor, saying that that office,

"straddling as it does the three parts of the constitution, makes its holder uniquely placed to protect the interests of each part against the demands of the others. In particular, it both upholds judicial independence and mediates between the executive and the judiciary when occasion for controversy arises."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 7 March 2003; Vol. 646, c. 1095]

What happened in the three months between that statement and the proposed abolition of that ancient office? Of course, those original proposals have been heavily amended in another place, which I congratulate on its struggle to get the Government to rethink their proposals, and I hope that they will accept most of the amendments that were forced on them or agreed to. However, the proposals remain radical.

The Government now have a new way of justifying the Bill. Many hon. Members referred to the separation of powers. Of course, I understand that the doctrine of separation is reflected in various parts of our constitution. Power should not reside in one person or one institution, and there must be a check and a balance on the exercise of all powers. However, it is a completely different matter to advance a pure separation of powers, which does not exist under the British constitution and never has. This House is a standing affront to the pure separation of powers. Of course, in some respects we are a legislature, because we pass laws, enact legislation and check the Executive, but we also support the Executive, who are among us and arise from us. One of the duties of the House of Commons is to support the Executive of the day. That commingling of different parts of Government is established in the House that is debating this Bill.

[Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory]

So it is with the judiciary. It was noticeable that when the Government recently wanted somebody to do a very political job—to conduct an inquiry into the death of the weapons inspector, Dr. Kelly—they appointed a Law Lord. The idea that has been advanced today in various quarters that there must be a rigid, pure and absolute distinction between the institutions of the judiciary, the Executive and the legislature does not apply and never has, and the Government do not believe it.

If the separation of powers is so important under the European convention on human rights and we are said to be vulnerable to a challenge, how is it that we signed the convention in 1950 and have existed for more than 50 years under the system whereby powers are not absolutely separated? If there is a problem and an impending court case under the convention in which we are said to be in breach of article 6, let us hear about it and deal with it. However, I know of no such case. The reverse is true—the independence and impartiality of the British judiciary are widely admired throughout the world. Indeed, the Government suffered from that when the judiciary in the House of Lords overturned their attempt to incarcerate people in perpetuity without trial. That happened over detainees.

The independence does not depend on any theoretical separation of powers but can be traced to the fact that we have—or had until now—a senior member of the judiciary at the heart of British Government. Again, my hon. Friend the Member for South Staffordshire made that point. It is crucial that that position continues in order to safeguard the rule of law and the independence of the judiciary against attacks by weaker members of the Government of the day, who are always irritated by the judiciary. Indeed, the previous Home Secretary recently expressed his frustration at the judiciary, which was inhibiting some of his plans on asylum and immigration. That is a bit rich from a Cabinet Minister in a Government who imported the European convention on human rights into our law.

A Lord Chancellor with the same status as in the past is better than declarations in the Bill that assert the judiciary's independence and the rule of law. They have no more than a declaratory value because no one will enforce them judicially. I quake at the idea of replacing the Lord Chancellor, with his historic office and traditional seniority, whereby he ranks alongside the Foreign Secretary and the Home Secretary, with a more junior Minister who may be called Lord Chancellor but will be no more than a career Minister on his or her way up the greasy pole, will have no respect for many of the conventions and will not bring to the Cabinet and the centre of Government the weight and authority that is our best safeguard of the rule of law and the independence of the judiciary.

Of course we need amendments from time to time. The idea of the Lord Chancellor's sitting as a judge has had its day. The Law Lords have agreed among themselves not to vote on matters that are partisan or could come before them in their judicial capacity. The position continuously evolves. However, the Bill goes much further. I am worried by the prospect of granting responsibility for appointments, even with a judicial appointments commission in place, to a comparatively junior Secretary of State, who may be called Lord Chancellor. I am more worried about that than about the Lord Chancellor's making appointments under the current system.

It is bizarre that the Government and the Under-Secretary who opened the debate made no criticism of the current appointments system. The hon. and learned Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) criticised it and she holds a more logical position. If there is something badly wrong with the current appointments system, let us change it. However, the Government's position appears to be that there is nothing wrong. They have no allegations about the quality of appointments or the criteria—they say that appointments should be made on merit—but they still want to change the system. I have observed lapses in the behaviour of recent Lord Chancellors, but not in regard to making appointments. I and others were critical, for instance, of the last Lord Chancellor for holding fundraising dinners for the Labour party while he was Lord Chancellor, but I certainly have no criticism of his judicial appointments.

Mr. Lammy: The Government have specifically talked about the pool from which candidates are drawn, and about diversity in the context of race and gender. We have made it clear that that is the case for opening up the appointments system.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Yes, and I have no difficulty with that. Those additional criteria can be taken into account by the present Lord Chancellor in making those appointments. I have no quarrel with the proposal to amend the system of judicial appointment. What worries me is that the final decision and the accountability to Parliament will rest with a comparatively junior Minister if the office of Lord Chancellor falls into the hands of a career politician whose final loyalty is not to the office of Lord Chancellor, as it has been up to now.

My other observation about appointments goes a little wider than the Bill. I am worried by the fact that judges' political backgrounds will become more relevant to the judicial appointments system. This is perhaps inevitable, with the spread of human rights legislation, but it will be extremely dangerous if the background and opinions of judges are to be taken more explicitly into account. That is certainly the case in the United States, simply because judges there, particularly those in the Supreme Court, make political decisions. The whole issue of abortion, for instance, is not decided by Congress, by the political system or by the interplay of political forces at election time. It is not fought out in the political arena. The issue of abortion is a judicial matter. That is why frustrations build up, and why people shoot doctors and blow up abortion clinics in the United States. Those actions are borne out of a frustration that nothing can be done through the political system—by lobbying Congressmen or asking their opinions, for instance—except by going to the extreme lengths of passing a constitutional amendment. None of that can affect the abortion issue; it has to be decided judicially. That builds up frustration and takes decision making further away from the ordinary citizen, and I am worried that we might be moving gradually down that route because of the impact of human rights legislation on our judicial system.

My last point concerns the supreme court. It has been said that a move out of the House of Lords to a separate building will somehow enhance the court's authority and standing. I think that the opposite will happen. It is almost certain that the new building will turn into another procurement fiasco, which will undermine the public's belief that these changes are anything more than an attempt to endow the governing class—the judiciary, the legislature or whoever; they are all rolled together in the eyes of the public—with another grand building and another opportunity to spend more public money.

I was disturbed by the non-answers that we received to our questions about the costs involved. The explanatory notes to the Bill seem to suggest that the Treasury's attitude is that the costs of administering the civil law should be recouped in court fees. Indeed, 80 per cent. of the running costs of the supreme court will have to be recovered in that way. It follows, therefore, that the obviously greater cost of moving to a different building—the Minister mentioned a capital cost of £30 million, with another £15 million for the displaced court that currently occupies the proposed building—will have to be recovered. Under resource accounting, the capital cost of such a building appears as a depreciation charge and is therefore included in the running costs. In addition to the cost of running the new building, the capital cost of it will also have to be recovered, not as a contribution from the taxpayer or from the Exchequer, but by those who are seeking access to the courts system.

A supreme court is a rarified forum for most people to litigate in, but it follows from what the Government said that the additional costs—as the Government already admit, even before the predicted escalation—will be a cost on the courts system and, indirectly, will fall on those who seek access to our system of justice. That worries me and during discussion of the Bill we need further and better particulars about the accuracy of the estimates.

My final point concerns the name "supreme court". If the Government get their way over the European constitution, the supreme court will be not in this country, but in Luxembourg. That is the juggernaut coming down the road towards us in the form of the European constitution. I represented the interests of this House on the Convention on the Future of Europe and several members proposed that the European Court of Justice should be renamed the European supreme court. That idea was turned down for reasons of political sensitivity in member states, but the powers of the European Court of Justice will expand enormously under the European constitution and it would be appropriate to call it a supreme court. It will have the power to interpret the new constitution and in cases of dispute it will have judicial authority. There will be no right of appeal from the European Court of Justice on matters of the European constitution. Of course, the constitution takes in new areas, including criminal justice. Under the primacy clause—article I-5a—the whole constitution and all its institutions have a claimed explicit primacy over any national laws.

The European constitution incorporates formally the whole European charter of fundamental rights. The British Government's objections were overruled, so when the Union legislates on a matter such as asylum, as it has done, the EU charter of fundamental rights will, thereby, become fully binding on this country. No British court and no part of the British Parliament will be able to overrule the decisions of the European Court in that interpretation.

We may debate what we fondly still imagine to be a supreme court in this country, but its title will be incorrect. It will not have supremacy over the new, rebranded European Court of Justice under the proposed constitution. I suggest that if the constitution is ratified—I hope that it will not be—our court should be called not a supreme court, but, more accurately, the British national court.

This is a bad Bill born of expediency. The principles that are supposed to underlie it are confused and mistaken. It has learned nothing from the past, but seeks to overturn the inherited wisdom that has built up in what we call the British constitution. It ignores the real constitutional revolution that is heading our way in the form of the first written British constitution since 1653: the European constitution. For all those reasons, I recommend that the House rejects the Bill.

9.19 pm

Mr. Clive Soley (Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush) (Lab): If the right hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) was so concerned about the European constitution he should have voted against Lady Thatcher's introduction of the Single European Act, which was one of the biggest constitutional changes made in this country.

First, I have an apology. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney), I missed part of the debate to attend one of those quiet and relaxing meetings of the parliamentary Labour party where nothing ever happens. However, on this occasion the Lord Chancellor spoke extremely well on the very issue that we are discussing.

As a member of the Select Committee on Constitutional Affairs, and as someone who has been interested in the subject for many years, I have a few comments to make, but I shall be brief. As I have said before in the House, the British constitution has evolved over many hundreds of years, but at times—as at present—the Conservatives seem to think that it is set in aspic and that we should hold on to it for ever. We would not have some of our great traditions to defend if we had not changed things in the past. Change is long overdue. Before the 1997 election, I said that even if the Labour Government did nothing but make the constitutional changes we were talking about at that stage, Britain would never be the same again. Such change is a good thing. It is long overdue, and we should have made it before.

Opposition Members say that judges must be appointed on merit, and they are right, but they are only just beginning to recognise that something was seriously skewed in the previous judicial system, inasmuch as that there were hardly any—if any—women or ethnic minorities at senior level. The Conservatives could have done something about that when they were in government, but they never did.

I have listened to comments made throughout the debate about the need to debate all the Bill's stages on the Floor of the House. The Opposition may win that concession. Who knows? We should recognise, however, that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford said, few Members from any party have attended the debate today. The reason for that, I suspect, is that for too long we have seen such issues as issues for the Lords. The Lords have debated the Bill, and I can assure Members on both sides of the House that the Labour party has held plenty of discussions about it, but there has been relatively little debate in the Chamber. I am concerned that if we were to take all stages of the Bill on the Floor of the House we might have difficulty in increasing the number of Members who want to take part. There is something to be said for taking the important parts of the Bill on the Floor of the House while dealing with less contentious parts elsewhere. That would achieve a better debate.

As a member of the Select Committee, I visited Australia and New Zealand, which have many similarities to Britain, to look at their constitutional courts. One of the most important lessons we learned was that although, as we all agree, it is vital to make a distinction and ensure the independence of the judiciary from the political system, it is a mistake to have too much of a gap between the two, in the sense that we could end up with a closed-shop legal system in which judges appoint judges and the whole thing feeds on itself—something greatly feared in Australia and New Zealand. I regard the legal profession as one of the strongest closed shops of all time, yet it was never dealt with by either Lord Tebbit or Margaret Thatcher.

Opposition Members must take on board the complicated arguments about the need to bring the judicial system closer to the people. People in my constituency and elsewhere feel that things are moving on crime and law and order, and that policing is getting better. However, the trouble is the view that, as someone who phoned me today about offences said, "But of course the courts will ignore that, won't they?" One reason for that view is that the legal system, especially as set up in the House of Lords, is not close enough to the people—as we have argued in the Labour party for many years.

The Opposition say that the Lord Chancellor—someone who spends about £3 billion a year, running a Department—must be a lawyer and sit in the Lords. Why? There is a very strong case for the Lord Chancellor to be answerable in this House and to be heard on the media, defending the way in which the system works and arguing about how it needs to change to improve the lot of the people of this country, when we are dealing with judicial matters.

If we consider what happens in other countries that have systems similar to ours—the Constitutional Affairs Committee rightly chose to visit Australia and New Zealand—there is strong evidence for better political oversight of the judicial system, and the independence of the judiciary from the political system can be maintained. I agree about the need for the independent appointments body and all that goes with it, but there should be more effective political oversight, with a requirement that the people in the key positions—obviously, the Lord Chancellor is one of them—must be answerable to the people.

I might have got some of the details wrong about the father of the right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg), but I have a vivid memory of his father ringing the bell and making a great Conservative speech, while aiming to become Prime Minister and then popping up as Lord Chancellor. As a relatively new and interested person in politics, I was told that those two things must always be kept separate—but that was always nonsense, and a bit of a window-dressing exercise.
